F. mas (also mes, mez, mex, meix, metz), answering to E. manse. Cotgrave has: 'mas de terre, an oxe-gang, plow-land, or hide of land, containing about 20 acres, and having a house belonging to it.' Also: 'metz, a mesuage, tenement, or plowland, a Walloon word.'-Low Lat. masa, massa, mansa, a small farm with a house, a manse. - Lat. mansa, fem. of mansus, pp. of manere, to remain, dwell. The pre-fix is certainly Gk. μετ-, short for μετά, among, with, cognate with Goth. mith, A. S. mid, G. mit, with. γ. The base άλ- in άλ-λάω is supposed to be from the same root as έρ- in έρ-χομαι, viz. γAR, to go; cf. Skt. ri, to go, meet, attain, whence richchha, archchha, to go (corresponding to Gk. ἔρχομαι). See Curtius. Thus the orig. sense would seem to be 'a place for going about among,' a mine; later, a mineral. Der. metall-ic, Milton, P. L. i. 673, immediately from Lat. metallicus; metalli-fer-ous, from metalli- = metallo-, crude form of metallum, and -fer, producing, from ferre, to bear; also metalloid, i.e. metal-like, from Gk. μέταλλο-, crude form of μέταλλον, and eco, form; also metallurgy, q. v. METROPOLIS, a mother city. (L., -Gk.) Properly applied to the chief cathedral city; thus Canterbury is the metropolis of England, but London is not, except in modern popular usage. In K. John. v. 2, 72; and Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. The adj. metropolitan (= Lat. metropolitanus) was in much earlier use, having a purely ecclesiastical sense. More, Works, p. 1001 h. (Here Sir T. More uses the word as a F. adj., with added s, and following its sb.) - Lat. metropolis. - Gk. μητρόπολιε, a mother-state; ecclesiastically, the city of a primate. – Gk. μήτρο-, used as crude form from μήτηρ, a mother, cognate with E. Mother; and πόλιε, a city, for which see Police. Der. metropolit-an, from Lat. metropolitanus (cf. Gk. πολίτ-ηε, a citizen).

METTLE, spirit, ardour. (F., -L., -Gk.) Absolutely the same word as metal, though the difference in sense is now indicated by a difference in the spelling. Common in Shak.; see K. John, ii. 401, Jul. Cæsar, i. 1. 66, i. 2. 313, ii. 1. 134, iv. 2. 24, &c. 'No distinction is made in old editions between the two words, either in spelling or in use;' Schmidt. The allusion is to the temper of the metal of a sword-blade. See Metal. Der. mettl-ed; mettle-some MEW (3), a cage for hawks, &c. (F., -L.) In English, the sense of 'cage' is the oldest, whence the verb mew, to enclose. At a later date, the verb mew also meant 'to moult,' which is the orig. a later date, the verb mew also meant to mount, which is the originaries in French. M. E. mewe, mewe, mue. Der. mew-s, s. pl., a range of stabling, orig. a place for falcons; the reason for the change of name is given in Stow's Survey of London, ed. 1842, p. 167. Then is the Mewse, so called of the king's falcons there kept by the royal falconer, which of old time was an office of great account, as appeareth by a record of Rich. After which time [A.D. 1534] the fore-named house called the Mewse, by Charing-cross, was new built, and prepared for stabling of the king's horses, in the reign of Edw. VI and Queen Mary, and so remaineth to that use. Also mew, vb., to cage up, confine, of which the pp. mued occurs in The Knight de La Tour Landry, p. 85, l. 29. Also mew, vb., to moult, cast the coat; 'But I have mew'd that coat, Beaum. and Fletcher, Little French Lawyer, iii. 2. See Moult.

'Mica, a crum, or little quantity of anything that breaks off; also glimmer, or cat-silver, a metallick body like silver, which shines in marble and other stones, but cannot be separated from them; 'Phillips, ed. 1706. Cf. mod. F. and Span. mica, mica. Apparently from Lat. mica, a crumb (see Microcosm); but it seems to have been applied to the mineral from a notion that this word was related to Lat. micare, to shine, glimmer; which is not the case. See Microscope. Der. mic-ac--ous, a coined adi

MICH, to skulk, hide, play truant. (F.) M. E. michen, Prompt. Parv. Prov. E. mooch, mouch. The sb. micher occurs in the Rom. of the Rose, 6543 (or 6541); and, much earlier, spelt muchare, in Ancren Riwle, p. 150, last line. — O. F. mucer, mucier (Burguy), later musser, 'to hide, conceal, . . lurke, skowke, or squat in a corner;' Cot. Origin unknown. Der. mich-er, 1 Hen. also cur-mudgeon, q. v. MICHAELMAS, the feast of St. Michael. (Hybrid; F., - Heb. and L.) M. E. michelmesse, mychelmesse, P. Plowman, B. xiii. 240. Michel is from F. Michel, the F. form of Heb. Mikhiel, a proper name, signifying 'who is like unto God?' from Heb. mi, who? and El, God.
 The suffix -mas, M. E. messe, A.S. mæsse, is from Lat. missa, a mass; see Mass (2).

MICROCOSM, a little world. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) meaning 'a little universe,' was applied in old times to man, who was regarded as a model or epitome of the universe. In Minsheu, ed. 1627. 'This word is sometimes applied to man, as being a compendium of all other creatures, his body being compared to the baser part of the world, and his soul to the blessed angels;' Blount, ed. 1674. Also in Shak. Cor. ii. 1. 68. - F. microcosme, 'a little world;' Cot. - Lat. microcosmus. - Gk. μικρόκοσμος, a little world. - Gk. μικρο-, crude form of μικρόε, fuller form σμικρόε, small, little; and κύσμος, a world (see Cosmetic).

MICROSCOPE, an instrument for viewing small objects. (Gk.) In Milton, P. R. iv. 57. Coined from Gk. μικρό-, crude form of μικρόs, small; and σκυπ-εῖν, to behold, see. Cf. Gk. ἐπί-σκοποε, an overseer, bishop. See Microcosm and Scope. Der. microscop-ic, microscop-ic-al. (So also micro-meter, an instrument for measuring small distances; see Metre.)

MID, middle. (E.) M. E. mid, midde; only used in compounds and phrases; see Stratmann. - A. S. mid, midd, adj., middle; Grein, ii. 248. + Du. mid-, used in composition, as mid-dag, mid-day. + Icel. midr, adj. + Swed. and Dan. mid-, in composition. + Goth. midja. + O. H. G. mitti, adj. + Lat. medius, adj. + Gk. μέσος. Æolic μέσος (= μέθ·90ε). + Skt. múdhya, adj., middle. β. All from an adjectival base MADHYA, middle; root unknown. The Teutonic form of the base is MEDYA; Fick, iii. 240. Der. amid, q.v., whence the use of mid (for mid) as a preposition, like Russ. mejdu, mej, amid; a-mid-s-t, q.v. Also mid-day, A.S. mid-dag, John, iv. 6; mid-land, 2 Macc. viii. 35 (A. V.); mid-night, A.S. mid-niht, Wright's Vocab. i. 53, l. 5; mid-rib, a modern botanical term, not in Todd's Johnson; mid-riff, q.v.; mid-ship, short for amid-ship, first appearing in the term mid hip-beam, Phillips, World of Words, ed. 1706; midhawks mue; and a mue, or coope wherein fowle is fattened; Cot. ship-man; mid-summer, A.S. midsumor, A.S. Chron., an. 1131; mid-

MIDDLE, adj., intervening, intermediate. (E.) M. E. middel, adj. 'In the myddel place;' Mandeville's Travels, p. 2 (in Spec. of English, p. 165, l. 34). Also middel, sb. 'Aboute hire middel;' Gower, C. A. ii. 47, l. 12.—A. S. middel, sb., Grein, ii. 249. B. Formed with suffix el (due to Teut. suffix -la, Aryan -ra, Schleicher, Compend. § 220) from A. S. mid, adj.; see Mid. (Compare mick-le, M. E. muck-el, with E. muck). + Du. middel, adj., adv., and sb. + G. mittel, sb., means; O. H. G. mittell, adj., middle. Cf. Icel. medal, prep. among; milli (for mid-li), prep. between; Dan. mellem, Swed. prep. among; milli (for mid-li), prep. between; Dan. mellem, Swed, mellan, prep., between. Der. middle-man, given in Phillips, ed. 1706, mattain, pict. 1769, as a military term, signifying 'he that stands middlemost in a file;' middl-ing, used by L'Estrange and Dryden (Johnson), not an early word; middle-most, Ezek, xlii. 5 (in the Bible of 1551 and in the A. V.), an ill-coined superlative on the model of fore-most and after-

MIDGE, a small fly or gnat. (E.) M. E. migge, mygge. 'Hec sicoma, a myge' [better mygge]; Wright's Vocab. i. 223, note 4.—A. S. miege, Ælfric's Gloss., Nom. Insectorum; in Wright's Vocab. i. 24; see 'Cullix, mygc' [misprint for mycg]; id. i. 281, col. 1. Here 1. 24; see 'Culix, myge' [misprint for mycej]; 1d. 1. 281, col. 1. Here micge is put for mycge, where y is due to an earlier u, by the usual vowel-change. + Du. mug, a gnat. + Low. G. mugge; Bremen Wörterbuch. + Swed. mygg. + Dan. myg. + Icel. my. + G. mücke, O. H. G. muccá, muggá. β. All from a Teutonic type MUGYA (Fick, iii. 241); perhaps the orig. sense was 'buzzer,' from the noise made by the insect's wings. Cf. Lat. mug-ire, Skt. muj, to sound, make a low sound, low, Gk. μύζειν, to mutter, E. moo, mew. ¶ It cannot well be connected with Lat. musca, Russ. mukha, a fly, which tragether with Gk μυδα) Curtius refers to Skt. mukha, a fly, which (together with Gk. µvîa) Curtius refers to Skt. makshas, a fly; for together with Gr. point Curtus refers to Skt. makshas, a hy; for this word see Mosquito. Der. mug-wort, q.v.

MIDRIFF, the diaphragm, separating the heart from the stomach, &c. (E.) M. E. midrif, mydryf, Prompt. Parv.—A. S. midrif. 'Disseptum, midrif; Exta, midrif;' Wright's Vocab. i. 44, col. 2. (Here midrif stands for an older midhrif.)—A. S. mid, middle; and hrif, the belly, the womb, Grein, ii. 104. Cf. Du. rif, in the sense of 'carcase;' O. H. G. href, the body, O. Fries. rif, ref, the belly, midref, the midriff.

Note also O. Fries. midrithere, midriff allied to A. S. href, the breast the belly, midref, the midriff.

midriff, allied to A. S. hreder, the breast.

MIDST, the middle. (E.) 'In the midst,' Com. Errors, i. I 104; and 11 other times in Shakespeare. 'In middest of his race; Spenser, F. Q. vi. 3. 25. In the midst is from this older phrase in middest. Moreover, the t is excrescent, as in whils-t, amongs-t; and in middest answers to M. E. in middes, as in 'in middes the se' = in the midst of the sea, Pricke of Conscience. 1. 2938. A parallel phrase is amiddes, P. Plowman, B. xiii. 82.

B. Here the s gives the phrase an adverbial force, and is due to the habit of forming adverbs from the A.S. gen. case in -es. The older form is without the s, as in a midde, Layamon, 4836, also spelt a midden, id. 8154. Still earlier, we have on midden, Luke, xxii. 36, in the latest version of the A.S. Gospels, where the earlier version has on mydlene. M. E. form midde answers to A. S. middan, dat. case of the sb. midde, formed from the adj. mid, middle. See Mid; and see Amicst.

MIDWIFE, a woman who assists another in childbirth. (E.) M. E. midwif, P. Plowman's Crede, 1. 78; spelt mydwyf, Myrc's Duties of Parish Priest, ed. Peacock, 1. 98; mydewyf, id. 1. 87; mydwijf, Wyclif, Gen. xxxviii. 27 (later version); medewife, id. (earlier version). The false spelling medewife (not common) is due to confusion with mede, i. e. meed, reward; this has misled Verstegan and others as to the etymology.

β. The prefix mid- is certainly nothing but the once common A. S. and M. E. mid, prep., together with; it occurs again as a part of the M. E. midbolinge, compassion (lit. suffering with), Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 157. There are several such compounds in A. S.; as mid-wyrcan, to work with, Mk. xvi. 20, mid-wyrhta, a worker together with, co-adjutor, A.S. Chron. an. 945; see Bosworth. This A. S. mid is cognate with Du. mede, with (whence medebroeder, a companion, lit. mid-brother, medegenoot, a partner, medehelpen, to assist); also with G. mit (whence G. mit-bruder, a comrade, mithelfer, a helper, mitmachen, to take a part in, &c.); also with Gk. μετά, with (whence μεταλαμβάνειν, to participate). The sense of mid in this compound is clearly 'helping with,' or 'assisting.' The Span. comadre, a midwife, lit. co-mother, expresses the same idea.

y. The M. E. wif means no more than 'woman;' see Wife, Woman. And see Meta-. Der. midwifer-y, spelt midwifry in Bp. Hall, Sat. i. 1. 25, a clumsy compound, with F. suffix -ery (= F. -erie).

MIEN, look, bearing, demeanour. (F.,—Ital.,—L.) Spelt meen in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. He has: 'Meen (F. mine), the countenance, figure, gesture, or posture of the face.' Perhaps meane in Spenser, F. Q. vi 7. 39, is the same word. The spellings meen, meane, are remarkable, and indicate confusion with O. Ital. mena militatus, pp. of militatus, pp. of militatus, to serve as a soldier, fight. — Lat. milit.,

F. word is not an old one in the language, not being found earlier than the 15th century. Borrowed from Ital. mina, with same sense, a word omitted in Meadows' Dict., but cited by Littré, Scheler, and Brachet. There is some doubt about the etymology, but the E. spellings meen, meane clearly point to the O. Ital. mena, 'behaviour, fashion, carriage of a man,' Florio; a word which the etymologists appear to have overlooked. It is clear that mena, mina, are dialectal variations of one and the same word. This appears still more clearly from the consideration that mena, conduct, is a sb. due to the Ital. menare, 'to lead, bring, conduct, Florio; whilst mina is due to the equivalent Low Lat. minare, to lead (Ducange); whence F. mener, which is the verb to which F. mine really belongs. Y. From Lat. minare, to threaten; used in Low Lat. in the peculiar sense 'to drive flocks, to conduct.' See Menace, Mine (2). Der. de-mean. MIGHT (1), power, strength. (E.) M. E. might, mist; Chaucer, C. T. 5580. - A. S. miht, meht, maht, meaht; Grein, ii. 235. + Du. magt. + Icel. máttr (for mahtr). + Dan. and Swed. magt. + Goth. mahts. + G. macht, O. H. G. maht. β. All from Teut. type mahts. + G. macht, O. H. G. maht.

B. All from Teut. type MAHTI, might (Fick, iii. 227); from MAG, to be able; see May (1). Cf. Russ. moche, might, from moche, to be able. Der. might-y, A. S. mihtig, meahtig, Grein, ii. 237; might-i-ly, might-i-ness. MIGHT (2), was able. (E.) A. S. meahte, mihte, pt. t. of mugan, to be able; Grein, ii. 267. See May (1).

MIGNONETTE, an annual plant. (F., -G.) Modern. Added by Todd to Johnson. - F. mignonette, dimin. of mignon, a darling. See Minion MIGRATE, to remove from one country to another. (L.) The sb. migration is in Cotgrave, and in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - Lat. nuigratus, pp. of nuigrare, to wander; connected with meare, to go. Der. migration, from F. migration, 'a migration' (Cot.), from Lat.

acc. migrationem. Also migrator-y, e-migrate, im-migrate.

MILCH, milk-giving. (E.) In Gen. xxxii. 15. 'A hundred milch kine;' Tam. Shrew, ii. 1. 359. Merely a weakened form of Milk, q. v. 'Mylche, or mylke of a cowe, lac;' Prompt. Parv. p. 337. 'Mylch cowe, vacca mulsaria;' id. ¶ This use of milch as an adj. is Scandinavian. Cf. Icel. mjólk, milk; milkr, mjólkr, adj., milk-giving. milk on a milch awa. So G. melk adj. milks.

milk-giving; milk ær, a milch ewe. So G. melk, adj., milch.

MILD, gentle, kind, soft. (F.) M. E. mild, milde; Rob. of Glouc. p. 72, l. 8. – A. S. milde, Grein, ii. 250. + Du. mild. + Icel. mildr. + Dan. and Swed. mild. + G. mild, O. H. G. milti. + Goth. milds, only in comp. un-milds, without natural affection, 2 Tim. iii. 3. β. All from a Teut type MILDA, mild; Fick, iii. 235. To be divided as mil-da; allied to Lithuan. melas, dear, myleti, to love (Schleicher); Russ. miluii, amiable, kind, miloste, kindness, miloserduii, gracious (= A. S. mild-heort, mild-hearted, pitiful). Also to Gk. μείλ-ιχος, mild, μειλ-ίχιος, mild, soft. And further, to Skt. mrilámi, I am gracious, I rejoice, mrilikam, grace, pity; the primitive form being MARL, to be mild; Curtius, i. 410. Der. mild-ly, mild-ness.

MILDEW, a kind of blight. (E.) M. E. meldew, Wyclif, Gen. xli. 6. — A. S. meledeáw, honey-dew, Grein, ii. 230; mildeáw, Lyc. Cf. O. H. G. militow, mildew, cited by Grein.

B. The sense is prob. 'honey-dew,' from the sticky honey-like appearance of some kinds of blight, as, e. g. on lime-trees. Cf. Goth. miliths, honey; allied to Lat. mel, Gk. μέλι, honey; Irish mil, honey, mileog, mildew. See Mellifluous and Dew. ¶ The mod. G. word is mehlthau, i. e. meal-dew; but this is probably an altered form, as it does not agree with the O. H. G. militow; the O. H. G. for meal' being melo.

MILE, a measure of distance, 1760 yards. (L.) M. E. mile, pl. mile, Chaucer, C. T. 160a₃. – A. S. mil, a mile; fem. sb., with pl. mila, mile; Grein, ii. 250. Formed from Lat. pl. milia, more commonly millia, used in the sense of a Roman mile; the proper sense is thousands.' The older name for the Roman mile was mille passus, or mille passuum, a thousand paces. Y. Hence also G. meile, O. H. G. mila, a mile; Du. mijl, a mile; &c. The M. E. unchanged pl. mile explains such a phrase as 'a ten-mile stage.' mile-age (with F. suffix); mile-stone. And see millenary, milfoil, million MILFOIL, the name of a plant. (F., -L.) In a Vocabulary of Plant-names, said to be of the thirteenth century, we find 'Millefolium, milfoil; Wright's Vocab. i. 139. The sense is 'thousandleaf,' from the minute and numerous sections into which the plant is divided. - F. mille, a thousand; and O. F. fuil, foil, mod. F. feuille, a leaf. - Lat. mille, a thousand; and folium, a leaf. See Foil.

Well. iv. 3. 161. Also milit-ia, q. v. MILITIA, a body of soldiers for home service. (L.) 'Except his militia of natives be of good and valiant soldiers;' Bacon, Essay 29, Of Greatness of Kingdoms. - Lat. militia, (1) warfare, (2) troops, army. - Lat. milit-, base of miles, a soldier. See Militate. Der.

MILK, a white fluid secreted by female mammals for feeding their young. (E.) M. E. milk, Chaucer, C. T. 360. - A.S. mile* (not found), parallel to meole, sometimes meolue; Grein, ii. 240. + Du. melk. + Icel. mjúlk. + Dan. melk. + Swed. mjülk. + Goth. miluks, with inserted unoriginal u, as in A. S. meoluc. + G. milch. B. All from a Teut. type MELKI, Fick, iii. 236; derived from MALK. the base of the strong verb which is preserved only in the G. mellen (pt. t. molk, pp. gemolken), O. H. G. melchan, to milk; orig. 'to stroke,' from the action employed in milking a cow. γ. This Teut. base MALK answers to European MALG, Aryan MARG, to stroke, will be approximated in the stroke milk (Nesselmann). milk, appearing in Lithuan. milszti, to stroke, milk (Nesselmann), Gk. άμέλγειν, to milk, Lat. mulgere, to milk. The older sense appears in Skt. mrij, márj, to wipe, rub, stroke, sweep, answering to Aryan MARG, to rub, wipe.

8. This root is an extension of ✓ MARG, to rub, wipe. MAR, to grind, pound, rub; see Mar. Der. milk, vb., A. S. meoleian, Beda, ed. Wheelock, b. v. c. 22, p. 461, l. 13, shewing that the E. verb is derived from the sb., instead of the contrary, as in German; milk-er, milk-y; milk-maid, milk-pail, milk-tree; milk-sop, MILKSOP, an effeminate man. (E.) 'Alas, quoth she, that euer I was yshape To wedde a milksoppe, or a coward ape; 'Chaucer, C. T. 13916. The lit. sense is 'bread soaked in milk;' hence, a soft, effeminate man. From M. E. milk, milk; and soppe, a sop, bread soaked in milk. See Milk and Sop.

MILL, a machine for grinding corn, &c. (L.) M.E. melle (riming with telle); Chaucer, C. T. 3921. Also mulle, in comp. windmulle, a windmill, Rob. of Glouc. p. 547, l. 22. Mill is a corruption, for ease of pronunciation, of miln, still in use provincially; cf. the name Milner, equivalent to the commoner Miller. Similarly, M. E. mulle is for M. E. mulne, which occurs in Sir Gawain, ed. Morris, 2203. In P. Plowman, A. ii. 80, we have as various readings the forms mulnere, mylnere, myllere, mellere, a miller, corresponding respectively to mulne, mylne, mylle, melle, a mill.—A. S myln, a mill; 'Molendenum, myln;' Wright's Vocab. i. 83, col. 1, 1. 7. Also spelt mylen, Grein, ii. 270. Not an E. word, but borrowed from Lat. molina, a mill; 'Molendenum, myln;' wright's vocab. I myllen, Grein, ii. 270. Not an E. word, but borrowed from Lat. molina, a mill; wells a mill; wells a mill; wells a mill with a myllen wells a mill; whence also Icel. mylna, a mill. Extended from Lat. mola, a mill lit. 'that which grinds;' cf. molere, to grind. - - MAR, to grind, rub; whence also Lithuan. malti, Goth. malan, G. mahlen, to grind. Der. mill-cog, mill-dam, mill-race, mill-stone, mill-wright, mill-wheel, Also mill-er, mill-er's-thumb (a fish).

MILLENNIUM, a thousand years. (L.) In Johnson's Dict. -Lat. millennium, a period of a thousand years. - Lat. mille, a thousand; and annus, a year; see Annual. The same change of vowel occurs in bi-ennial, tri-ennial, &c. Der. millenni-al. We also find millenary, Bp. Taylor, Sermons, vol. ii. ser. 2 (R.) This is from Lat. millenarius, belonging to a thousand, a derivative of pl. adj. milleni, extended from mille, a thousand.

MILLET, the name of a plant. (F., -L.) In Holland, tr. of Pliny, bk. xviii. c. 7. -F. millet, 'millet, mill;' Cot. Dimin. of F. mil, 'mill, millet;' Cot. - Lat. milium, millet; whence also A.S. mil, millet (Bosworth).+Gk. μελίνη, millet. Root uncertain. Der. mili-ar-y, directly from Lat. milium.

MILLINER, one who makes bonnets, &c. (Ital.?) In Shak. Wint. Ta. iv. 4. 192. 'A millaner's wife; 'Ben Jonson, Every Man (ed. Wheatley), i. 3. 120; see the note. A milliner or millaner was formerly of the male sex. Spelt millener in Phillips; millenier in Minsheu. Origin somewhat uncertain; but probably a corruption of Milaner, a dealer in wares from Milan, in Italy. Milan steel was in good repute at an early period; we find 'And a Millaine knife fast by my knee' in the Percy Folio MS., ed. Hales and Furnivall, i. 68; where a note says: 'The dealers in miscellaneous articles were also called milliners, from their importing Milan goods for sale, such as brooches, aiglets, spurs, glasses, &c.; Saunders's Chaucer, p. 241.' We must also remember that the old sense of milliner was a haberdasher, or seller of small wares; see Minsheu, ed. 1627, whose suggestion that milliner is derived from Lat. mille (a thousand) is, probably, to be rejected, though it shews that their wares were of a very miscellaneous character, and that they had 'a thousand small wares to sell.' We also have the term mantua-maker, as if from the Italian town of Mantua, but this appears to be a corruption of Ital. manto.

Der. milliner-y.

MILLION, a thousand thousand. (F., -L.) M. E. millioun;

stem of miles, a soldier. Root uncertain. Der. militant, from Lat. Chaucer, C. T. 7267. – F. million, 'a million;' Cot. – Low Lat. militant., stem of pres. pt. of militare. From Lat. milit- we have also militar-y, All's Well, i. 1.132; militar-ist, a coined word, All's tended from Lat. mille, a thousand. See Mile. Der. million-th; million-aire, from F. millionnaire.

MILT (1), the spleen. (E.) M. E. milte, O. Eng. Miscellany, ed. Morris, p. 178, l. 171. – A. S. milte; 'Splen, milte;' Wright's Vocab. i. 45, col. 1. + Du. milt, the spleen. + Icel. milt; the spleen. + Dan. milt, the spleen. + Swed. mjülte, the spleen. + G. milz, milt.

B. The Teut. type is MELTYA (Fick, iii. 236); from the verb to melt, in the sense 'to digest;' cf. Icel. melta, (1) to malt for brewing, (2) to digest; see Melt.

MILT (2), soft roe of fishes. (Scand.) In Walton's Angler; see Todd. In this sense, it must be regarded as a mere corruption of milk. This use of the word is Scandinavian. Cf. Swed. mjölk, milk; mjölke, milt of fishes; mjölkfisk, a milter, lit. milk-fish; Dan. fiske-melk, soft roc, lit. fish-milk. So also G. milch, (1) milk, (2) milt of Der. milt, vb., milt-er.

MIMIC, imitative, apt in imitating. (L., -Gk.) 'Mimic Fancy;' Milton, P. L. v. 110. The sb. mimick occurs in Milton, Samson, 1325; and once in Shak. Mids. Nt. Dr. iii. 2. 19, spelt mimmick in the folios.—Lat. mimicus, farcical. — Gk. $\mu \iota \mu u u \dot{\omega}_s$, imitative, belonging to or like a mime. — Gk. $\mu \dot{\iota} \mu o s$, an imitator, actor, mime. β . The form $\mu \dot{\iota} - \mu o s$ is a reduplicated one, from a repetition of \checkmark MA, to measure; cf. the forms mimá, mimi, cited under Skt. má, to measure; Benfey, p. 694. The sense is one who measures or compares himself Der. mimic. sb., mimic, vb., mimic-ry. with another, an imitator. We sometimes find mime, directly from Gk, μίμος; also mim-et-ic, from Gk. μιμητικόs, imitative, from μιμη-τήs, an imitator.

MINARET, a turret on a mosque. (Span., - Arab.) Added by Todd to Johnson; it occurs in Swinburne's Travels through Spain; letter 44.—Span. minarete, a high slender turret.—Arab. mandrat, a candle-stick, lamp, light-house, a turret on a mosque; Rich. Dict. p.

1496. — Arab. manur, the same, id.; connected with nár, fire, p. 1548. + Heb. manuráh, a candle-stick; from núr, to shine.

MINCE, to chop small. (E.?) M. E. mincen; the pp. mincid occurs in the Liber Cure Cocorum, ed. Morris, 18 (Stratmann). β. The word appears to be the same as F. mincer, to mince, to shred; Cot. But the F. word was, probably, borrowed from a Teutonic source cognate with English, since Diez connects F. mince, small, with O. H. G. minst, minnist, smallest, least. γ . It is better to derive E. mince from A. S. minsian; the effect of added s is well seen in E. clean-se = to make clean. Cf. Swed. minska, Dan. mindske, to lessen.

8. The only difficulty is that the A.S. minsian (rather a rare word) appears only in an intransitive sense, viz. to become small, to fail. It only occurs twice: 'wérigra wlite minsode' = the comeliness of the accursed ones failed; Daniel, 268, ed. Grein; and again, 'swide ne minsade' = it did not greatly fail; Reimlied, 29 (in again, swince in managed that the great hat for great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat the great hat A.S. Chronicle, an. 656, ed. Thorpe, p. 53, note, l. 9. So also clean-se, A.S. clénsian, to make clean. (5. Formed, with suffix -s, implying 'to make,' from the adj. min, small, Grein, ii. 252. Cf. Du. min, less; Lat. min-or, less; see Minish. Der. minc-ing = taking small steps, Isa. iii. 16; mince-pie, formerly minced-pie, Spectator, no. 629; mince-meat, formerly minced-meat.

MIND, the understanding, intellect, memory. (E.) mynd, often in the sense of memory; Chaucer, C. T. 1908, 4972. A. S. gemynd, memory, mind, thought (where the prefixed ge-makes no difference); Grein, ii. 432. Formed (with the usual vowel-change of u to y) from A.S. munan, to think, gemunan, to remember; id. i. 431; ii. 268. + Icel. minni (for mindi), memory; from muna, to remember. + Dan. minde, memory. + Goth. gamunds, remembrance, gaminthi, remembrance; from gamunan, to remember. + Lat. mens (stem menti-), mind; connected with memini, I remember. + Lithuan. mintis in comp. isz-mintis, intelligence; from mineti, to think (Nesselmann, p. 381). + Russ. pa-miate, memory; po-mnite, to remember. Cf. also Gk. μῆτιε, wisdom, μένος, the mind; Skt. manas, the mind. B. All from MAN, to think; cf. Skt. man, to think, Lat. me-min-i, I remember. See Man. Der. mind, verb, A. S. gemyndgian, to remember, Grein, ii. 433; mind-ed; like-mind-ed; mind-ful, Shak. Lucrece, 1. 1583; mind-ful-ly, mind-ful-ness; mind-less, Pricke of Conscience, 2288. From the same root, man, mental, mentor, mania,

MINE (1), belonging to me. (E.) M. E. min, pl. mine, Chaucer, C. T. 1146; frequently shortened to my, as in id. 1145. - A. S. min, poss. pron. (declinable), Grein, ii. 252.—A. S. min (unchangeable), gen. case of the 1st pers. pronoun; see Me. + Goth. meins, poss. pron. (declinable), mine; from meina, gen. case of 1st personal pronoun. So in other Teut. tongues. Doublet, my.

mineral. 'The thridde stone in special By name is cleped mineral Whiche the metalles of every mine Attempreth, till that they been fine; Gower, C. A. ii. 87.—F. mineral, 'a minerall; Cot. Formed as adj. to accompany the sb. miniera, 'a mine of metals or minerals,' Cot.—F. miner, to mine; see Mine (2). Cf. Span. minera, a mine. Der. mineral-ise, mineral-ist, minera(l)-logy (where the final l is dropped, owing to the I following), a coined word from Gk. λόγοι, discourse, from λέγειν, to speak; minera-logi-c-al, minera-log-ist.

MINEVER, MINIVER, the same as Meniver, q. v. MINGLE, to mix, confuse. (E.) Common in Shak; both trans. and intrans. K. Lear, i. 1. 242; Macb. iii. 4. 3. A frequentative form, lit. 'to mix often,' from the older verb ming, M. E. mengen, mingen. 'The busy bee, her honye now she minges;' Surrey, Desc. of Spring; see Spec. of Eng. ed. Skeat, p. 217 (C), l. 11. The M. E. verb occurs as myngen, Rob. of Glouc. p. 42, l. 13; it is more often mengen, and mostly used in the pp. meint (contracted form of menged), or meind, Gower, C. A. ii. 262. - A.S. mengan, to mix, also to become mixed; also spelt mencgan, mængan, Grein, ii. 231. β. The vowel-change (of a to a or e) shews that mengan is a causal verb, derived from the older form mang, a mixture, preserved in the forms ge-mang, ge-mong, a mixture, crowd, assembly (where the prefixed ge-makes no difference), Grein, i. 425. + Du. mengelen, to mingle; from mengen, to mix. + O. Fries. mengia, to mix; cf. mong, prep. among. + Icel. menga, to mingle. + G. mengen, to mingle.

y. These forms are due to the sb. mang, a mixture crowd, as above. It seems best to refer this to the Teut. type MANAGA, many; see Many. Cf. G. menge, a crowd, O.H.G. menigi, a crowd, clearly related to O.H.G. manae, G. manch, many. Similarly, Mr. Vigfusson rightly derives the Icel. menga, to mix, from Icel. mangr^{*}, a form not found, yet undoubtedly the orig. form from which Icel. margr, many, is corrupted. The root is probably \(\sqrt{MAG}, \text{ to have power (see Many)}. \) Tunder the word \(\text{Among I have, by a strange oversight,} \) deduced the form mang from its derivative mengan, thus referring among to mingle. The derivation of course runs the other way. From the MAG, to have power, we have a nasalised mang, whence many, numerous, and A.S. mang, a great number, crowd, mixture; hence on-mang, in a crowd, E. among; also A.S. mengan, to mix, E. ming-le. Observe that there is no connection with the verb to mix; the slight resemblance to Gk. μίγνυμι, I mix, is purely accidental, and need not delude us. Der. mingl-ing; commingle, q. v. And see Monger, and Mongrel.

ture (from minium, i.e. red lead), the art of drawing pictures in little, being done with red lead. Miniated, painted or inlaid, as we read of porcellane dishes miniated with gold; Blount's Gloss. ed. 1674. -Ital. miniatura, a miniature. - Ital. miniato, pp. of miniare, 'to die, to paint, to coloure or limne with vermilion or sinople or red lead; Florio. - Lat. minium, cinnabar, red lead.

β. Said to be an Iberian word, the Romans getting their minium from Spain; see Pliny, b.

MINIKIN, a little darling. (Du.) Florio (in 1:98) translates Ital. mignone by 'a minion, a fauorit, a minikin, a darling.' - Du. minnekyn, a cupid; Sewel's Du. Dict.; 'Minne, Minneken, my love;' Hexham's Du. Dict. ed. 1658. Dimin. of Du. minne, love, cognate with O. H. G. minna, love, allied to E. mind. See Mind, Minion. Der. minikin, adj., i. e. dear little, K. Lear, iii. 6. 45.

MINIM, a note in music; $\frac{1}{60}$ th of a drachm. (F.,-L.) The minim was once the shortest note, a quarter of the breve, or short note. The modern semibreve is so long a note that the breve is out of use. Formerly also spelt minum; Romeo, ii. 4. 22, second quarto (Schmidt). - O. F. minime; 'minime blanche, a minume in musick [so called from its white centre]; minime noire, a crochet [because wholly black]; Cot.-Lat. minimum, minumum, acc. of minimus, minimus, very small; a superlative form with Aryan suffix ma (Schleicher, Compend. § 235) from a base min-, small. See Minor, Minish. Doublet, minimum, directly from Lat. neut. minimum, the smallest thing.

MINION, a favourite, flatterer. (F., = O. H. G.) In Shak.

Temp. iv. 98; see Trench, Select Glossary. = F. mignon, 'a minion, favorite;' Cot. = F. mignon, adj., 'minion, dainty, neat, spruce; also pleasing, gentle, kind;' Cot. [The use as a sb., with a sinister spelt ministralcie, Chaucer, C. T. 2673.

a dilling, a minikin, a darling; 'Florio.]

B. The F. -on, Ital. -one, is a mere suffix; the base mignis due to M. H. G. minne, O. H. G. minna, minni, memory, remembrance, love; well-known by its derivative minnesinger = singer of love. Y. This O. H. G. minna, memory, is closely related to E. mind; see Mind.

MINISH, to make little, diminish. (F., -L.) In Exod. v. 19; see Bible Word-book. M. E. menusen. Menused, or mand lesse; Wyclif, John, iii. 30, earlier version. Chaucer has the comp. amenuse. Pers. Tale, Group I, 377 (Six-text). - F. menuiser, 'to minish, extenuate;' Cot. Cf. Ital. minuzzare, to mince, cut small. - Low Lat. minutiare *, not found, a by-form of Low Lat. minutare, to reduce to fragments.—Lat. minutia, smallness.—Lat. minutus, small (whence F. menu); see Minute, Minor. Der. di-minish.

MINISTER, a servant. (F., -L.) M. E. ministre, Chaucer, C. T. 1664; Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 312, l. 13. [Afterwards altered to the Lat. form.] – F. ministre. – Lat. ministrum, acc. of minister, a servant.

B. In min-is-ter (from base min, small) and in mag-is-ter, a master (from base mag, great), we have a double comparative suffix answering to Aryan -yans-tara; see Schleicher. Compend. § 233. v. The base min, small, appears in min-or, less, and min-imus, least; see Minor, Minim. Der. minister, vb.. M. Also minstrel, q, v.

MINIVER, the same as Meniver, q.v.

MINIVER, the name of a very small fish. (E.) There are two similar names for the fish in early books; one corresponds to minnow, and is prob. a pure E. word; the other corresponds to O.F., menuise.

1. M. E. menow, spelt menawe in a Nominale of the 15th cent., in Wright's Vocab. i. 222, col. 2; spelt menoun, pl. menouny, Barbour's Bruce, ii. 577. The suffix ow cannot be traced to the additional trace to the additional statement of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the column of the earliest period; we find only A. S. myne. 'Capito, myne vel kelepite' [eel-pout]; Wright's Voc. i. 55, col. 2. We also find, in Altric's Colloquy (Wright's Voc. i. 6), the acc. pl. mynas and alemitan as a gloss to Low Lat. menas et capitones. This A. S. myne (=mine) may be derived from A. S. min, small, and thus prob. means 'small fish.' It does not seem to be a mere borrowing from I at mena. Cf. Irish min, small; miniasg, a small fish (iasg = fish). mend. Cl. Hish min, shart, mintag, a shart hish (usg=hish).

2. The M.E. menuse occurs (spelt menuse) in the Prompt. Parv.
p. 333; and (spelt menuse) in the Babees Book, ed. Furnivall, p.
168, l. 747. Cf. 'Hec menusa, a menys;' Wright's Vocab. i. 253,
col. 2.—O.F. menuise, 'small fish of divers sorts, the small frie of fish;' Cot. Clearly connected with O.F. menuiser, to minish; and therefore with Lat. minutia, smallness, also, a small particle; from Lat. minutus, minute; see Minute. If this be correct, the E. minn--ow and O.F. men-uise are from the same base min, small; and merely differ in the suffix. Whatever be the exact history of the words, we are clear as to the ultimate base. ¶ The Low Lat. mena, Lat. mæna, is not the same word, being borrowed from Gk. μαίνη, a small sea-fish, often salted.

MINOR, less, inferior. (L.) Like major, it was a term familiar in logic. It occurs in Sir T. More, Works, p. 504 d.—Lat. minor, less; compar. from a base min, small, not found in Latin, but occurring in the very form min in A.S. and Irish. + Icel. minnr, less: (no positive). + Goth. minniza, less (no positive). β. All from / MI, to diminish; cf. Skt. mi, minā, minī, Vedic minā, minī, to hurt; Fick, i. 724. Der. minor-i-ty, Rich. III, i. 3. 11, coined in imitation of MINOTAUR, a fabulous monster. (L., - Gk.) M.E. Minotaure, Chaucer, C. T. 982. - Lat. Minotaurus. - Gk. Μινώταυροι, a monster, half man, half bull; born, according to the story, of Pasiphae, daughter of Minos. - Gk. Mivas, for Mivas, Minos, king of Crete; and raupos, a bull.

MINSTER, a monastery. (L.,-Gk.) M. E. minster; in the name West-minster, of frequent occurrence; P. Plowman, B. iii. 12; &c. - A. S. mynster, Grein, ii. 271. Corrupted from Lat. monasterium, a monastery. See Monastery, which is a doublet.

MINSTREL, a musical performer. (F., -L.) M. E. minstrel, minstral; spelt mynstral, P. Plowman, B. prol. 33; ministral, Chaucer, C. T. 10392; menestral, Ayenbite of Inwyt p. 192. The plamenestraus occurs in Ancren Rivele, p. 83, l. 11. – O. F. menestral, and the manufactural (whence pl. menestraus). - Low Late. minstrell;' Cot. Also menestral (whence pl. menestraus). - Low Lat. ministralis, ministerialis, an artisan, servant, retainer; hence applied to the lazy train of retainers who played instruments, acted as: buffoons and jesters, and the like. - Lat. ministerium, an employment. -Lat. minister, a servant; see Minister. Der. minstrel- y, Lydgate, London Lyckpeny, st. 12; see Spec. of English, ed. Skeat, p. 26;

MINT (1), a place where money is coined. (L.) M. E. mint; cer, C. T. 775.—A.S. myrgo, myro, mirko, mirigo, mirth, Grein, ii. spelt myni, Myro's Instructions for Parish Priests, l. 1775; menet, 271. Allied to A. S. merg, merry. Not a true A. S. word, but of Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 241.—A.S. mynet, mynyt, latest text menet, a coin; Matt. xxii. 19. Not an A.S. word, but borrowed from Lat. Irish mireog, Gael. mireagh, a sporting, frolic. See Merry. Der. Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 241.—A.S. mynet, mynyt, latest text menet, a coin; Matt. xxii. 19. Not an A.S. word, but borrowed from Lat. moneta, (1) a mint, (2) money. B. Moneta was a surname of Juno, in whose temple at Rome money was coined. The lit. sense is 'the warning one,' from monere, to warn, admonish, lit. 'to cause to remember; cf. Lat. me-min-i, I remember. - MAN, to think; see Mind, Man. Der. mint, vb., mint-er, mint-age. Doublet, money.

MINT (2), the name of an aromatic plant. (L., -Gk.) M.E. minte, mynte, Wyclif, Matt. xxiii. 23. -A.S. minte, Matt. xxiii. 23; Wright's Vocab. i. 67, col. 2. Prob. not an E. word, but merely borrowed from Lat. menta, mentha, Matt. xxiii. 23 (Vulgate). - Gk. μίνθα, μίνθα, μίνθος, mint. β. The plant has flowers in whorls; hence the suggestion that the root may occur in Skt. manth, math, to churn. The G. munze answers to E. mint in both senses; this makes it almost certain that both the G. and E. words are MINUET, the name of a dance. (F., -L.) 'Menuet or Minuet, a sort of French dance, or the tune belonging to it;' Phillips, ed. 1706. So called from the short steps in it. -F. menuet, 'smallish, little, pretty; Cot. Dimin. of F. menu, small. - Lat. minutus; see Minute.

MINUS, the sign of subtraction. (L.) Mathematical. - Lat. minus, less; neuter of minor, less; see Minor.

MINUTE, very small, slight. (L.) The accentuation on the last syllable is modern. 'The minute drops;' Milton, Il Penseroso, 1. 130. But the word first came into use as a sb., in which use it is much older. M.E. minute, meaning (1) a minute of an hour, (2) a minute of a degree in a circle. 'Four minutes, that is to seyn, minutes of an houre;' Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, pt. i. § 7. l. 8. 'A degree of a signe contienith 60 mynutis; 'id. pt. i. § 8. l. 10. - Lat. minutus, small (whence F. menu); Low Lat. minuta, fem., a small portion, a mite (of money). Pp. of minuere, to make small. - Lat. min-, small, only found in min-or, less, min-imus, least; but cognate with A.S. min, small. + Gk. μνύ-θειν, to make small. - ΜI, to diminish; cf. Skt. mi, to hurt. See Minor, Minish. Der. minute-ly, minuteness; and from the sb., minute-book, minute-glass, minute-gun, minutehand.

MINX, a pert, wanton woman. (Du.?) In Shak. Tw. Nt. iii. 4. 133; Oth. iii. 3. 475. The final x is difficult to account for. The word is most likely a corruption of O. Du. minneken, used as a term of endearment, meaning 'my love;' see Minikin. B. Schmidt connects it with minion (F. mignon), but the base is, either way, the same; viz. Du. and G. minne, love. See Minion.

MIOCENE, less recent, in geology. (Gk.) A coined word, signifying 'less recent.' = Gk. μείο-, for μείων, less; and καιν-όε, new, recent.

MIRACLE, a wonder, prodigy. (F., -L.) In very early use. M. E. miracle, Chaucer, C. T. 4897. The pl. miracles is in the A. S. Chron. an. 1137 (last line). - F. miracle. - Lat. mira-culum, anything wonderful. Formed with suffixes -cu- and -lu- (= Aryan suffixes ka, ra) from mira-ri, to wonder at. - Lat. mirus, wonderful (base smai-ro-, smi-ro). - ✓ SMI, to smile, laugh, wonder at; see Smile. Cf. Skt. smi, to smile, whence smaya, wonder. Der. miraculous, Macb. iv. 3. 177, from F. miraculous, 'miraculous' (Cot.), answering to a Lat. type miracul-osus *, not used; miracul-ous-ly, -ness. From Lat. mirari we have also mir-age, mirr-or.

MIRAGE, an optical illusion. (F., -L.) Modern. - F. mirage, an optical illusion by which very distant objects appear close at hand; in use in 1809 (Littré). - F. mirer, to look at. - Low Lat. mirare, to behold. - Lat. mirari, to wonder at. See Miracle, Mirror.

MIRE, deep mud. (Scand.) M. E. mire, myre; Chaucer, C. T. 510; myre, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 70, l. 18; mire, Will. of Palerne, 3507.—Icel. myrr, mod. myri, a bog, swamp. + Swed. myra, a bog, marsh. + Dan. myr, myre, a marsh. + O. Du. moer, 'mire, dirt, or mudd;' Hexham. + O. H. G. mios, M. H. G. mies, moss, swamp. β. Fick (iii. 241) refers Icel. myrr and O.H.G. mios to a Teut. type MEUSA, a swamp, a mossy place, a derivative from the type MUSA, whence E. moss; see Moss. Thus the sense is 'mossy ground,' bog, swamp, deep mud. There seems to be no reason for connecting it with mere; but see Moor (1). I cannot find any authority for an alleged A.S. myre, mire. Der. mire, vb., Much Ado, iv. I. 135; mir-y, Tam. Shrew, iv. I. 77.

MIRROR, a looking-glass. (F., - L.) M. E. mirour, myroure (with one r); P. Plowman, B. xi. 8. - O. F. mireor, later miroir, 'a myrror;' Cot. This form Burguy equates to a Lat. type miratorium*, not found. Evidently from the Low Lat. mirare, to behold.

Lat. mirari to wonder at See Miragle Lat. mirari, to wonder at. See Miracle.

mirth-ful, mirth-ful-ly, -ness.

MIS-(1), prefix. (E. and Scand.) The A.S. prefix mis-occurs in mis-ded, a misdeed, and in other compounds. It answers to Du., Dan., and Icel. mis., Swed. miss., G. miss.; Goth. missa- as in missadeds, a misdeed. Hence the verb to miss; see Miss (1). It is sometimes Scand., as in mis-take. And see Mis-(2).

MIS-(2), prefix. (F., -L.) Not to be confused with mis-(1).

The proper old spelling is mes-, as in O. F. mes-chief, mischief. The comparison of this with Span. menos-cabo, diminution, Port. menoscabo, contempt, &c. shews that this prefix undoubtedly arose from Lat. minus, less, used as a depreciatory prefix. At the same time, Scheler's observation is just, that the number of F. words beginning with me- (O. F. mes-) was considerably increased by the influence of the G. prefix miss- (see above) with which it was easily confused. Clear examples of this F. prefix occur in mis-adventure, mis-alliance, mis-chance, mis-chief, mis-count, mis-creant.

MIBADVENTURE, ill luck. (F., -L.) M. E. misauenture; spelt messauenture, King Horn, ed. Lumby, l. 710. -O. F. mesaventure (Burguy). - O. F. mes-, prefix (- Lat. minus); and F. aventure, adventure. See Mis-(2) and Adventure.

MISALLIANCE, an improper alliance. (F.,-L.) word; added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. - F. mésalliance. See Mis- (2) and Ally.

MISANTHROPE, a hater of mankind. (Gk.) 'I am misanthropos; Timon, iv. 3. 53. – Gk. μισάνθρωπος, adj., hating mankind. – Gk. μισ-εῖν, to hate, from μῖσος, hatred; and ἀνθρωπος, a man. See Anthropology. Der. misanthrop-ic, misanthrop-ic-al, misanthrop-ist, misanthrop-y (Gk. moardpornia).

MISCREANT, a vile fellow, wretch. (F.,-L.) Orig. an unbeliever, infidel; see Trench, Select Glossary. Formerly also used as an adjective. 'Al miscreant [unbelieving] paynyms;' Sir T. More, Works, p. 774 a. 'This miscreant [unbeliever] now thus baptised;' Frith's Works, p. 91, col. 1.—O. F. mescreant, 'miscreant, misbelieving;' Cot.

B. The prefix mess-answers to Lat. minus, less, used in a bad sense; see Mis-(2). By comparing O. F. mescreant with Ital. miscredente, incredulous, heathen, we at once see that F. creant is from Lat. credent-, stem of pres. part. of credere, to believe; see Creed. And see Recreant.

MISNAME, to name amiss. (E.) In Skelton, A Replycacion, 1. 59. From Mis- (1) and Name.

MISNOMER, a wrong name. (F.,-L.) 'Misnomer, French Law-Term, the using of one name or term for another;' Phillips, ed. 1706. It properly means 'a misnaming.' Also in Blount's Nomolexicon, ed. 1691, where the prefix is said to be the F. mes., which is probably correct. The E. word prob. answers to an O. Law-French mesnommer. — O. F. mes- (= Lat. minus), badly; and nommer, to name, from Lat. nominare, to name. See Mis- (2) and Nominate.

MISPLACE, to place amiss. (Hybrid; E. and F., -L.) In As You Like It, i. 2. 37. From Mis-(1) and Place. Der. misplace-ment. MISPRINT, to print wrongly. (Hybrid; E. and F., -L.) By misse-writing or by mysse-pryntynge; Sir T. More, Works, p. 772 b. From Mis-(1) and Print. Der. misprint, sb.

MISPRISE, MISPRIZE, to slight, undervalue. (F.,-L.) In As You Like It, i. 1. 177. Spenser has the sb. mesprise = contempt; F. Q. iii. 9. 9. - O. F. mespriser, 'to disesteem, contemn;' Cot. - O. F. mes- (= Lat. minus), badly; and Low Lat. pretiare, to prize, esteem, from Lat. pretium, a price. See Mis- (2) and Prize.

MISPRISION, a mistake, neglect. (F.,-L.) See Blount's Nomolexicon, ed. 1691. He says: 'misprision of clerks (Anno 8 Hen. VI. c. 15) is a neglect of clerks in writing or keeping records... Misprision also signifies a mistaking (Anno 14 Edw. III. stat. 1. cap. 6).' - O. F. mesprison, 'misprision, error, offence, a thing done, or taken, amisse; Cot. B. This O.F. meprion has the same sense and source as mod. F. meprise, a mistake (Littré). It is written misprisio in Low Latin (Ducange); but this is only the O. F. word turned into Latin.

Y. From O. F. mes-= Lat. minus, badly; and Low Lat. prensionem, acc. of prensio, a taking, contracted form of Lat. prehensio, a seizing. The latter is from Lat. prehensus, pp. of prehendere, to take. See Mis-(2) and Prison. ¶ 1. Misprision ¶ 1. Misprision 2. It is toleris, in fact, a bad form; it should be misprison. ably certain that misprision was ignorantly confused with misprise, and wrongly used in the sense of contempt. Thus Blount, in the article already cited, says: 'misprision of treason is a neglect or light account made of treason; and he derives the word from F.

mespris, contempt. This easy error has probably resulted in false law.

MISPRONOUNCE, to pronounce amiss. (Hybrid; E. and F., -L.) 'They mis-pronounced, and I mislik d;' Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus (R.) From Mis-(1) and Pronounce. Der. mispronunci-at-ion.

MISQUOTE, to quote amiss, misinterpret. (Hybrid; E. and F., - L.) In Shak. 1 Hen. IV, v. 2. 13. From Mis- (1) and Quote.

Der. misquot-at-ion.

MISREPRESENT, to represent amiss. (Hybrid; E. and F., -L.) In Milton, Samson, 124. From Mis- (1) and Represent. Der. misrepresent-at-ion.

MISRULE, want of rule, disorder. (Hybrid; E. and F., -L.) Gower has it as a verb. 'That any king himself misreule;' C. A. iii. 170, l. 5. Stow mentions 'the lord of misrule' under the date 1552 (R.); the name does not seem to be in very early use, nor to be a F. word. From Mis- (1) and Rule.

MISS (1), to fail to hit, omit, feel the want of. (E.) M. E. missen, Will. of Palerne, 1016. Rather a Scand. than an E. word, but the prefix mis-, which is closely connected with it, is sufficiently common in A. S.—A. S. missan or missian (rare). 'by læs þe him misse,' lest aught escape his notice, or, go wrong with him; Canons under King Edgar, 32; in Thorpe, Ancient Laws, ii. 250. A weak verb, formed from an old sb. signifying 'change,' or 'error,' or 'failure,' or 'lack,' preserved in A. S. only as the prefix mis-, signifying amiss or wrongly. + Du. missen, to miss; from mis, sb., an error, mistake. Cf. mis, adv., amiss; mis-, as prefix, amiss. + Icel. missa, to miss, lose; mis, or a mis, adv., amiss; mis-, prefix. + Dan. miste (for misse), to lose; mis-, prefix. + Swed. mista (for missa), to lose; miste, adv., wrongly, amiss; miss-, prefix. + Goth. misso, adv., reciprocally, interchangewably; missa-, prefix, wrongly.+M. H. G. missen, O. H. G. missan, to Bh a

M. H. G. mi.se, an error. B. The general Teutonic types are MISSYA. verb, to miss, MISSA, adv., reciprocally; from MISSA, change, lack, failure, error (Fick, iii. 238). The last stands for mid-sa, by assimilation (answering to Aryan mit-sa), formed with the suffix -sa from the base MID (Aryan MIT). 7. This base appears in A. S. mitan, to conceal, avoid, dissimulate, escape notice (Grein, ii. 240); O.H.G. midan, G. meiden, to avoid (a strong verb). Allied to Skt. mith-as, reciprocally (= Goth. misso), mith yii, falsely, untruly, wrongly, amiss; from the root MITH, which in Vedic Skt. means 'to rival' (Benfey), p. 706. See further in Fick, i. 722, 723. Der. miss, sb., M. E. misse, a fault; 'to mende my misse' = to repair my fault, Will. of Palerne, 1. 532; this sb. is, theoretically, older than the verb, but does not appear in A. S. Also miss-ing. MISS (2), a young woman, a girl. (F., -L.)

Merely a contraction from Mistress, q. v. One of the earliest instances in dramatic writing occurs in the introduction of Miss Prue as a character in Conwriting occurs in the introduction of Miss Frue as a character in Congreve's Love for Love. The earliest example appears to be the following: 'she being taken to be the Earle of Oxford's misse, as at this time they began to call lewd women;' Evelyn's Diary, Jan. 9, 1662. Thus Shak, has: 'this is Mistress Anne Page,' where we should now say 'Miss Anne Page;' Merry Wives, i. 1. 197.

MISSAI, a mass-book, (L.) Not in early use; the old term was mass-book, M. E. messebok, Havelok, 186. In Minsheu, ed. 1627.

In Sharwood's Index to Courave we find E. missal given as equi-

In Sherwood's Index to Cotgrave we find E. missal, given as equivalent to O. F. messel, missel; but Cotgrave himself explains the O. F. words as 'masse book.' The E. word is rather taken directly from the familiar Latin term than borrowed from O. F. - Low Lat. missale, a missal. - Low Lat. missa, the mass. See further under Mass (2)

MISSEL-THRUSH, MISTLE-THRUSH, the name of a kind of thrush. (E.) So called because it feeds on the berries of the mistle-toe. The name is prob. old, though not early recorded. * We meet in Aristotle with one kind of thrush [εξοβόρος] called the miselthrush, or feeder upon miseltoe; 'Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. ii. c. 6. § 21 (part 3). + G. mistel-drossel, a mistle-thrush; from mistel, mistletoe, and drossel, a thrush. See Mistletoe and Thrush.

MISSHAPE, to shape amiss. (E.) Chiefly in the pp. misshaped, 3 Hen. VI, iii. 2. 170; or misshapen, Temp. v. 268. M. E. misshapen, pp., spelt mysshape (with loss of final n), P. Plowman, B. vii. 95. From Mis-(1) and Shape. + O. Du. misscheppen, to misshape, used by Vondel; Oudemans. + G. misschaffen, to misshape (rare).

MISSILE, that may be thrown; a missile weapon. (L.) perly an adj., now chiefly used as a sb. Taken directly from Lat. rather than through the F. Cotgrave gives 'feu missile, a squib or other firework thrown,' but the word is not in Littre, and probably not common. 'His missile weapon was a lying tongue; 'P. Fletcher, The Purple Island (R.) - Lat. missilis, adj., that can be thrown; the neut. missile is used to mean a missile weapon (telum being understood). - Lat. missus, pp. of mittere, to throw. β. The orig. sense is thought to be 'to whirl; 'cf. Lithuan. mesti, to throw, to wind yarn, pres. t. metu, I throw; Russ. metate, to throw, cast, cast lots. — MAT, to whirl, to throw; cf. Skt. math, to churn, to agitate. We may particularly note the O. Celtic word mataris or matara, a javelin, preserved in Livy, vii. 24; Cæsar, Bell. Gall. i. 26. See Fick, iii. 710. Der. From Lat. mittere are also derived ad-mit, com-mit, e-mit, im-mit, inter-mit, manu-mit, o-mit, per-mit, re-mit, sub-mit, trans-mit, with their derivatives; from the pp. miss-us are also miss-ion, q. v., miss-ive, q.v., dis-miss, e-miss-ar-y, pro-miss-or-y; com-pro-mise, de-mise, miss-to-, i.e., its-miss, pro-miss, pro-miss, de-miss, pro-mise, pro-mise, pro-mise, pro-mise, &c.

MISSION, a sending, an embassy. (L.) In Shak. Troil. iii. 3.

189. [The O. F. mission merely means 'expence, disbursement,'

Cot.] Formed, by analogy with F. words in -ion, from Lat. missionem, acc. of missio, a sending. - Lat. missus, pp. of mittere, to send. See Missile. Der. mission-er. a missionary, Dryden, Hind and Panther, ii. 565; later mission-ar-y, Tatler, no. 270, Dec. 30, 1710.

MISSIVE, a thing sent. (F., = L.) Used by Shak. to mean 'a messenger; 'Macb. i. 5. 7. = O. F. missive, 'a letter missive, a letter sent;' Cot. Coined, with suffix rive (= Lat. -iuus), from Lat. missus, pp. of mittere, to send; see Missile.

MISSPEND, to spend ill, to squander. (Hybrid; E. and L.)

The pres. t. misspene (for misspende) occurs as early as in Layamon, l. 13483, later text. From A.S. mis-, prefix, wrongly, amiss; and A.S. spendan, occurring in the compounds aspendan, for spendan; see Sweet's A.S. Reader. But the A.S. spendan is not a true E. word; it is only borrowed from Lat. expendere. See Mis- (1) and MIST, watery vapour, fine rain. (E.) M. E. mist, P. Plowman, A. prol. 88; B. prol. 214. - A. S. mist, gloom, darkness; Grein, ii. 256. + Icel. mistr, mist. + Swed. mist, foggy weather at sea. + Du. mist, fog. +G. mist, dung (certainly the same word, the difference in seth the myght and the power that is yeven him; 'Chaucer, C. T.

miss; O. H. G. mis or missi, variously; O. H. G. missa-, prefix; sense being explicable from the root). + Goth. mainstus, dungs β. The final -st is a noun-ending, as in bla-st from blow, and mist stands for mih-st or mig-st, from the base mig (Aryan migh, Skt. mih) which appears in Lithuan. mig-la, mist (Nesselmann), Russ. mgla (for mig-la), mist, vapour, Gk. δ-μίχ-λη, mist, fog, Skt. mik-ira, a cloud, megh-a, a cloud.

γ. All from MIGH (Teutonic MIG), to megn-u, a cloud. Y. All from MIGH (Leutonic MIG), to sprinkle, to urine; appearing in Skt. mih (for migh), to sprinkle, Lat. ming-ere, meiere, Du. miggen, Icel. miga, A. S. migan, all with the sense of Lat. mingere. See Fick, iii. 239. Der. mist-y, A. S. mist-ig (Grein); mist-i-ness; also mizzle, q. v.

MISTAKE, to take amiss, err. (Scand.) M. E. mistaken, Rom. of the Rose, 1. 1540. — Icel. mistaka, to take by mistake, to make a slip — Icel. misc. cognate with A. S. mist prefer, and take to take slip. - Icel. mis-, cognate with A.S. mis-, prefix; and taka, to take. See Mis-(1) and Take. Der. mistake, sb., mistak-en, mis-tak-en-ly. MISTER, MR., a title of address to a man. (F.,-L.) The contraction Mr. occurs on the title-page of the first folio edition of Shakespeare (1623); but it is probably to be read as Master. Cot-grave explains monsieur by 'sir, or master.' It is difficult to trace the first use of mister, but it does not appear to be at all of early use, and is certainly nothing but a corruption of master or maister, due to the influence of the corresponding title of mistress. See Master, Mistress. β. Richardson's supposition that it is connected with M. E. mister, a trade, is as absurd as it is needless; notwithstanding the oft-quoted 'what mister wight,' Spenser, F. Q. i. 9. 23. ¶ It may be remarked that M. E. mister is from O. F. mestier (F. métier), Lat. ministerium, and is therefore a doublet of ministry. Also that mistery, in the sense of trade or occupation, also answers to ministry, though usually misspelt mystery. See Mystery (2).

MISTERM, to term or name amiss. (Hybrid; E. and F., -L.)
In Shak. Romeo, iii. 3. 21. From Mis-(2) and Term.

MISTIME, to time amiss. (E.) M.E. mistimen, to happen amiss, Ancren Riwle, p. 200, note e. - A.S. mistiman, to happen amiss, Andrew Riwie, p. 200, note s. — A. S. missiman, to happen amiss, turn out ill (Lye). From Mis-(1) and Time.

MISTLETOE, a parasitic plant. (E.) In Shak. Titus, ii. 3. 95. Scarcely to be found in M. E., but it must have existed. — A. S. misteltún. 'Viscarago, misteltun' (sic); Ælfric's Gloss., Nomina Ilerbarum; in Wright's Vocab. i. 31, col. 2. [The a is of course long; cf. E. stone with A. S. stún, &c.] This should have produced mistletone, but the final n (ne) was dropped, probably because the M. E. tone (better toon) meant 'toes,' which gave a false impression that the final n was a plural-ending, and unnecessary. + Icel. mistel-teinn; the mistletoe.

B. The final element is the easier to explain; it simply means 'twig.' Cf. A. S. tún, a twig (Grein), Icel. teinn, Du. teen, M. H. G. zain, Goth. tains, a twig, Dan. teen, Swed. ten, a spindle; all from a Teut. type TAINA, a twig, rod, which Fick (iii. 121) thinks may be connected with Tin, q.v. y. The former element is A. S. mistel, which could be used alone to mean 'mistletoe,' though it was also called ác-mistel (oak-mistle), to distinguish it from eor o-mistel (earth-mistle), a name sometimes given to wild basil or calamint; see Cockayne's A. S. Leechdoms. In Danish, the mistletoe is called either mistel or mistelteen. In Swed. and G. the 8. The word mist-el is clearly a mere mistletoe is simply mistel. dimin. of mist, which in E. means 'vapour' or fog, in A. S. 'gloom,' but in G. has the sense of 'dung.' The reason for the name is not quite clear; it may be because the seed is deposited by birds who eat the berries, or it may rather refer to the slime or bird-lime in the berries; cf. 'mistel, glew' [glue], Hexham's Du. Dict.; O. Du. mistel, bird-lime. See further under Mist. ¶ Since mist-el may take also the sense of 'gloom,' we see why Balder, the sun-god, was fabled to have been slain by a twig of the mistletoe. The sun, at mid-winter, is obscured; and we still connect mistletoe with Christmas. This sense of the word originated the legend; we must not reverse the order by deriving the sense from the story to which it gave rise. Der. missel-thrush, q. v.

MISTRESS, a lady at the head of a household. (F., -L.) Also written Mrs. and called Missis. In Shak, Macb. iii, 5. 6. M.E. written Mrs., and called Missis. In Shak, Macb. iii. 5. 6. M. E. maistresse, Chaucer, C. T. 10691. — O. F. maistresse, 'a mistress, dame; Cot. (Mod. F. maîtresse.) Formed with F. suffix -esse (= Lat. -issa, Gk. -ισσα) from O. F. maistre, a master; see Master.

Der. mistress-ship, Titus, iv. 4. 40.
MISTRUST, to regard with suspicion. (Scand.) trost, Coventry Plays, ed. Halliwell, 126 (Stratmann); mistraist, Bruce, x. 327 (in Hart's edition, see the footnote); mistriste, Chaucer, C. T. 12303. MITE (1), a very small insect. M. E. mite, Chaucer, C. T. 6142.—A. S. mite. 'Tomus, maßa, mite;' Ælfric's Gloss., Nom. Insectorum, in Wright's Vocab. i. 24. + Low G. mite, a mite. + O. H. G. mizd, a mite, midge, fly.

B. The word means 'cutter' or 'biter,' from the Teut. root MIT, to cut small; whence Goth. maitan, to cut, Icel. meita, to cut, also Icel. meitill, G. meissel, a chisel, G. messer, a knife. This appears to be a secondary root from pindle.—Gk. μνημονικά, mindful.—Gk. μνόμου, crude form of μνημονικόs. belonging to memory.—Gk. μνημονικό, to hink: chisel, G. messer, a knife. This appears to be a secondary root from MI, to diminish; Fick, iii. 239. See Minish. Der. mit-y.

MITE (2), a very small portion. (O. Du.) M. E. mite; 'not worth a mite;' Chaucer, C. T. 1558. 'A myte [small coin] that he offrep;' P. Plowman; C. xiv. 97.—O. Du. mijt, a small coin, the sixth part of a doit; mite, myte, a small coin, worth a third of a penning, according to some, or a penning and a half, according to others; anything small; niet eener myte, not worth a mite (Oudemans). From the Teut. base MIT, to cut small; see Mite (1).

¶ Ultimately from the same root as minute.

MITIGATE, to alleviate. (L.) 'Breake the ordinaunce or mitigat it;' Tyndall's Works, p. 316, col. 1.—Lat. mitigatus, pp. of miligare, to make gentle. - Lat. mit-, stem of mitis, soft, gentle; with mingare, to make gentle.—Lat. mir., stein of mins, soft, gentle; with suffix -ig-, for agere, to make. Root uncertain. Der. mitigation, M. E. mitigacioun, P. Plowman, B. v. 477, from F. mitigation, 'mitigation,' Cot.; mitigat-or; mitigat-ive, from O. F. mitigatif, 'mitigative,' Cot.; also mitiga-ble, Lat. mitigabilis, from mitiga-re.

MITRE, a head-dress, esp. for a bishop. (F.,—L.,—Gk.) 'Thy my/rede bishopes' = thy mitred bishops; P. Plowman, C. v. 193. 'On his mitere,' referring to a bishop; Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 302, l. 2. - O. F. mitre, 'a bishop's miter;' Cot. - Lat. mira, a cap. - Gk. μίτρα, a belt, girdle, head-band, fillet, turban. haps allied to Gk. uiros, a thread of the woof, from MAT, to whirl; cf. Skt. math, to churn; see Fick, i. 710.

MITTEN, a covering for the hand. (F., -G.?) M. E. mitaine; spelt mitaine, Chaucer, C. T. 12307; myteyne, P. Plowman's Crede, ed. Skeat, l. 428.—O. F. mitaine; Cot. gives: 'mitaines, mittains, winter-gloves.' β. Of disputed origin; if the orig. sense be 'halfwinter-gloves,' β. Of disputed origin; if the orig. sense be 'half-glove,' it may be connected with M. H. G. mittemo, mittamo, sb., the middle, orig, 'mid-most,' a superlative form from mitte, adj., mid, middle; see Mid, Middle. middle; see Mid, Middle. γ. On the other hand, it may have been of Celtic origin. We find Gael. miotag, Irish miotog, a mitten; Gael. and Irish mutan, a muss, a thick glove. Also Irish mutog, a stump, a hand or glove without fingers; Gael. mutach, short, thick, and blunt; which reminds us of Lat. mutilus.

MIX, to mingle, confuse. (E.) In Shak. 2 Hen. IV, v. 2. 46. Rich. cites 'mixed with faith' from the Bible of 1561, Heb. iv. 2. But in earlier books it is extremely rare; Stratmann cites the pp. mixid from Songs and Carols, ed. Wright, no. VI. Mix is a corruption of misk (just as ax is another form of ask); this appears in the A. S. miscan, to misk or mix, not a common word. 'And bonan miscal and metgal ælcum be his gewyrhtum' = and thence He [God] mixes and metes out to each according to his deserts; Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, cap. xxix. § 9, last line (lib. iv. pr. 6). Notwithstanding the close similarity to Lat. miscere, we may consider it as merely cognate with it, not borrowed, the word being very widely spread. (But the derived word mixture is of course of Lat. origin.) That the word is really E. is supported by the derivative mash; see Mash. + G. mischen, to mix; O. H. G. miskan, + W. mysgu, to mix; cymmysgu, to mix together. + Gael. measg, to mingle, mix, stir; Irish measgaim, I mix, mingle, stir, move. + Russ. mieshate, to mix. + Lithuan. maiszyti, to mix (Nesselmann). + Lat. miscere. + Gk. μίσγειν. Cf. Skt. miçra, mixed. β. All from a base MIKSH, to mingle, which is obviously an extension (perhaps an inchoative form) of MIK, to mingle, appearing in Gk. μίγ·νυμ (for μίκ·νυμ), I mix. See Curtius, i. 417; Fick, i. 725. Der. mix-er, com-mix; also mixture, Romeo, iv. 3. 21, Sir T. More, Works, p. 83 a, from Lat. mixtura, a mixing, mixture, from mixturus, fut. part. of miscere.

MIZEN, MIZZEN, the hindmost of the fore and aft sails, in a three-masted vessel. (F., Ital., -L.) Spelt misen in Minsheu, cd. 1627, and in Florio, ed. 1598. -O. F. misaine, which Cotgrave defines as 'the foresaile of a ship.'-Ital. mezzana, 'a saile in a ship called the poope or misen-saile;' Florio, ed. 1598. Cf. mezzano, a meane or countertenour in singing, a meane man, betweene great and little;' id. β. Perhaps the sense was 'middling-sized,' with respect to the old make of it; or from its mid position between bowsprit and main-mast, for it was once a fore-sail. The reason for the name is uncertain, but the etymology is clear. - Low Lat. medianus, middle, of middle size; whence also F. moyen, and E. mean (3). Extended from Lat. medius, middle; see Mid. Doublet, mean (3). Der. mizen-mast or mizzen-mast.

MOAN, a complaint, a low sound of pain. (E.) M. E. mone, Chaucer, C. T. 11232. This corresponds to an A. S. form mán, which does not appear with the modern sense; but the derived verb menan, to moan, to lament, is common; see exx. in Grein, ii. 222. B. This A.S. verb passed into the M.E. menen, to moan; whence mened hire = bemoaned herself, made her complaint, P. Plowman, B. iii. 169. After a time this verb fell into disuse, and its place was supplied by the sh. form, used verbally. 'Than they of the towne began to mone;' Derners, tr. of Froissart, vol. i. c. 348. Y. Stratbegan to mone; Perners, tr. of Froissart, vol. i. c. 348. γ . Stratmann and others identify A. S. mænan, to moan, with A. S. mænan, to mean; see Mean(1). I doubt this identification; Grein records the verbs separately. Ettmüller refers A. S. mænan in both senses to A. S. mán, adj., evil, wicked, sb. evil, wickedness. 8. It seems right to refer A. S. mánan, to moan, to A. S. mán, wickedness; the difficulty is in the remarkable change of sense. Note, however, that the Icel. mein (cognate with A. S. mein, wickedness), means a hurt, harm, disease, sore, whence there is but a step to a moan as the expression of pain. Cf. Dan. meen, defect, blemish, harm, damage. e. Fick refers A. S. min, from a supposed Teut, type MAINA, to ✓ MI, to change, deceive; iii. 237. Der. moan, verb, as explained above; also be-moan, q. v.

MOAT, a trench round a fort, filled with water. (F., - Teut.) M. E. mote, P. Plowman, B. v. 595 .- O. F. mote, 'chaussée, levée, digue, i. e. a causeway, embankment, dike; Roquefort. Just as in the case of dike and ditch, the word moat originally meant either the the trench dug out, or the embankment thrown up; and in O. F. the usual sense was certainly an embankment, hill. It is therefore the same word as mod. F. motte, a mound, also a clod, or piece of turf. Motte, a clod, lumpe, round sodd, or turfe of earth; also, a little hill or high place; a fit seat for a fort or strong house; hence, also, such a fort, or house of carth; . . a butt to shoot at; 'Cotgrave. The orig. sense is clearly a sod or turf, such as is dug out, and thrown up into a mound; and the word is associated with earthen fortifications, whence it was transferred to such a trench as was used in fortification. Thus Shak, speaks of 'a most defensive to a house;' Rich. II, ii. 1. 48; and in P. Plowman, the 'mote' is described as being 'the manere aboute,' i.e. all round the manor-house. Cf. also: Mothe, a little earthen fortresse, or strong house, built on a hill; Cotgrave.

B. Of Teut. origin, but rarely found; it occurs, how-Cotgrave. ever, in the Bavarian mott, peat, esp. peat such as was dug up, burnt, and used for manure; whence motten, to burn peat; Schmeller, Bavarian Dict., col. 1693. This Bavarian word is perhaps related to E. mud; see Mud. Cf. Du. mot, dust of turf; Ital. mota, mire, motta, a heap of earth, also a hollow; Span. mota, a mound; Irish, mota, a mound, moat. Der. moat-ed, Meas. for Meas. iii. 1. 277.

MOB (1), a disorderly crowd. (L.) Used by Dryden, in pref. to Cleomenes, 1692; as cited in Nares. A contraction from mobile unlgus. 'I may note that the rabble first changed their title, and were called 'the mob' in the assemblies of this [The Green Ribbon] Club. It was their beast of burden, and called first mobile vulgus, but fell naturally into the contraction of one syllable, and ever since is become proper English; North's Examen (1740), p. 574; cited in Trench, Study of Words. In the Hatton Correspondence, ed. E. M. Thompson (Camden Soc.), the editor remarks that mob is always used in its full form mobile throughout the volumes (see ii. 40, 99, 124, 156); but, as Mr. Thompson kindly pointed out to me, he has since noted that it occurs once in the short form mob, viz. at p. 216 of vol. ii. Thus, under the date 1690, we read that 'Lord Torrington is most miserably reproached by the mobile' (ii. 156); and under the date 1695, that 'a great mob have been up in Holborn and Drury Lane' (ii. 216). And see Spectator, no. 135.— Lat. mobile, neut. of mobilis, moveable, fickle; mobile uulgus, the MOB (2), a kind of cap. (Dutch.) 'Mob, a woman's night-cap;'

Probably connected with Muff and Muffle.

'As the miseling vpon the herbes, and as the droppes vpon the grasse;' Deut. xxxii. 2, in the pression 'mobil people' occurs, according to Richardson, in The moveable (put for mouibilis). - Lat. mouere, to move; see Move. MOCK, to deride. (F., - Teut.) M. E. mokken, Prompt. Parv. -O. F. mocquer, later moquer. 'Se moquer, to mock, flowt, frumpe, scoffe; 'Cot. From a Teutonic source, of which we have ample evidence in G. mucken, to mumble, mutter, grumble; O. Swed. mucka, to mumble (Ihre); Low G. mukkan, to put the mouth in a position for speaking, to mumble (Bremen Wörterbuch); O. Du. mocken, to mumble (Kilian), 'to move one's cheeks in chawing' (Hexham). From the sense of moving the mouth in grumbling to that of mocking is an easy step; cf. Ital. mocca, 'a mowing mouth,' β. All from the imitative root moccare, 'to mocke;' Florio. MUK, an extension of MU, to make a muttered sound. This root MUK also appears as MAK, to make derisive sounds with the lips, whence Lat. maccus, a buffoon; Gk. μῶκος, mockery; Gael. mag, to scoff, deride; Irish magaire, a scoffer, jester; W. mocio, to mimic.

y. The roots MAK, MUK, being imitative, are unaffected by Grimm's law. From the base MU we have also Motto, Mumble, Mutter, Mow (3). The Du. moppen, to pout, is a variant of mack; see Mope. MODE, a manner, measure, rule, fashion. (F., -L.) 'In the first figure and in the third mode; Sir T. More, Works, p. 504 d; where it is used in a logical sense. - F. mode, 'manner, sort, fashion;' Cot. - Lat. modum, acc. of modus, a measure, manner, kind, way. β. Akin to Gk. μηδοε, a plan, μήδομαι, I intend, plan; from ✔MAD (Teut. MAT), to measure, to plan, best exemplified in E. mete; cf. Icel. máti, a mode, manner, way; see Mete. v. This √MAD is merely a secondary root from √MA, to measure; cf. Skt. má, to measure, whence also E. measure, moon, &c. Der. mod-al, a coined word from Lat. mod-us; mod-ish coined from F. mode; mod-el, q. v., mod-er-ate, q.v., mod-ern, q.v., mod-est, q.v.; mod-ic-um, q.v., mod-ify, q.v.; mod-ul-ate, q.v. From the Lat. modus we also have accommod-ate, com-mod-ious. Doublet, mood (2).

Rich. II, iii. 2. 153; Hen. V, ii. chor. 16; &c. - O. F. modelle (F. modèle), 'a modell, pattern, mould;' Cot. - Ital. modello, 'a model, a frame, a plot, a mould; Florio. MOII. to toil to deudes (F.—I.) Shines and course.

MOIL, to toil, to drudge. (F., -L.) Skinner, ed. 1691, explains moil by 'impigre laborare,' i.e. to toil, drudge. But it is prob. nothing but a peculiar use of the word moile, given in Minsheu, ed. 1627, with the sense 'to defile, to pollute;' cf. moil, 'to drudge, to dawb with dirt;' Phillips, ed. 1706. As Mr. Wedgwood suggests, will to drudge, to the sense of the word moile, and the sense of the word moile. moil, to drudge, is probably 'only a secondary application from the laborious efforts of one struggling through wet and mud; ' or simply, from the dirty state in which hard labour often leaves one. β . The sense seems to have been affected by confusion with prov. E. moil, a mule, and again, with Lat. moliri, to use effort, to toil. The latter, in particular, may easily have been present to the mind of early writers. But we must not derive the word from these; for (1) we never meet with a verb to mule; and (2) the Lat. moliri would only have given a form to mole; see Mole (3).

Y. We find earlier have given a form to mole; see Mole (3). Y. We find earlier quotations for both senses; Halliwell cites 'we moyle and toyle' from the Marriage of Wit and Humour, A.D. 1579. Rich, quotes from Gascoigne: 'A simple soule much like myself did once a serpent find, Which, almost dead with cold, lay moyling in the myre; i. e. wallowing in the dirt. So also Spenser uses moyle for ' to wallow; see his Hymn of Heavenly Love, st. 32. Still earlier, the sense is simply to wet or moisten. M. E. moillen, to wet. 'A monk ... moillid al hir patis, i.e. moistened all their heads by sprinkling them with holy water; Introd. to Tale of Beryn, ed. Furnivall, p. 6, l. 139. — O. F. moiller, moiler (Littré), moiller (Burguy), later mouiller, 'to wet, moisten, soake; 'Cot. The orig. sense was 'to soften,' which is effected, in the case of clay, &c., by wetting it. The O. F. moiler answers to a Low Lat. form molliare*, to soften (not found), formed directly from Lat. molli-, stem of mollis (O. F. mol), soft. See Mollify.

MOIRE, watered silk. (F., - Arab.) A later form of Mohair.

MOIRE, watered silk. (F.,—Arab.) A later form of Mohair, q. v.; in a slightly altered sense.

MOIST, damp, humid. (F.,—L.) M. E. moiste; 'a moiste fruit with-alle;' P. Plowman, B. xvi. 68. The peculiar use of M. E. moiste is decisive as to the derivation of the F. word. It means 'fresh' or 'new;' thus the Wife of Bath's shoes were 'ful moiste and newe;' Chaucer, C. T. 459. The Host liked to drink 'moiste and corny ale;' id. 12249. And again 'moisty ale' is opposed to old ale; id. 17009.—O. F. moiste (Littré), later moite, 'moist, liquid, humid, wet;' Cot. But the old sense of F. moiste must have agreed with the sense with which the word was imported into English.—I.at. musteus. of or belonging to new wine or must, also new, fresh; Mode and Fact. Lat. musteus, of or belonging to new wine or must, also new, fresh; sounds; 'Grew, Cosmographia Sacra (1701), b. i. c. 5. sect. 16 (R.) as musteus causes, new cheese (Pliny). = Lat. mustum, new wine; a neut. form from mustus, adj., young, fresh, new. origin; but if mustus be for mud-tus, a connection with Skt. mud, to rejoice, is not improbable. Der. moist-ly, moist-ness; moist-en, Spenser, F. moiteur (Littré).

MOLAR, used for grinding. (L.) Molar teeth or grinders; Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 752. — Lat. molaris, belonging to a mill, molar. — Lat. mola, a mill. — MAR (later form MAL), to grind; see Mar, Mill.

MOLASSES, syrup made from sugar. (Port., -L.) Also molosses; in Phillips, ed. 1706. It ought rather to be melasses. As it came to us from the West Indies, where the sugar is made, it is either a Port. or a Span. word. However, the Span. spelling is melaza, where the z (sounded like th in bath) would hardly give the E. ss. We may consider it to be from Port. melago, molasses; where the o is sounded like E. ss. [We also find Span. melaza, Ital. melassa, F. mélasse.] - Lat. mellaceus, made with honey, hence honeylike; cf. Port. melado, mixed with honey. Formed with ending -ac-e-us from mel, honey. See Mellifluous (with which cf. also marmalade, another decoction).

MOLE (1), a spot or mark on the body. (E.) M. E. mole. 'Many moles and spottes;' P. Plowman, B. xiii. 315. [As usual, the M. E. o answers to A. S. á.] — A. S. mál, also written maal (where $aa = \hat{a}$). 'Stigmentum, fúl maal on rægel' = a foul spot on a garment; Ælfric's Gloss., in Wright's Vocab. i. 26, col. 1. + Dan. maal, a goal, end, butt; properly, a mark. + Swed. mål, a mark, butt. + O. H. G. meil, a spot; G. maal, a mole. + Goth. mail, a spot, blemish. from a base MAH, answering to \sqrt{MAK} , to pound, whence Lat. mac-ula, a spot, orig. a bruise. See Fick. iii. 226, i. 737. And see Maculate, Mackerel.

MOLE (2), a small animal that burrows. (E.) Mole is merely a shortened form of the older name moldwarp. Shak, has both forms, viz. mole, Temp. iv. 194; and moldwarp, 1 Hen. 1V, iii. 1. 149. Palsgrave has mole. Earlier, we find M. E. moldwerp, Wyclif, Levit. xi. 30. B. The sense is 'the animal that casts up mould or earth,' in allusion to mole-hills. From M. E. molde, mould; and werpen, to throw up, mod. E. to warp. See Mould and Warp. So also Du. mol, 'a mole or want' (Hexham; cf. prov. E. wont, a mole); from O. Du. molworp (Kilian). So also Icel. moldvarpa, a mole, similarly formed. Der. mole-hill, Cor. v. 3. 30.

MOLE (3), a breakwater. (F., - L.) 'Mole or peer' [pier]; Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - F. mole, 'a peer, a bank, or causey on the sea-side; 'Cot. - Lat. molem, acc. of moles, a great heap, vast Der. From Lat. moles we also pile. A word of doubtful origin.

have molecule, q. v., molest, q. v., and e-mol-u-ment.

MOLECULE, an atom, small particle. (L.) Formerly written molecula. 'Molecula, in physicks, a little mass or part of anything; Bailey's Dict. vol. ii. ed. 1751. A coined word; formed with double dimin. suffix -c-ul- (in imitation of particula, a particle) from Lat. moles, a heap. A Roman would have said molicula. See Mole (3). Der. molecul-ar.

MOLEST, to disturb, annoy. (F., - L.) M. E. molesten, Chaucer, Troilus, b. iv. 1.880. - F. molester, 'to molest;' Cot. - Lat. molestare, to annoy. - Lat. molestus, adj., troublesome, burdensome. B. Formed (with suffix -tus = Aryan -ta) from a stem moles-, which again is from moli-, crude form of moles, a heap. See Mole (3). Der. molest-er, molest-at-ion, Oth. ii. 1. 16.

MOLLIFY, to soften. (F., - L.) In Isa. i. 6. (A. V.) 'It [borage] mollyfyeth the body;' Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 9. [The sb. mollification is in Chaucer, C. T. 16322.] - O. F. mollifier, 'to mollifie;' Cot. - Lat. mollificare, to soften. - Lat. molli, crude form of mollis, soft; and fic-, put for facere, to make. β. Lat. mollis is akin to Gk. μαλακόs, soft, and ὁμαλόs, tender; the lit. sense is 'ground to powder,' hence soft; from √MAL, weakened form of √MAR, to grind. See Mar. Der. mollificable, mollifier; also mollification, regularly formed from mollificatus, pp. of mollificates. And see moil, mollusc.

MOLLUSC, an invertebrate animal, with a soft fleshy body, as a snail. (F., -L.) Modern. Not in Todd's Johnson. - F. mollusque, a mollusc (Littré). - Lat. mollusea, a kind of nut with a soft shell, which some molluscs were supposed to resemble. — Lat. molluscus, softish; allied to mollescere, to become soft. — Lat. mollis, soft; see

β. Of uncertain a moment; Wyclif. 1 Cor. xv. 52. - F. moment, a moment, a minute, a jot of time; also moment, importance, weight; 'Cot. -Lat. momentum, a movement, hence an instant of time; also moving β. Put for mountum; formed with the common force, weight. suffix -ment- from mouere, to move; see Move. Der. moment-ar-y, Temp. i. 2. 202, from Lat. momentarius; moment-ar-i-ly, -ness; moment-an-y (obsolete), Mids. Nt. MONAD, a unit, &c. (L., -Gk.) The pl. monades was formerly used as synonymous with digits. 'Monades, a term in arithmetick, the same as digits;' Phillips, ed. 1706.—Lat. monad-, stem of monas, a unit. - Gk. μονάs, a unit. - Gk. μόνος, alone, sole. See MONARCHY, sole government, a kingdom. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) The word monarchy is much older than monarch in English. Sir David Lyndsay's book entitled 'The Monarche,' written in 1552, treats of monarchies, not of monarchs; see 1.1979 of the poem. M.E. monarchie, Gowen C. A. i. 27, l. 11. - F. monarchie, a monarchie, a kingdom; Cot. - Lat. monarchia. - Gk. μοναρχία, a kingdom. - Gk. μόναρχος, adj., ruling alone. - Gk. μον-, for μόνος, alone; and ἄρχειν, to be first. See Mono- and Arch-. Der. monarch, Hamlet, ii. 2. 270, from F. monarque = Lat. monarcha, from Gk. μονάρχης, a sovereign; monarch-al, Milton, P. L. ii. 428; monarch-ic, from F. monarchique (Cot.), Gk. μοναρχικόε; monarch-ic-al; monarch-ise, Rich. II, iii. 2. 165; monarch-ist.

MONASTERY, a house for monks, convent. (L., - Gk.) older word was minster, q.v. Sir T. More has monastery, Works, p. 135 e. Englished from Lat. monasterium, a minster. — Gk. μοναστήριον, a minster. - Gk. μοναστής, dwelling alone; hence, a monk. - Gk. μονάζειν, to be alone. - Gk. μονόε, alone. See Mono-. Der. From Gk. µovaorns we also have monast-ic, As You Like It, iii. 2. 441 = Gk. μοναστικόε, living in solitude; hence monast-ic-al, monastic-ism. Doublet, minster.

MONDAY, the second day of the week. (E.) M. E. monenday, Rob. of Glouc. p. 495, l. 13; later Moneday, Monday. - A. S. Mónan dæg, Monday; rubric to John, vii. 32. The lit. sense is 'day of the Moon.' - A. S. mónan, gen. of móna, the moon (a masc. sb. with gen. in -an); and dag, a day. See Moon and Day.

MONETARY, relating to money. (L.) Modern; not in Todd's Johnson. Imitated from Lat. monetarius, which properly means belonging to a mint, or a mint-master. - Lat. moneta, (1) a mint,

(2) money; see Money.

MONEY, current coin, wealth. (F., -L.) M. E. moneie; Chaumint, (2) money. See further under Mint (1). Der. money-bag, Merch. Ven. ii. 5. 18; money-ed, Merry Wives, iv. 4. 88; money-changer; money-less. Also monetary, q.v.

MONGER, a dealer, trader. (E.) Generally used in composition.

M. E. wol-monger, a wool-monger; Rob. of Glouc, p. 539, l. 20.

A. S. mangere, a dealer, merchant; the dat. case mangere occurs in Matt. xiii. 45. Formed with suffix -ere (=mod. E. -er) from mang-ian, to traffic, barter, gain by trading, Luke, xix. 15. Cf. mangung, merchandise, Matt. xxii. 5. \(\beta\). The form mangian is phonetically equivalent to mengan, in which the i is lost after a change of a to \(\epsilon\); and the derivation of mangian is the same as that of mengan, to mingle, already treated of under Mingle, q.v. But I may here further observe that mangian is 'to deal in a mixture of things,' i.e. in miscellaneous articles.—A.S. mang, a mixture, preserved in the forms ge-mang, ge-mong, a mixture, crowd, assembly, Grein, i. Mang may be taken as allied to manig, many; see Many. y. Similarly, Vigfusson derives the Icel. mangari, a monger, from manga, to trade, which again is from mang, barter, so named 'from traffic in mingled, miscellaneous things; as manga is used in Kormak, and even in a derived sense, it need not be borrowed from the A. S., but may be a genuine Norse word formed from margr [many] at a time when the n had not yet changed into an r' (for the Icel. margr stands for mangr).

8. Compare also Du. mangelen, to barter. The relationship to the Lat. mango, a dealer in slaves, is not clear; but the E. word does not appear to have been borrowed from it. Der. cheese-monger, fell-monger, fish-monger, iron-monger, &c.
MONGRELL, an animal of a mixed breed. (E.) In Macbeth, iii.

1. 93. Spelt mungrel, mungril in Levins, ed. 1570. The exact history of the word fails, for want of early quotations; but we may consider it as short for mong-er-el, with double dimin. suffixes as in cock-er-el, pick-er-el (a small pike), so that it was doubtless orig. applied to puppies and young animals.

B. As to the stem mong, applied to puppies and young animals.

B. As to the stem mong, applied to A.S. mangian*, old form of mengan, to mingle; cf. mong-er, a-mong, which are from the same A.S. base mang, a mixture. The sense is 'a small animal of mingled breed.'

MONITION, a warning, notice. (F., -L.) With a good Works, p. 1303 h. -Lat. monopolium. - Gk. μονοπώλιον, the right monicion; Sir T. Lumby, p. 73, 1. 6; monit-or-ship; monit-ress (with fem. suffix -ess = F. -esse, Lat. -issa, Gk. -ισσα); monit-or-i-al. And see Admonish. The doublet of monitor is MONK, a religious recluse. (L., - Gk.) M. E. monk, Chaucer, C. T. 165 .- A. S. munec, Grein, ii. 269; also munuc, Sweet's A. S. Reader. - Lat. monachus. - Gk. μοναχύε, adj. solitary; sb. a monk. Extended from Gk. μονόε, alone; see Mono-. Der. monk-ish; monk's-hood. Also (from Lat. monachus) monach-ism. And see monastery, minster.

MONKEY, an ape. (Ital., -L.) Spelt munkie in Levins, monkey, munkey, in Palsgrave; perhaps not found earlier. Corrupted from O. Ital. monicchio, 'a pugge, a munkie, an ape;' Florio, ed. 1598. Dimin. from O. Ital. mona, 'an ape, a munkie, a pug, a kitlin [kitten], a munkie-face; also a nickname for women, as we say gammer, goodie, good-wife such an one; 'Florio. He notes that mona is also spelt monna; cf. mod. Ital. monna, mistress, dame, ape, monkey (Meadows). Cf. also Span. mona, Port. mona, a she-monkey; Span. and Port. mono, a monkey. The order of ideas is: mistress, dame, old woman, monkey, by that degradation of meaning so common in all languages.

B. The orig. sense of Ital. monna was 'mistress,' and languages. it was used as a title; Scott introduces Mouna Paula as a character in the Fortunes of Nigel. As Diez remarks, it is a familiar corruption of madonna, i. e. my lady. hence, mistress or madam; see Madonna, Madam. ¶ The Span. and Port. mona were, apparently, borrowed from Italian; being feminine sbs., the masc. sb. mono was coined to accompany them.

MONO, prefix, single, solc. (Gk.) From Gk. μονό-, crude form of μονόs, single. Perhaps allied to Skt. manúk, adv., a little. Shortened to mon- in mon-arch, mon-ocular, mon-ody; see also mon-ad, mon-astery, mon-k.

Used by Ben Jonson, according to Richardson. -Lat. monogramma, a monogram. - Gk. μονογράμματον, a mark formed of one letter; neut. of μονογράμματος, consisting of one letter. = Gk. μονό-, sole; and γραμματ-, stem of γράμμα, a letter, from γράφειν, to grave, write. See Mono- and Grave (1). Der. So also mono-graph, a modern word, from Gk. γραφή, writing.

MONOLOGUE, a soliloquy. (F., -Gk.) Besides the chorus or monologues; Dryden, Essay of Dramatic Poesie. But Minsheu, ed. 1627, distinguishes between monologue, a sole talker, and monologie, 'a long tale of little matter.' - F. monologue, given by Cotgrave only in the sense 'one that loves to hear himselfe talke;' but, as in dia-logue, the last syllable was also used in the sense of 'speech.'-Gk. μονόλογοι, adj. speaking alone. – Gk. μονό-, alone; and λέγειν, to speak. See Mono- and Logic.

MONOMANIA, mania on a single subject. (Gk.) A coined word; from Mono- and Mania.

MONOPOLY, exclusive dealing in the sale of an article. (L., -Gk.) 'Monopolies were formerly so numerous in England that parliament petitioned against them, and many were abolished, about 1601-2. They were further suppressed by 21 Jas. I, 1624; Haydn, Dict. of Dates. 'Thou hast a monopoly thereof;' Sir T. More, and wwheir, to barter, sell, connected with weheer, to be in motion, to be busy; and this is perhaps to be further connected with κέλομα, I urge on, κέλλειν, to drive, from γ KAL, to drive. Der. monopolise, spelt monopolize in Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII, ed. Lumby, p. 147, 1. 33; a coined word, formed by analogy, since the O. F. word was simply monopoler (Cotgrave).

MONOSYLLABLE, a word of one syllable. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627; he makes it an adjective. Altered from F. monosyllabe, adj. 'of one syllable;' Cot.—Lat. monosyllabus, adj.— Gk. μονοσύλλαβοs, adj. of one syllable. See Mono- and Syllable.

Der. monosyllah-ic

MONOTONY, sameness of tone. (Gk.) Bailey, vol. ii. ed. 1731, gives it in the form monotonia. - Gk. μονοτονία, sameness of tone. - Gk. μονότονος, adj., of the same tone, monotonous. See Mono- and Tone. Der. monoton-ous, formed from Gk. μονότονος by change of -os into -ous; this is rare, but the change of Lat. -us into E. -ous (as in ardu-ous, &c.) is very common. Also monotone, a Hate term. Also monoton-ous-ly, ness.

MONSOON, a periodical wind. (Ital., - Malay, - Arab.) Spelt monson in Hackluyt's Voyages, ii. 278. Sir T. Herbert speaks of the monzoones; Travels, ed. 1665, pp. 409, 413. Ray speaks of the monsoons and trade-winds; On the Creation, pt. 1 (R.) It is not quite certain whence the word reached us, but monsoon agrees more closely with Ital. monsone than with Span. monzon, Port. monção, or F. mousson. [The Span. z is not sounded as E. z, but more as th.] -Malay musim, 'a season, monsoon, year:' cf. also awal musim, 'beginning of the season, setting in of the monsoon;' Marsden, Malay Dict. pp. 340, 24. - Arab. mawsim, a time, a season; Rich. p. 1643.

M. E. monstre, Chaucer, C. T. 11656. - F. monstre, 'a monster;' Cot. Lat. monstrum, a divine omen, portent, monster. To be resolved into mon-es-tru-m (with Aryan suffixes -as- and -tar, for which see Schleicher's Compendium) from mon-ere, to warn, lit. to make to think. — MAN, to think; see Man, Mind. Der. monstr-ous, formerly monstru-ous, as in Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. iv. met. 3. 1. 3502, from O. F. monstrueux, 'monstrous' (Cot.), which from Lat. monstruosus (also monstrous), monstrous; monstrous-ly, monstrousness; monstros-i-ty, spelt monstruosity, Troilus, iii. 2. 87. Also demonstrate, re-monstrate. Doublet, muster.

MONTH, the period of the moon's revolution. (E.) 28 days; afterwards so altered as to divide the year into 12 parts. M. E. moneth (of two syllables), Rob. of Glouc., p. 59, l. 16. Sometimes shortened to month. - A. S. monao, sometimes mono, a month; Grein, ii. 262; properly 'a lunation.'- A.S. mona, moon; see Moon. + Du. maand; from maan. + Icel. manuor, manaor, monoor, from máni. + Dan. maaned; from maane. + Swed. månad; from måne. + Goth. menoths; from mena.+ G. monat; from mond (O. H. G. máno). Der. monument-al, All's Well, iv. 3. 20.

MOOD (1), disposition of mind, temper. (E.) It is probable that the sense of the word has been influenced by confusion with mood (2), and with mode. The old sense is simply 'mind,' or sometimes 'wrath.' M. E. mood; 'aslaked was his mood' = his wrath was appeased; Chaucer, C. T. 1762. — A. S. mod, mind, feeling, heart (very common); Grein, ii. 257. + Du. moed, courage, heart, spirit, mind. + Icel. moor, wrath, moodiness. + Dan. and Swed. mod, courage, mettle. + Goth. mods, wrath. + G. muth, courage. β. All from a Teut. type MODA, courage, wrath; Fick, iii. 242. Cf. Gk. μέ-μα-α, I strive after, μῶμαι, I seek after. Perhaps from \checkmark MA, shorter form of \checkmark MAN, to think; see Mind. Der. mood-y, A. S. módig, Grein, ii. 260; mood-i-ly, mood-i-ness.

mode, in the particular sense of 'grammatical form of a verb.' Spelt mode in Palsgrave. 'Mood, or Mode, manner, measure, or rule. In Grammar there are 6 moods, well known; Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. See Mode. ¶ Perhaps it has often been confused with Mood (i); see Mood in Trench, Select Glossary.

mone, of two syllables; Chaucer, C. T. 9759. - A. S. mona, a masc. whilst the latter was due to nappe. sb.; Grein, ii. 262. + Du. maan. + Icel. máni, masc. sb. + Dan. mann. + Swed. måne, masc. + Goth. mena, masc. + G. mond. masc.; O. H. G. máno. + Lithuan. menu, masc. + Gk. μήνη. Cf. Skt. mása, a month, which Benfey refers to mánt, pres. pt. of má, to measure. ■ MA, to measure, as it is a chief measurer of time. See also Month. Der. moon-beam, moon-light, moon-shine; moon-calf, Temp. ii. 2. 111; moon-ish, As You Like It, iii. 2. 430.

MOOR (1), a heath, extensive waste ground. (E.) M. E. more, King Alisaunder, 6074. - A.S. mór, a moor, morass, bog; Grein, ii. 262. + Icel. mór, a moor, also peat. + O. Du. moer, 'mire, dirt, mud;' moerlandt, 'moorish land, or turfie land of which turfe is made;' Hexham. + Dan. mor. + M. H. G. muor, G. moor. $\beta$. An adjectival form, derived from this sb., occurs in O. Du. moerasch, later moeras, whence E. morass; see Morass. later moeras, whence E. morass; see Morass. γ . The account in Fick, iii. 224, is not satisfactory; it is plain that morass is an adjectival form from moor; and it would seem that the Icel. myrlendi, Swed. myra, a moorland, as well as the sense of Du. moer, link the word to mire and moss. If this be so, we must be careful to separate morass (allied to moor and moss) from the words marsh and marish (allied to mere). See Mire, Moss. Der. moor-ish, moorland, moor-cock; moor-hen, M. E. mor-hen, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, MOOR (2), to fasten a ship by cable and anchor. (Du.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627; Milton, P. L. i. 207. Like many sea-terms, it is borrowed from Dutch. — Du. marren, to tie, to moor a ship; O. Du. marren, maren, to bind, or tie knots (Hexham). The Du. marren also means to tarry, loiter, O. Du. marren, merren, to stay, retard (Hexham). Cognate with A. S. merran, whence the compound amerran, which signifies not only to mar, but also to hinder, obstruct; see Bosworth and Grein. Hence moor is a doublet of mar; see Mar. The successive senses are: to pound, mar, spoil, obstruct, fasten. Der. moor-ing, moor-age; and see marline.

MOOR (3), a native of North Africa. (F., -L., -Gk.) 'A Moore, or one of Mauritania, a blacke moore, or neger;' Minsheu, ed. 1627.

O. F. More, 'a Moor, Maurian, blackamore;' Cot. - Lat. Maurus. - Gk. Maῦροs, a Moor; see Smith's Class. Dict. β. Apparently the same word as Gk. μαῦρος, άμαυρός, dark; on which see Curtius, ii. 189. Der. Moor-ish; and see morris, morocco. Also black-a-moor, spelt blackamore, in Cotgrave, as above; a corruption of black moor in Minsheu, as above; also spelt blackmoor in Beaum. and Fletcher, Mons. Thomas, v. 2.

MOOSE, the American elk. (W. Indian.) The native West Indian name; 'Knisteneaux mouswah, Algonquin monse [mouse?], Mackenzie;' cited in Mahn's Webster.

MOOT, to discuss or argue a case. (E.) Little used, except in the phr. 'a moot point.' 'To moote, a tearme vsed in the innes of the Court, it is the handling of a case, as in the Vniuersitie, their disputations, problemes, sophismes, and such other like acts; 'Minsheu, ed. 1627. The true sense is 'to discuss in or at a meeting,' and the verb is unoriginal, being due to A. S. mót, M. E. mote, later moot, an assembly or meeting, whence also moot-hall, i. e. a hall of assembly, occurring in P. Plowman, B. iv. 135; cf. also ward-mote, i. e. meeting of a ward, id. prol. 94. M. E. motien, moten, to moot, discuss, also to cite, plead, P. Plowman, B. i. 174. — A. S. motian, to cite, summon (to an assembly or court); 'gif man . . . pane mannan mote' — if one summon (or cite) the man; Laws of Hlothhære, sect. 8; see Thorpe, Ancient Laws, i. 31. - A. S. mót, a meeting, an assembly; usually spelt gemot, a word familiar in the phrase witena gemot, an assembly of wise men, a parliament. + Icel. mot, a meeting, court of law. + M. H. G. muoz, moz, a meeting. β. From a Teutonic type MÔTA or MÔTI, Fick, iii. 242. Fick takes the δ to stand for an, as in gos for gans (goose); this gives an orig. form MAN-TA, which he thinks is 'obviously' from the MAN, to remain, which appears in Lat. man-ere, Gk. $\mu \epsilon \nu = 0$. Der. moot-able, moot-case, i. e. case for discussion; most-point, i.e. point for discussion; most-hall, a hall of assembly, law court. Also meet, q. v. ¶ Observe that meet is a mere derivative of moot, as shewn by the vowel-change; to derive moot from meet would involve an impossible inversion of

A. S. phonetic laws. MOP (1), an implement for washing floors, &c. (F., -L.?) Mr. Wedgwood says that, in a late edition of Florio's Ital. Dict., the word pannatore is explained by 'a maulkin, a map of rags or clouts to rub withal.' It is not in the 1st ed., 1598. Halliwell gives prov. E. mop, a napkin, as a Glouc. word.

B. Of uncertain origin; but E. mop, a napkin, as a Glouc. word.

β. Of uncertain origin; but most likely borrowed from O. F. mappe, a napkin, though this word is almost invariably corrupted to nappe.

See Nappe in Littré, who cites the spelling mappe as known in the 15th century, though the corrupt form with initial n was already known in the 13th century.

y. Owing to the rare occurrence of O. F. mappe, some suppose mop to be of Celtic origin; and, in fact, we find Welsh mop, mopa, a mop; Gael. moibeal, a besom, broom, mop, Irish moipal, a mop; but it is difficult to say to what extent these Celtic languages have borrowed from English.

8. It deserves to be added that if these words be Celtic, they are unconnected with Lat. mappa, because the latter is not of true Lat. origin, but borrowed from Carthaginian; see Map. Der.

MOP (2), a grimace; to grimace. (Du.) Obsolete. 'With mop and mow;' Temp. iv. 47. Also as a verbal sb.; 'mopping and mowing;' K. Lear, iv. 64. The verb to mop is the same as Mope, MOPE, to be dull or dispirited. (Du.) In Shak. Temp. v. 240. The same word as mop, to grimace; see Mop (2). Cf. in the mops, sulky; Halliwell. — Du. moppen, to pout; whence to grimace, or to sulk. Cf. prov. G. muffen, to sulk (Flügel). This verb to mop is a mere variant of to mock, and has a like imitative origin; see Mock.

MORAINE, a line of stones at the edges of a glacier. (F., = Teut.) Modern; well known from books of Swiss travel. - F. moraine, a moraine; Littré. Cf. Port. morraria, a ridge of shelves of sand, from morra, a great rock, a shelf of sand; Ital. mora, a pile ot sand, from morra, a great rock, a shell of sand; Ital. mora, a pile of rocks. (But not Span. moron, a hillock.)

Bavarian mur, sand and broken stones, fallen from rocks into a valley; Schmeller, Bayerisches Wörterbuch, col. 1642. Schmeller notes the name moraine as used by the peasants of Chamouni, according to Saussure.

7. The radical sense is 'mould' or 'crumbled material;' hence helten rocks, sand, &c.; cf. G. mürbe, coft O. H. G. murati sense helten rocks, sand, &c.; cf. G. mürbe, soft, O. H. G. muruwi, soft, brittle, A. S. mearu, tender. — MAR, to pound, bruise, crumble; whence also Lat. mola, a mill, E. meal, &c. See Mould (1), Meal.

MORAL, virtuous, excellent in conduct. (F., - L.) 'O moral Gower; Chaucer, Troilus, b. v, last stanza but one. - F. moral, morall; 'Cot. - Lat. moralis, relating to conduct. - Lat. mor-, stem of mos, a manner, custom. Root uncertain. Der. moral, sb., morals, sb. pl.; moral-er, i.e. one who moralises, Oth. ii. 3. 301; moral-ly; morale (a mod. word, borrowed from F. morale, morality, good conduct); moral-iss, As You Like It, ii. 1. 44; moral-iss; moral-i-ty, Meas. for Meas. i. 2. 138, from F. moralité, 'morality,'

Cot. From the same source, de-mure.

MORASS, a swamp, bog. (Du.) 'Morass, a moorish ground, a marsh, fen, or bog;' Phillips, ed. 1706. Todd says that P. Heyling, the same source, de-mure. in 1656, noted the word as being 'new and uncouth;' but he omits the reference. - Du. moeras, marsh, fen (Sewel). The older Du. form is moerasch, adj., 'moorish' (Hexham); from the sb. moer, 'mire, dirt, or mud' (id.) But this Du. moer also means a moor, since Hexham also gives 'moerlandt, moorish land, or turfie land of which turfe is made; and is plainly cognate with E. moor; see β. The suffix -as, older form -asch, is adjectival, and Moor (1). an older form of the common suffix -ish; it is due to the Aryan suffixes -as- and -ka- (for which see Schleicher, Compend. §§ 230, 231). It occurs again in various cognate words, viz. in G. morast (corrupted from morask), a morass; Swed. moras; Dan. morads (a The words marsh, marish, are to be referred to corrupt form). a different base, viz. to Mere (1).

MORBID, sickly, unhealthy. (F., -L.) 'Morbid (in painting), a term used of very fat flesh very strongly expressed;' Bailey's Dict., vol. ii. ed. 1731. - F. morbide, sometimes similarly used as a term in painting (Littré). - Lat. morbidus, sickly (which has determined the present sense of the E. word). - Lat. morbus, disease. Allied to mor-i, to die, mors, death; see Mortal. Der. morbid-ly, morbid-ness; also morbi-fic, causing disease, a coined word, from morbi- (= morbo-), crude form of morbus, and Lat. suffix -fic-us, due to facere, to make β. Prob. from the same (= Aryan -ta). = Lat. mordere, to bite. root as E. Smart, q.v. Der. mordaci-ous, little used, from the crude form mordaci-; mordaci-ous-ly.

MORDACKTY, sarcasm. (F.,-L.) Little used. It occurs in Cotgrave. - F. mordacité, 'mordacity, easie detraction, bitter tearms; Cot. - Lat. acc. mordacitatem, from nom. mordacitas, power to bite. -Lat. mordaci-, crude form of mordax, biting; with suffix -tas (= Aryan -ta). = Lat. mordere, to bite.

MORE, additional, greater. (E.) The mod. E. more does duty for two M. E. words which were, generally, well distinguished, viz. mo and more, the former relating to number, the latter to size.

1. M. E. mo, more in number, additional. 'Mo than thries ten' = more than thirty in number; Chaucer, C. T. 578.—A. S. má, both as adj. and adv., Grein, ii. 201. Thus 'bær byö wundra má' = there are wonders more in number, lit. more of wonders (Grein). This Both mappe and nappe are from Lat. mappa, a napkin; whence also A.S. má seems to have been originally an adverbial form; it is cog-Map and Napkin, the former being taken from the form mappe, and with G. mehr, more, Goth. mais, more, adv., Lat. magis, more.

more, larger in size, bigger; 'more and lesse' = greater and smaller, Chaucer, C. T. 6516. [The distinction between mo and more is not always observed in old authors, but very often it appears clearly enough.] - A. S. mara, greater, larger; Grein, ii. 212. Cognate with Icel. meiri, greater; Goth. maiza (stem maizan), greater. This is really a double comparative, with the additional comp. suffix -ra, the orig. base being MAG-YANS-RA; for the Aryan suffix -ra see Schleicher, Compend. § 233. It is therefore an extension of the former word. ¶ It deserves to be noted that some grammarians, perceiving that mo-re has one comparative suffix more than mo, have rushed to the conclusion that mo is a positive form. This is false; the positive forms are mickle, much, and (practically) many. Der. more-over.

MOST, the superl. form, answers to M.E. most, Chaucer, C.T. 2200, also spelt meste, maste, meste, in earlier authors (see Stratmann). = A. S. mæst, most; Grein, ii. 226. Cognate with Icel. mestr, G. meist, Goth. maists; from an orig. form MAG-YANS-TA, where -ta is a superl. suffix. See above.

MORGANATIC, used with reference to a marriage of a man with a woman of inferior rank. (Low Lat., -G.) 'When the left hand is given instead of the right, between a man of superior and a woman of inferior rank, in which it is stipulated that the latter and her children shall not inherit the rank or inherit the possessions of the former. The children are legitimate. Such marriages are frequently contracted in Germany by royalty and the higher nobility. Our George I. was thus married; Haydn, Dict. of Dates. - Low Lat. morganatica. Ducange explains that a man of rank contracting a morganatic marriage was said 'accipere uxorem ad morganaticam.'
This Lat. word was coined, with suffix -atica, from the G. morgen, morning, which was in this case understood as an abbreviation for M. H. G. morgengabe, morning-gift, a term used to denote the present which, according to the old usage, a husband used to make to his wife on the morning after the marriage-night. This G. morgen is cognate with E. morn; see Morn.

MORION, an open helmet, without visor. (F., - Span.) Spenser, Muiopotmos, l. 322. - F. morion, 'a murrian, or head-peece;' Cot. Cf. Span. morrion, Port. morrião, Ital. morione, a morion. The word is Spanish, if we may accept the very probable derivation of Span. morrion from morra, the crown of the head. The latter word has no cognate form in Ital. or Port. Cf. Span. morro, anything round; moron, a hillock. Perhaps from Basque murua, a hill, heap MORMONITE, one of a sect of the Latter-day Saints. (E.; but a pure invention). The Mormonites are the followers of Joseph Smith, called the prophet, who announced in 1823, at Palmyra, New York, that he had had a vision of the angel Moroni. In 1827 he said that he found the book of Mormon, written on gold plates in Egyptian characters;' Haydn, Dict. of Dates, q.v. We may call the word E., as used by English-speaking people; but it is really a pure invention.

Der. Mormon-ism.

MORN, the first part of the day. (E.) M. E. morn, a North E. form. 'On the morn' = on the morrow; Barbour's Bruce, i. 601; to-morn = to-morrow; id. i. 621. Morn and morrow are merely doublets; the former being contracted from M.E. morwen, and the latter standing for M.E. morwe, the same word with loss of final n. The form morwe is in Chaucer, C. T. 1492; the older form morwen is in the Ancren Riwle, p. 22, l. 16. - A. S. morgen, morn, morrow, Grein, ii. 264; whence morn by mere contraction, and morwen by the common change of g to w. + Du. morgen. + Icel. morginn, morgunn. + Dan. morgen. + Swed. morgon. + G. morgen. +Goth. maurgins. β. Fick compares Lithuan. merkit, to blink; iii.

243. Perhaps we shall not be wrong in referring these words to an extension of the

MAR, to glimmer, shine, appearing in Gk. μαρµalpew, to glitter, Lat. marmor, marble, Skt. marichi, a ray of light. That the original sense was 'dawn' is probable from the deriv. morn-ing, q. v. MORNING, dawn, morn. (E.)

M. E. morning, P. Plowman, B. prol. 5; contracted from the fuller form morwening, Chaucer, C.T. 1064. Morwening signifies 'a dawning,' or 'a becoming morn;' formed with the substantival (not participial) suffix -ing (A. S. -ung) from M. E. morwen = A.S. morgen, morn; see Morn. Der. morning-

MOROCCO, a fine kind of leather. (Morocco.) Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. Named from Morocco, in N. Africa; whence also F. maroquin, morocco leather. Der. moor (3), morris.

MOROSE, ill-tempered, gloomy, severe. (L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. See Trench, Select Gloss., who shews that the word was

The full form of the orig. base is MAG-YANS, formed with the Aryan compar. suffix -yans (Schleicher, Compend. § 232) from the base mag, great, MAG, to have power; see May (1).

Suse is obsolete. – Lat. morosus, self-willed; (1) in a good sense, scrupulous, fastidious, (2) in a bad sense, peevish, morose. – Lat. more, stem of mos, (1) self-will, (2) usage, custom that in Misshey ed 1627. MORPHIA, MORPHINE, the narcotic principle of opium. (Gk.) Modern; coined words from Gk. Morfheus (Μορφεύε), the god of sleep and dreams, lit. 'the shaper,' i. e. creator of shapes seen in dreams. - Gk. μορφή, a shape, form; prob. from Gk. μάρπτειν, to grasp, seize, clasp.

MORRIS, MORRIS-DANCE, an old dance on festive occasions. In Shak. Hen. V, ii. 4. 25. See Nares' Glossary. The dance was also called a morisco, as in Beaum. and Fletcher, Wild Goose Chase, v. 2. 7. A morris-dancer was also called a morisco, 2 Hen. VI, iii. 1. 365; and it is clear that the word meant 'Moorish dance,' though the reason for it is not quite certain, unless it was from the use of the tabor as an accompaniment to it. - Span. Morisco, Moorish. Formed with suffix -isco (= Lat. -iscus, E. -ish) from Span. Morro, a Moor; see Moor (3). ¶ We also find morris-pike, i. e. Moorish pike, Com. Errors, iv. 3. 38.

MORROW, morning, morn. (E.) A doublet of morn. From M. E. morwe by the change of final -we to -ow, as in arr-ow, sparr-ow, sorr-ow, &c. 'A morwe' = on the morrow, Chaucer, C. T. 824. Again, morwe is from the older morwen, by loss of final n; and moruen = mod. E. morn. See Morn. Der. to-morrow = A. S. to morgene, where t = 0 = mod. E. to; the sense is 'for the morrow;' see Grein, ii. 264.

MORSE, a walrus. (Russ.) Spelt morsse, Hackluyt's Voyages, 5 (margin). 'The tooth of a morse or sea-horse;' Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. iii. c. 23. § 5. A Russ. word; walruses being found in the White Sea, as described in Ohthere's Voyage. – Russ. morj', a walrus; where the j is sounded as French j. As another Russ. name for the walrus is morskaia korova, i.e. sea-cow, I suppose we may derive Russ. mori' from moré, the sea, cognate with E. Mere (1), q. v.

MORSEL, a mouthful, small piece. (F., -L.) M. E. morsel, Chaucer, C. T. 128. Also mossel, Rob. of Glouc. p. 342, l. 6; 'thys mossel bred' = this morsel of bread. [A certain kind of ordnance was also called a mortar, from its orig, resemblance in shape to the mortar for pounding substances in. This is a French word.] M. E. morter, P. Plowman, B. xiii. 44; King Alisaunder, l. 332.—A.S. mortere, a mortar; A.S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, i. 142. [Cf. O. Further allied to Russ. mokh, moss; Lat. muscus, moss; perhaps also to Gk. $\mu \delta \sigma \chi os$, a young, fresh shoot of a plant, a scion, sucker (though the last seems to me doubtful). \P We may note the E. use of moss in the sense of bog or soft moorland, as in Solway Moss, Chat Moss; this sense comes out again in E. mire, which is certainly related to moss, being cognate with O.H.G. mios; see Mire. Der. moss-land, moss-rose; moss-trooper, i. e. a trooper or bandit who rode over the mosses on the Scottish border; moss-ed, As You Like It, iv. 3. 105; moss-grown, 1 Hen. It is remarkable that there is a second form of the word, which can hardly be otherwise than closely related. This appears as A. S. maou, a maggot, bug; 'Cimex, maou,' Ælfric's Gloss, Nomina Insectorum, in Wright's Vocab. i. 24; cognate forms being Du. and G. made, a maggot, Goth. matha, a worm; also the dimin. forms Icel. mabkr, Dan. maddik, a maggot, whence is derived the prov. E. mauk, a maggot, discussed above in a note to Maggot, q. v. A late example of M. E. mathe, a maggot, occurs in Caxton's tr. of Reynard the Fox, ed. Arber, p. 69; 'a dede hare, full of mathes and wormes.' y. It is probable that both words mean 'a biter' or 'eater;' Fick refers A.S. madu to the root of E. mow, to cut grass. Der. moth-eaten, M. E. moth-eten, P. Plowman, B. x. 362.

MOTHER (1), a female parent. (E.) M. E. moder, Chaucer, C. T. 5261, where Tyrwhitt prints mother; but all the six MSS. of the Six-text ed. have moder or mooder, Group B. l. 841. [The M. E. spelling is almost invariably moder, and it is difficult to see how mother came to be the present standard form; perhaps it is due to Scand. influence, as the Icel. form has the th.]—A. S. moder, moder, módur; Grein, ii. 261. + Du. moeder. + Icel. módir. + Dan. and Swed. moder. + G. mutter, O.H.G. muotar. + Irish and Gael. mathair. + Russ. mate. + Lithuan. mote (Schleicher). + Lat. mater. + Gk. μήτηρ. + Skt. mátá, mátri. β. All formed with Aryan suffix-tar (denoting the agent) from MA, orig. to measure; cf. Skt. má, to measure. It is not certain in what sense má is here to be taken; but most likely in the sense to 'regulate' or 'manage;' in which case the mother may be regarded as 'manager' of the household. Some explain it as 'producer,' but there is little evidence for such a sense. Der. mother-ly, mother-li-ness, mother-hood, mother-less.

MOTHER (2), the hysterical passion. (E.) In K. Lear, ii. 4. 56. Spelt moder in Palsgrave; the same word as the above. So also Du. moeder means 'mother, womb, hysterical passion;' cf. G. mutterbeschwerung, mother-fit, hysterical passion; mutterkolik, hysterical MOTHER (3), lees, sediment. (E.) 'As touching the mother or lees of oile oliue; 'Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xxiii. c. 3. It is prob. an E. word, though there is no early authority for it. The form should really be mudder, as it is nothing but an extension of the word Mud, q. v. But it has been confused with M. E. moder, a mother, and the very common word has affected the very rare one. B. This phenomenon is not confined to English. Cf. O. Du. modder, mudd or mire in which swine and hoggs wallow' (Hexham); whence O. Du. modder, moeyer, ofte grondl-sop, the lees, dreggs, or the mother of wine or beere; 'id. But in mod Du. we have moer signifying both sediment or dregs, also a matrix or female screw, by a confusion of moer (short for modder) with moer (short for moeder). y. So again, G. moder, mud, mould, mouldering decay (whence moderig, mouldy, exactly like prov. E. mothery, mouldy) also appears as mutter, mother, sediment in wine or other liquids. Der. mother-y.

MOTION, movement. (F., - L.) 'Of that mocyon his cardynalles were sore abashed;' Berners, tr. of Froissart, vol. i. c. 326. -F. motion, omitted in Cotgrave, but used by Froissart in this very passage, as quoted by Littre. - Lat. motionem, acc. of motio, a movement.—Lat. motus, pp. of mouere, to move; see Move. Der. motion-less, Hen. V, iv. 2. 50.

MOTIVE, an inducement. (F.,—L.) Properly an adj., but first introduced as a. ab. M. E. motif, a motive, Chaucer, C. T. 5048, 9365.—O. F. motif, a motive, a moving reason; Cot.—Low Lat. motium, a motive; found A. D. 1452; but certainly earlier.—Low Lat. moliuus, moving, animating; found a. D. 1369. Formed with Lat. suffix -iuus from mot-, stem of motus, pp. of mouere; see Move. Der. motiv-i-ty (modern). Also motor, i. e. a mover, Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. ii. c. 2. § 2, borrowed from Lat. motor, a mover. MOTLEY, of different colours. (F., -G.) M. E. mottelee, Chaucer, C. T. 273. So called because spotted; orig. applied to curdled milk, &c. = O. F. mattelé, 'clotted, knotted, curdled, or curd-like;' Cot. Cf. O. F. mattonné, in the expression ciel mattonné, 'a curdled [i. e. mottled] skie, or a skie full of small curdled clowds;' id. The MOST, greatest; see under More.

MOST, greatest; see under More.

MOTE, a particle of dust, speck, spot. (E.) M. E. mot, mote; Chaucer has the pl. motes, C. T. 6450. — A. S. mot, Matt. vii. 3.

O. F. mattelé answers to a pp. of a verb matteler*, representing an O. H. G. matteln*, a frequentative verb regularly formed from Bavarian matte, curds; Schmeller's Bayerisches Wörterbuch, col. 1685. O. F. mattele answers to a pp. of a verb matteler *, representing an O. H. G. matteln *, a frequentative verb regularly formed from Bava-Root unknown. Der. mottled, Drayton, Muses' Elysium, Nymph. 6 (R.); this is a mere translation of O.F. mattelé, with E. -ed for mountain. - Low Lat. montanea, montana, a mountain; Ducange. -

MOTTO, a sentence added to a device. (Ital.,-L.) Per. ii. 2, 38.—Ital. motto, 'a word, a mot, a saying, a posie or briefe in any shield, ring, or emprese' [device]; Florio.—Lat. muttum, a mutter, a grunt, a muttered sound; cf. mutire, muttire, to mutter, mumble. Formed from \(\sqrt{MU}\), to make a low sound; cf. Gk. μῦ, a muttered sound. See Mutter. Der. mot-et.

MOULD (1), earth, soil, crumbling ground. (E) M. E. molde, P. Plowman, B. prol. 67, iii. 80.—A. S. molde, dust, soil, earth, country; Grein, ii. 261. + Du. mul, dust, dirt, refuse; cf. molm, mould, + Icel. mold, mould, earth. + Dan. muld. + Swed. mull (for muld). + Goth. mulda, dust; Mk. vii. 11. + G. mull; prov. G. molt, molten, garden mould (Flügel).

$\begin{align*} \beta & \text{Minull} & \text{Fig. mull} & \text{From a Teut. type} \end{align*} molten, garden mould (Flügel). β. All from a Teut. type MOLDA, Fick, iii. 235.— MAL, to grind, bruise, crumble; see Meal (1). Der. mould-warp, the old name for a mole (see mole); mould-y, mould-i-ness; also mould-er, a frequentative verb, 'to crumble often,' hence, to decay, cf. in the mouldering of earth in frosts and sunne, Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 337.

MOULD (2), a model, pattern, form, fashion. (F.,-L.) molde, P. Plowman, B. xi. 341. Formed (with excrescent d, like the d after l in boul-d-er) from O. F. molle, mole, mod. F. moule, a mould. Littré gives molle as the spelling of the 14th century; a still earlier form was modle, in the 13th cent. - Lat. modulum, acc. of modulus, a measure, standard, size. See Model. ¶ It is far more likely that M. E. molde is from the form molle than from modle, whence it might, however, have been formed by transposition. But the Span. molde, on the other hand, is from modulus, by transposition. Der. mod-el, a dimin. form. Also mould, vb., Mids. Nt. Dr. iii. 2. 211; mould-er, mould-ing.

MOULT, to cast feathers, as birds do. (L.) The l is intrusive, just as in fault from M. E. faute; see Fault. M. E. mouten; 'his haire moutes,' i. e. falls off, l'ricke of Conscience, l. 781. 'Moutyn, as fowlys, Plumeo, deplumeo; 'I'rompt. l'arv. 'Mowter, moulter, quando auium pennæ decidunt;' Gouldman, cited by Way to illustrate 'Mowtare, or moutard [i. c. moulter, moulting bird], byrde, Plutor;
Prompt. Parv. - Lat. mutare, to change; whence F. muer, to moult; see Mew (3). So also O. II. G. muzon, to moult, is merely borrowed from Lat. mutare; now spelt mausen in mod. G. Der. moulting; also mews; and see mutable.

MOUND, an earthen defence, a hillock. (E.) 'Compast with a mound;' Spenser, F. Q. ii. 7. 56. The sense of 'hillock' is due to confusion with the commoner word mount; but the two words are not at all nearly connected, though possibly from the same root. The older sense of mound was 'protection,' and it was even used of a body-guard or band of soldiers. M.E. mound, a protection, guard. Sir Jakes de Seint Poul herde how it was, Sixtene hundred of horsmen assemblede o the gras; He wende toward Bruges pas pur pas, With swithe gret mounde' = Sir J. de S. P. heard how it was, he assembled 1600 horsemen on the grass; He went towards B. step by step, with a very great body of men; Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 189; -A. S. mund, protection, chiefly used as a law-term; see Bosworth. Grein, ii. 268, gives mund (1) the hand, (2) protection. We may note also the comp. mund-beorg, lit. a protecting mountain, as giving something of the sense of the mod. E. mound. + O. Fries. mund, mond, a protector, guardian. + O. H. G. munt, a protection, protector, hand; whence G. vormund, a guardian.

B. The sense of protection' is more radical than that of 'hand,' and should be put first; the contrary order is due to a supposed connection with Lat. manus, which I hold to be a mistake. y. Fick (iii. 231) gives the Teutonic type as MONDI; and refers it to MAN, to jut out, as seen in Lat. e-min-ere, to jut out. This I believe to be right, as we may fairly deduce both promontory and mount from the same root as mound. The successive senses seem to be 'jutting out,' mountain,' protection, 'hand.' See Mount.

MOUNT (1), a hill, rising ground. (L.) M. E. munt, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, i. 11, l. 14. - A. S. munt, Grein, ii. 269. [Immediately from Latin, not through the F. mont.] - Lat. montem, acc. of mons, a mountain; stem mon-ti-. Formed (with suffix -ta) from ✓ MAN, to project, seen in Lat. e-min-ere, to jut out; cf. E. promont-or-y. See Eminent, and Menace. Der. mount-ain, q.v.;

MOUNT (2), to ascend. (F.,-L.) M. E. mounten, P. Plowman, B. prol. 67; older form monten, King Alisaunder, 784. - F. monter, 'to mount;' Cot. - F. mont, a mountain, hill. [The verb is due to the use of the O. F. adverb a mont, up-hill; so also the adv. a val, down-hill, produced F. avaler, to swallow, and avalanche.] - Lat. montem, acc. of mons, a hill. See Mount (1). Der. mount-er, mount-ing; also mount-e-bank, q. v. Also a-mount, q. v. M. E. montaine, MOUNTAIN, a hill. (F., -L.) In early use. M. E. montaine, Layamon, l. 1282. - O. F. montaigne, montaine; mod. F. montagne, a mo-th.

Lat. montana, neut. pl., mountainous regions; from montanus, adj., hilly.—Lat. mont., stem of mons, a mountain. See Mount (1).

Der. mountain-ous, Cor. ii. 3. 127, from O. F. montaigneux, 'mountainous,' Cot.; mountain-eer, Temp. iii. 3. 44, with suffix -eer F. ier.

MOUNTEBANK, a charlatan, quack doctor. (Ital., -L. and G.) Lit. one who mounts on a bench, to proclaim his nostrums. See Trench, Select Glossary. In Shak. Hamlet, iv. 7. 142. 'Fellows, to mount a bank! Did your instructor In the dear tongues, never discourse to you Of the Italian mountebanks? Ben Jonson, Volpone, i. 2 (Sir Politick). — Ital. montambanco, a mountebank; O. Ital. monta in banco, 'a mountibanke,' montar' in banco, 'to plaie the mountibanke; Florio. β Hence the e stands for older i, which is short for in; the mod. Ital. must be divided monta-m-banco, where -m- (put for in) has become m before the following b. - Ital. montare, to mount, cognate with F. monter, to mount; in = Lat. in, in, on; and Ital. banco, from O. H. G. banc, a bench, money-table. See Mount (2), In, and Bank (2).

MOURN, to grieve, be sad. (E.) M. E. murnen, mournen, mornen; Chaucer, C. T. 3704. – A. S. murnan, to grieve; Grein, ii. 269. Also meornan, id. ii. 240. + Icel. morna. + Goth. maurnan. + O.H.G. mornen.

B. The Goth. -n- before -an is a mere suffix, giving the verb an intransitive character, and as au is from older u, the base is simply MUR, to make a low moaning sound, which occurs also (reduplicated) in Murmur, q. v. This is accurately preserved in G. murren, 'to murmur, mutter, grumble, growl, snarl; Icel. murra, to murmur. Der. mourn-ful, Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 54; mourn-ful-ly, mourn-ful-ness; mourn-ing, sb., A. S. murnung.

MOUSE, a small rodent quadruped. (E.) M. E. mous (without Ferarum; Wright's Vocab. i. 23, col. 1. The pl. is m/s, by vowel-change; whence E. mice. + Du. muis. + Icel. m/us, pl. m/ss. + Dan. change; whence E. mues. + Du. muss. + 1021. muss. + 1021. muss. + Swed. muss. + G. maus. + Russ. muish. + Lat. mus. + Gk. μνε. + Pers. mush; Rich. Dict. p. 1325. + Skt. mush., a rat, a mouse.

β. The sense is 'the stealing animal.' - MUS, to steal; whence Skt. mush, to steal, mush, a stealer.

Der. mouse, vb., Macb. ii. 4, 13, mous-er; mouse-ear, a plant, mouse-tail, a plant. Also muscle. (But not tit-mouse.)

MOUSTACHE, MUSTACHE, the hair on the upper lip.

MOUTH, the aperture between the lips, an aperture, orifice, outlet. (E.) M. E. mouth, Chaucer, C. T. 153. - A. S. mút, Grein, ii. 266.+Du. mond. + Icel. munnr (for mundr). + Dan. mund. + Swed. mun. + Goth. munths.

B. Fick gives the Teutonic type as MONTHA; iii. 231. The proposed connection with Lat. mentum, the chin, seems doubtful. Der. mouth, vb., Hamlet, iv. 2. 20; mouth-ful, Pericles, ii. 1. 35; mouth-piece.

MOVE, to set in motion, stir, impel. (F., -L.) M. E. mouen, moeuen, meuen; P. Plowman, B. xvii. 194 (where all three spellings occur in the MSS. The u is written for v; the form meuen is common.) Also in Chaucer, Assembly of Foules, l. 150. - O. F. movoir, mod. F. movoir. - Lat. movere, to move; pp. motus. -MU, to push; whence also Skt. miv, to push (with pp. muta, moved, corresponding to Lat. motus; also Gk. ἀμεύομαι, Doric form of dueisouau, I change, change place. Der. mov-er, Chaucer, C. T. 2989; mov-able, of which the M. E. form was meble or moeble, P. Plowman, B. iii. 267, borrowed from F. meuble, Lat. mobilis, movable; mov-abl-y, mov-able-ness; move-ment, Gower, C. A. iii. 107, 1. 12, from O. F. movement (Burguy); mov-ing, mov-ing-ly. Also mobile, from Lat. mobilis, moveable, often contracted to mob; see Mob. Also mot-ion, q.v., mot-ive, q.v., mot-or; from Lat. pp. motus. Also mo-ment, com-mot-ion, e-mot-ion, pro-mote, re-mote, re-move.

MOW (1), to cut down with a scythe. (E.) M. E. mowen; 'Mowe other mowen' (other MSS. mowwen), i. e. mow (hay) or stack (in a mow); P. Plowman, C. vi. 14. The old pt. t. was mew, still common in Cambridgeshire; see Layamon, 1942. — A. S. máwan, Grein, ii. 213. (The vowel-change from A. S. á to E. o is persectly regular; cf. stán, stone, bán, bone.) + Dv. maaijer. + Dan. meie. + G. mähen, O. H. G. májan, mán.
β. All from a base MA, to mow, reap; whence also Gk. d-μά-ω, I reap, Lat. me-t-ere, to reap.

Der. mow-er, mow-ing; also mea-d, mea-d-ow, ofter-ma-th, and (perhaps)

MOW (2), a heap, pile of hay or corn. (E.) M. E. mowe; 'mowe' to pollute, render turbid, whence Gk. μαίνειν (= μιf-αν-γειν), to of scheues' = heap of sheaves, given as a various reading in Wyclif, Ruth iii. 7 (later text). — A. S. múga, a mow, Exod. xxii. 6, where the Vulgate has accruus frugum. + Icel. múga, múgi, a swathe in mowing, also a c owd of people, a mob.

A. S. g to M. E. w is common; so also in M. E. morwe (morrow) from A. S. morgen.

MOW (3), a grimace; obsolete. (F., -O. Du.) 'With mop and mow;' Temp. iv. 47. 'Mopping and mowing;' K. Lear, iv. 1. 64. 'With mop and 'I mowe, I mocke one; he useth to mocke and mowe; Palsgrave. -F. move, 'a moe, or mouth, an ill-favoured extension or thrus ing out of the lips;' Cot. - O. Du. mouwe, the protruded underlip; see Oudemans, who cites the phrase maken die monue = to make a grimace, deride, in two passages. Cf. O. Du. mocken, or moelen, to move ones cheeks in chawing; Hexham. Allied to Mock, q. v.

word mot, its companion, is also Dutch; see Mop (2).

MUCH, great in quantity. (Scand.) M. E. moche, muche, miche.

Formerly also used with respect of size. 'A moche man' = a tall man; P. Plowman, B. viii. 70; where one MS. reads mykil. 'Moche and lite' = great and small; Chaucer, C. T. 496 (Six-text, A. 494), where other MSS, have muche, miche, meche. β. When we compare M. E. miche, moche, muche, with the c rresponding forms michel, mochel, muchel, all variants of michel or mickle (A. S. mycel, micel), we see at once that the mod. E. much and mickle only differ by the suffix at the end of the latter. Muche occurs in Layamon, 10350; but not in A. S. - Icel. mjök, adv., much. Much answers to Gk. μέγαs just as mickle does to Gk. μεγάλου*, appearing in the fem. form μεγάλη. See further under Mickle. And see More, Most. ¶ Just as we have both much and mickle, we find A. S. lyt and lytel; see Little.

MUCILAGE, a slimy substance, gum. (F., -L.) Richardson cites the word from Bacon's Philosophical Remains. The adj. nucilaginous is in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - F. mucilage, 'slime, clammy sap, glewy juice; 'Cot. - Lat. mucilago (stem mucilagin-), mouldy moisture; not in White's Lat. Dict., but used by Theodorus Priscianus (iv. 1), a physician of the 4th century. Extended from mucilus*, an adj. formed from mucus; see Mucus. Der. mucilagin-ous (from the stem).

MUCK, filth, dung, dirt. (Scand.) M. E. muck; spelt muck, Gower, C. A. ii. 290, l. 3; muc, Genesis and Exodus, ed. Morris, 2557. (Stratmann also refers to Havelok, 2301, but the ref. is wrong.) - Icel. myki, dung; whence myki-reka, a muck-rake, dungshovel; cf. moka, to shovel dung out of a stable. + Dan. mög, dung. Cf. Swed. mocka, to throw dung out of a stable, like prov. E. to muck out.' Not allied to A. S. meox, dung, whence prov. E. mixen, a dung-heap, which seems to go with A. S. migan, Icel. miga, the same as Lat. mingere, Ski. mih. See Mist. Der. muck-y, mucki-ness; muck-heap, muck-rake (Bunyan's Pilg. Progress).

MUCK, AMUCK, a term applied to malicious rage. (Malay.) Only in the phrase 'to run amuck;' the word has been absurdly turned into a muck. Dryden goes further, and inserts an adjective between muck and the supposed article! 'And runs an Indian muck at all he meets; 'Hind and Panther, iii. 1188. To run amuck is to run about in a mad rage. - Malay ámuk, engaging furiously in battle, attacking with desperate resolution, rushing in a state of frenzy to the commission of indiscriminate murder, running amuck. It is applied to any animal in a state of vicious rage; 'Marsden, Malay Dict, p. 16.

MUCUS, slimy fluid. (L.) The adj. mucous is in older use, the sb. being modern. Sir T. Browne says the chameleon's tongue has 'a mucous and slimy extremity;' Vulg. Errors, b. iii. c. 21. § 7.— Lat. mucus, muccus, slime from the nose; whence the adj. mucosus, Englished by mucous. + Gk. μῦκος, a rare word, allied to μῦξα, the discharge from the nose, μύκης, snuff of a wick; cf. Gk. ἀπομύσσειν (= ἀπομίκ-γείν), to wipe the nose; Lat. mungere. — MUK, to cast away; appearing in Skt. much. to let loose, dismiss, cast, effuse; muk-taka, a missile weapon; Fick, i. 727. Der. muc-ous; and see mucilage, match (2).

MUD, wet, soft earth, mire. (O. Low G.) M. E. mud; the dat. mudde occurs in Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 407; see Spec. of Eng., ed. Morris and Skeat, p. 156, l. 407. Not found in A.S. Of Old Low G. origin. — O. Low G. mudde, mud; whence the adj. muddig, muddy, Bremen Wörterbuch; cf. O. Swed. modd, mud (Ihre). Commoner in an extended form; cf. Du. modder, mud, Swed. modder, β. The mother, lees of wine; Dan. mudder, mud; see Mother (3). cognate High German form is found in the Bavarian mott, peat, already mentioned as the origin of E. moat; see Moat. This establishes it as a Teut. word.

y. Prob. further related to Icel. móbr, muddy snowbanks, heaps of snow and ice; to Icel. móba, (1) a large river, (2) mud, as in 'af leiri ok af móbu' = of earth and mud; and to Icel. mob, refuse of hay.

8. The form of the root appears to be MU, mysla, to grow musty, allied to Swed. migel, mould, mouldiness.

bill, as geese and ducks do; also, to make tipsy and unfit for business; Kersey, ed. 1715. A frequentative verb, formed with the usual suffix -le, from the sb. mud. Thus to mudd-le is to go often in mud, to dabble in mud; hence, to render water turbid, and, generally, to confuse. Similarly, Dan. muddre, to stir up mud in water, said of a ship, from Dan. mudder, mud. (The G. muddern has the same sense, but is merely borrowed from Low G, or Danish.)

MUEZZIN, a Mohammedan crier of the hour of prayer. (Arab.) Spelt muezin in Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1665, p. 339. - Arab. mu-zin, mu-azzin, 'the public crier, who assembles people to prayers by proclamation from a n-inaret;' Rich. Dict. p. 1523; mu'azzin, 'the crier of a mosque;' Palmer's Pers. Dict. col. 617. Connected with Arab. azan, the call to prayers, Palmer, col. 17; uzn, the ear, Rich. p. 48, Palmer, col. 17; azina, he listened, Rich. p. 48. MUFF (1), a warm, soft cover for the hands. (Scand.) muffe in Minsheu, ed. 1627. Of Scand. origin. — O. Swed. muff, a muff (Ihre); Dan. muffe. + Du. mof, a muff; O. Du. mouwe, a sleeve (Hexham). + G. muff, a muff; M. H. G. mouwe, mowe, a sleeve, esp. a wide-hanging woman's s'eeve (Wackernagel). + O. Fries. mowe, a hanging sleeve; Low G. moue, a sleeve (Bremen Wörterbuch).

β. The old sense is 'a sleeve,' esp. a long hanging sleeve such as was worn by women, in which the hands could be wrapped in cold weather. Fick gives the Teut. type as MOWA, a sleeve, iii. 225; and cites Lithuan. uż-mowù, a muss, derived from Lith. mauti, to strip, whence uż-mauti, to strip up, tuck up; see Nesselmann, p. 389.

y. He further compares Lith. mauti with Lat. moure, If this be right, the word is derived from the verb which to move. appears in E. as move; sec Move. Lut the connection is hard to perceive. Der. muff-le, q. v.

MUFF (2), a silly fellow, simpleton. (E.) A prov. E. word, of imitative origin. It simply means 'a mumbler' or indistinct speaker. Cf. prov. E. muff, muffle, to mumble (Halliwell); muffle, to do anything ineffectually; id. So also prov. E. muffle, to speak indistinctly, an old word, occurring in Richard the Redeles, ed. Skeat, iv. 63: 'And somme mafflid with the mouth, and nyst [knew not] what they mente. A muff knows not what he means. Cf. Du. muffen, to dote; prov. G. muffen, to be sulky (Flügel). See Mumble.

MUFFLE, to cover up warmly. (F., -O. Low G.) Levins, ed. 1570, gives: 'A mreffle, focale [i. e. a neck-cloth]; to muffle the face, velare; to muffle the mouth, obturare;' col. 184. 'I muffyll, je emmouffle; Palsgrave. Only the verb is now used, but it is derived from the sb. here given. — O. F. mofle, monfle (13th cent., Littré); the same as mouffle, which Cot. explains by 'a winter mittaine.'—O. Du. moffel, 'a muff, or muffe lined with furre;' Hexham. Cf. Norweg. muffel, a half-glove, mitten; Assen. B. It is clear that muff-le, sb., is a mere dimin. of muff, with the common Teut. dimin. suffix -el (-le). The Low Lat. muffula, a winter glove (whence F. moufle, Span. mufla), is a mere borrowing from Teutonic.

y. From the sb. muffle, and the numerous frequentative verbs ending in -le. See Muff (1).

B. To muffle a bell is to wrap a cloth round the clapper; a muffled peal is a peal rung with such bells, rung on the 31st of December. At midnight, the mufiles are taken off, and the New Year is rung in. Hence the phrase 'a muffled sound;' the sense of which approaches that of prov. E. muffle, to mumble, from a different source, as explained under Muff (2). Der. muffler, Merry Wives, iv. 2. 73.

MUFTI, an expounder of the law, magistrate. (Arab.) In Sir T. Herbert's Travels, ed. 1665, pp. 175, 285; spelt mufiti, Howell, Directions for Travels, ed. Arbert 1875, Arab. mufitiens for Travels.

Directions for Travel, ed. Arber, p. 85. - Arab. mufti, 'a magistrate (Palmer, col. 590); 'wise, one whose sentence has the authority of the law, an expounder of the Muhammedan law, the musti or head law-officer amongst the Turks; Rich. Dict. p. 1462. Connected with fatwa, 'a judicious or religious decree pronounced by a mufti, a judgment, sentence;' id. p. 1070. ¶ The phrase 'in mufti' means in civilian costume, as opposed to military dress.

MUG, a kind of cup for liquor. (C.) 'A mugge, potte, Ollula;'
Levins, 184. 24. Household utensils are sometimes Celtic, as noggin, piggin (sometimes shortened to pig); and the like. Probably of Celtic origin; cf. Irish mugan, a mug; mucog, a cup. B. On the other hand, a Swed. mugg, a mug, is given in the Tauchnitz Swed. β. On the Dict., but not in Widegren or Ihre; perhaps that also is of Celtic in Palsgrave. A.S. mucgwyrt, the Artemisia; see numerous examples of the word in Cockayne's A.S. Leechdoms, iii. 339. It plainly means 'midge-wort;' see Midge. Perhaps regarded as being good against midges; cf. flea-bane.

MULBERRY, the fruit of a certain tree. (Hybrid; L. and E.)

M. E. moolbery. Trevisa translates sycomoros by moolberyes, i. 11,

1. 4. Here the l, as is so often the case, stands for an older r; the A.S. name for the tree was mor-beam; see Cockayne's A.S. Leechdoms, iii. 339. 'Morus, vel rubus, mor-beam;' Ælfric's Gloss., doms, iii. 339. 'Morus, vel rubus, mor-beám;' Ælfric's Gloss., Nomina Arborum, in Wright's Vocab. i. 32, col. 2. [The A.S. beam, a tree, is mod E harm.] a tree, is mod. E. beam.] β . Berry is an E. word; mul = M. E. mool = A.S. mor. The A.S. mor- is from Lat. morus, a mulberrytree. The Gk. μῶρον, μόρον, a mulberry, μορέα, a mulberry-tree, are rather cognate than the orig. of the Lat. word.

γ. Root unknown. The G. maulbeere is similarly compounded, from Lat. morus and G. beere. See Sycamore. Der. murrey.

MULCT, a fine, penalty. (L.) Given as a sb. in Minsheu, ed. 1627. - Lat. mulcta, a fine, penalty; whence also O. F. multe (Cotgrave). The older and better Lat. form is multa. Root unknown.

MULE, the offspring of the horse and ass. (L.) M. E. mule, Rob. of Glouc. p. 189, l. 3.—A. S. mul; 'Mulus, mul,' Ælfric's Gloss., Nomina Ferarum, in Wright's Voc. i. 23.—Lat. mūlus.

β. The long u points to a loss of c; the word is cognate with Gk. μύκλοε, an ass, μύχλοε, a stallion ass; we also find μύκλα, μύκλοε, a black stripe on the neck and feet of the ass. Perhaps allied to Gk. μάχλοε, lewd. Der. mul-ish; mul-et-eer, spelt muleter in old edd. of Shakespeare, I Hen. VI, iii. 2. 68, from F. muletier, 'a muletor' (Cot.), which from F. mulet, 'a moyle, mulet, or great mule' (id.), formed with suffix -et from F. mule = Lat. mulum, acc. of mulus. Also mul-atto, one of mixed breed, the offspring of black and white parents, in Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1665, p. 116, from Span. mulato, by-form of muleto, a young mule, a mulatto, cognate with F. mulet.

MULLED, a term applied to sweetened ale or wine. (E.) rupted from mould, as will appear. From this term has been evolved the verb to mull, to sweeten ale or wine; but this is modern, and due to a total loss of the orig. sense of the word. The older term is mulled ale, a corruption of muld-ale, or mold-ale, lit. a funeral ale or banquet. [It must be remembered that M. E. ale meant a feast or banquet; see Bridal.] M.E. 'mold-ale, molde ale, Potacio funerosa vel funeralis; Prompt. Parv. p. 341; see the account of funeral entertainments in Brand's Popular Antiquities. Cf. Lowland Sc. mulde-mete, lit. mould-meat, a funeral banquet; Jamieson. For further proof that mulde = mould, cf. Lowland Sc. muldes, mools, pulverised earth, esp. the earth of the grave; mule, mool, to crumble; Jamieson. Note also Icel. mold, earth, pl. moldar, a funeral. See Mould. B. It is easy to see how the word took up a new sense, viz. by confusion with M. E. mullen, to break to powder, crumble (Prompt. Parv. p. 348), and the sb. mull, powder, the sense of which was transferred (as Way suggests) to the 'powdered condiments' which the ale contained, esp. grated spices, and the like.

C. It is remarkable that this confusion did not much affect the etymology; for the M.E. mull, powder, is only another form of mould, which is still spelt mull in Swedish.

MULLEIN, a kind of wild flower. (E.) The great mullein is Verbascum thapsus. Spelt mullein in Minsheu, ed. 1627. M.E. moleyn, Prompt. Parv. – A. S. moleyn, mullen; in Cockayne's A. S. Leechdoms, iii. 339; cf. Wright's Voc. i. 290, l. 34.

B. The suffix β. The suffix regn (=ign) is due to a combination of the Aryan suffixes -ka and -na. It occurs again in holegn, holly; and the prov. E. hollen or hollin (holly) is formed from holegn (with loss of g) just as mullein or mullen is formed from molegn. The weakening of g explains the i in the form mullein. Thus the word is certainly E., and the F. molène is borrowed from it. y. One kind of mullein is called moth-mullein (Verbascum blattaria, from blatta, a moth), from a notion that it was good against moths; cf. 'Herbe aux miles, mothmullein;' Cot. This renders very plausible the suggestion (in Diefenbach) of a derivation from the old Teutonic word preserved in Goth. malo, a moth (Matt. vi. 29), and in Dan. möl, a moth. Cf. G.

mottenkraut, moth-mullein (Wedgwood).

MULLET (1), a kind of fish. (F.,-L.) M. E. molet; 'Molet, fysche, Mullus;' Prompt. Parv. Older form mulet, occurring as a gloss to Lat. mulus in a list of fishes of the 12th cent.; see Wright's Vocab. i. 98, l. 1. - O. F. mulet, 'the mullet-fish;' Cot. Formed, with dimin. suffix -et, from Lat. mullus, late Lat. mulus, the red Root unknown.

We find also Dan. muggen, musty, mouldy, mugne, to grow musty. Eed. 1674. A term in heraldry.—O.F. molette, a rowel; 'molette Not improbably allied to Muck; cf. prov. E. moky, misty (Lincolnshire); Halliwell. Der. muggi-ness.

MUGWORT, the name of a wild flower. (E.) Spelt mogworte in Palsgrave. A.S. muggways the Attention of molla, 'a wheel of a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a specific search and a spe a clock that moueth all the rest,' id. Again, Ital. molla is another form of Ital. mola, 'a mill-stone, grinding-stone, wheel; id.—Lat. mola, a mill. See Molar, Mill. The transference of sense was from 'wheel of a water-mill' to any wheel, including the spur-rowel, which the mullet resembled. Perhaps the F. word was borrowed from the Ital. instead of directly from the Latin.

MULLION, an upright division between the lights of windows. (F.,-L.) A corruption of munnion, with the same sense, which is still in use in Dorsetshire; Halliwell. It occurs in some edd. of Florio; see below. - F. moignon, 'a stump, or the blunt end of a rioro; see below. = 1. morghon, a sump, or the blank thing; morghon des ailes, the stumps, or pinions of the wings; morghon du bras, the brawn, or brawny part of the arm; Cot. B. Hence munnion, just as O. F. troignon gives E. trunnion. Cf. O. Ital. mugnone, a carpenter's munnion or trunnion, Florio (as cited by Wedgwood); it is not in the ed. of 1598. As Wedgwood well observes, 'the mun-nion or mullion of a window is the stump of the division before it breaks off into the tracery of the window. It clearly took its name from the likeness to the stump of a lopped tree, which is one of the senses of F. moignon; see Littré. The word also occurs as Span. muñon, the brawn or muscle of the arm, the stump of an arm or leg cut off; Port. munhões, pl. of munhão, the trunnions of a gun. Further allied to Span. muñeca, the wrist, Port. munheca.

7. From O. F. moing, maimed (Diez, 4th ed. p. 725). Diez cites only the Breton mouñ, moñ, mutilated in the hand or arm. But Legonidec, in his Breton Dict., says that the forms mank, monk, and mons occur in the same sense; and it seems to me likely that the Bret. mank, clearly the oldest form, is cognate with Lat. mancus, maimed, mutilated. And when Diez rightly derives trunnion (O. F. troignon) from O. F. tronc (= Ital. tronco), we can hardly be wrong in connecting munnion (O. F. moignon) with Ital. monco, maimed, which of course is the Lat. mancus.

8. Whatever irregularities there may be in the one case are the same as in the other, with the exception of the vowel. But this need not prevent us from identifying Ital. monco with mancus, though the more usual form is manco. The fact is that the nasal n is apt to turn a into o, as in E. long, from A.S. lang, corresponding to which is Lat. longus. Tor the change from n to l, cf. Boulogne from Bononia, and Ital. alma from Lat. anima.

MULTANGULAR, having many angles. (L.) In Kersey, ed. 1715. - Lat. mult-, stem of multus, many; and angularis, angular. See Multitude and Angular. ¶ Similarly, multi-lateral, from multi = multo-, crude form of multus, and E. lateral, q. v. So also multi-form.

MULTIFARIOUS, manifold, diversified. (L.) Gloss., ed. 1674; he says it occurs in Bacon. Englished (by change of -us to -ous, as in ardu-ous, &c.) from Lat. multifarius, manifold, various. The orig. sense appears to be 'many-speaking,' i. e. speaking on many subjects. - Lat. multi- = multo-, crude form of multus, much; and -farius, prob. connected with fari, to speak. Cf. the rare word fariari, to speak. See Multitude and Fate.

MULTIPLE, repeated many times. (L.) In Kersey, ed. 1715.

A coined word, analogous to tri-ple, quadru-ple, &c., the suffix being due to the Lat. suffix -plex; see Multiply.

MULTIPLY, to increase many times, make more numerous.

(F.,-L.) M. E. multiplien, Chaucer, C. T. 16303. He also has multiplying, sb., C. T. 12308; and multiplication, C. T. 16317. — F. multiplier, 'to multiply;' Cot. - Lat. multiplicare, to render manifold. - Lat. multiplic-, stem of multiplex, manifold. - Lat. multi- = multo-, stem of multus, much; and the suffix -plex, answering to E. fold. See Multitude and Complex, Plait, Fold. Der. multiplic-and, from the fut. pass. part. multiplicandus; multiplic-at-ion, from F. multiplication = Lat. acc. multiplicationem; multiplic-at-ive; multipli-er; multiplic-i-ty, Drayton, The Mooncalf (R.)

MULTITUDE, a great number, a crowd. (F.,-L.) M. E. multitude, Gower, C. A. i. 220. - F. multitude, 'a multitude;' Cot.-Lat. multitudinem, acc. of multitudo, a multitude. Formed (with suffix -tudo) from multi- = multo-, crude form of multus, many, much. Root unknown. Der. multitudin-ous, Macb. ii. 2. 62, from the stem multitudin-.

MUM, an interjection, impressing silence. (E.) In Shak. Temp. iii. 2. 59. M, E. mom, mum, expressive of the least possible sound with the lips; P. Plowman, B. prol. 215; Lydgate, London Lyckpeny, st. 4, in Spec. of. Eng. ed. Skeat, p. 24. So also Lat. mu, Gk. $\mu \hat{\nu}$, the least sound made with the lips; Skt. man, to murmur. Evidently of imitative origin. Der. mum-ble; and see mummer.

Compare mew, murmur, mutter, myth.

MUMBLE, to speak indistinctly, to chew inefficiently. (E.) The b is excrescent, and due to emphasis; the final -le is the usual fre-MULLET (2), a five-pointed star. (F., -L.) In Blount's Gloss, L quentative ending. M. E. momelen, mamelen, to speak indistinctly or mommeten, G. mummen, to mutter, numble; similarly formed. Der. mumblen, mumbleng.

MUMMER, a masker, buffoon. (F., - Du.) 'That goeth a mummynge;' Tyndall, Works, p. 13, col. 2, l. 1. 'As though he came in in a mummary;' Sir T. More, Works, p. 975 b. 'Made prouysyon for a dysguysynge or a mummynge;' Fabyan's Chron. an. 1399-1400. 'Mommery, mommerie;' Palsgrave. This early use of the F. form mummery shews that we took the word through the French, though it was only a Dutch or Platted entered word. 'Gettere gives a Dutch or Platted entered word.' Gettere gives r. form mummery snews that we took the word through the French, though it was orig. a Dutch or Platt-deutsch word. Cotgrave gives, however, no verb; but this was easily developed.—O. F. mommeur, 'a mummer, one that goes a mumming;' also mommerie, 'a mummery, a mumming;' Cot.—O. Du. mommen, 'to goe a moming, or in a maske;' also mommerye, 'momming, or masking' (with F. suffix); Haybarn. He also gives mommers that 'to visual or a mommery; Hexham. He also gives mom-aensicht, 'a vizard, or a mommers vizard.' Cf. Low G. mummeln, bemummeln, to mask, mumme, a mask; Bremen Wörterbuch. (Hence G. vermummen, to mask.) origin is imitative, from the sound mum or mom, used by nurses to frighten children, like the E. bo! See Wedgwood, who refers to the habit of nurses who wish to frighten or amuse children, and for this purpose cover their faces and say mum! or bo! whence the notion of masking to give amusement. Cf. G. mummel, a bugbear. Thus the origin is much the same as in the case of mum, mumble; see Mum.

MUMMY, an embalmed human body. (F., - Ital., - Pers.) Formerly used of stuff derived from mummies. 'Mumy, Mummy, a thing like pitch sold by the apothecaries; . . one [kind] is digged out of the graves, in Arabia and Syria, of those bodies that were embalmed, and is called Arabian Mummy; Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. Mummy hath great force in stanching blood; Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 980. - O. F. mumie, 'mummy; man's flesh imbalmed; or rather the stuffe wherewith it hath been long imbalmed; 'Cot. - Ital. mummia (cf. Span. momia). - Pers. múmáyin, a mummy. - Pers. múm, móm, wax (much used in embalming); Rich. Dict. p. 1529.

MUMP, to mumble, sulk, whine, beg. (Du.) A numper was an old cant term for a beggar; and to nump was to beg, also to be sulky; see Narcs, ed. Halliwell and Wright. The original notion was to mumble, hence to mutter, be sulky, to beg; used derisively with various senses. 'How he mumps and bridles!' where the sense appears to be 'grimaces;' Beaum. and Fletcher, iii. 2 (Pedro). - Du. mompen, to mump, to cheat (Sewel). Cf. O. Du. mompelen, to mumble (Sewel); mommelen, mompelen, to mumble (Hexham). form mompelen is nothing but an emphasised form of mommelen, and mompen of mommen, to say mum, to mask. That is, mump is merely a strengthened form of the imitative word mum; see Mum, Mumble, Mummer. The curious Goth. verb bi-mamp-jan, to deride, mock at, Luke, xvi. 14, has a similar origin. Der. mump-er, mumpish (sullen); mumps, q. v.

MUMPS, a swelling of the glands of the neck. (Du.) This troublesome disease renders speaking and eating difficult, and gives the patient the appearance of being sullen or sulky. 'To have the mumps' or 'to be in the mumps' was, originally, to be sullen; the sense was easily transferred to the disease which gave such an appearance. It is derived from the verb Mump, q.v. We find mumps used as a term of derision. 'Not such another as I was, mumps!' Beaum. and Fletcher, Scornful Lady, v. 1 (Elder Loveless). 'Sick o' the mumps,' i. e. sulky; B. and F., Bonduca, i. 2 (Petillius), near the end.

MUNCH, to chew, masticate. (E.) In Macb. i. 3. 5 (where old edd. have mounch'd). M. E. monchen, Chaucer, Troil. i. 915. Monchanswers to an older form mank-, evidently an imitative word parallel to the base mam- in M. E. mamelen, to mumble; see Mumble. ¶ We cannot deduce it from F. manger, for phonetic reasons; yet it is quite possible that this common F. word may have helped to suggest the special sense. The F. manger is from Lat. manducare, to chew, extended from manducus, a glutton, which is from mandere, to chew; see Mandible. Der. munch-er.

MUNDANE, worldly. (F.,-L.) Taken from F., but now spelt as if from Latin. 'For followinge of his pleasaunce mondayne; Taken from F., but now Skelton, Book of Three Fooles, ed. Dyce, i. 205. - F. mondain, 'mundane; 'Cot. - Lat. mundanus, worldly. - Lat. mundus, the world (lit. order, like Gk. κόσμοι). - Lat. mundus, clean, adorned. - - MAND, MUNICIPAL, pertaining to a township or corporation. (F., – L.) In Cotgrave. – F. municipal, 'municipall;' Cot. – Lat. municipals, belonging to a municipium, i. e. a township which received the rights of Roman citizenship, whilst retaining its own laws. - Lat. municipi-, crude form of municeps, a free citizen, lit. one who takes office or undertakes duties. - Lat. muni- (see Munificence) and eapere, to take; see Capture. Der. municipal-i-ty.

weakly; P. Plowman, A. v. 21, B. v. 21. Formed with the frequent. & MUNIFICENCE, bounty, liberality. (F., = L.) Both munisuffix -el- from M. E. mom, a slight sound. See Mum. Cf. Du. ficence and munificent are in Minsheu, ed. 1627. The sb. is the more orig. word. = F. munificence; Cot. = Lat. munificentia, bounty, bountifulness. Formed as if from a pres. pt. munificent.*, from a verb munificere *; but the only related word found is the adj. munificus, bountiful, liberal, formed upon mun-, base of munus, a duty, a present, and facere, to make; so that muni-ficus = present-making.

B. For the verb facere, see Fact. The Lat. munus signifies orig. 'obligation;' from & MU, to bind, whence also E. munition, muniment, com-mon, com-mune, com-muni-c-ate, im-muni-ty, re-muner-ate. See below. Der. munificent, coined to suit the sb.; muni-ficent-ly.

MUNIMENT, a defence, a record of a claim, title-deed. (F., L.) In Shak. muniments means expedients or instruments; Cor. i. 1. 122. - F. muniment, 'a fortifying; also used in the sense of munition; Cot. - Lat. munimentum, a defence, safeguard. Formed with suffix -mentum from muni-re, to fortify, put for moenire, lit. to furnish with a wall. - Lat. moenta, neut. pl., ramparts, walls, defences. - ✓ MU, to bind, hence, to protect; cf. Skt. mu, mav, to bind. See munition.

MUNITION, materials used in war; also, a fortress. (F., -L.) In Isaiah, xxix. 7, xxxiii. 16; and in Shak. K. John, v. 2. 98.-F. munition, 'munition, store, provision, provant or victuals for an army;' Cot. - Lat. munitionem, acc. of munitio, a blockading, defending, securing. - Lat. munitus, pp. of munire, to fortify. See Muniment. Der. am-munition MUNNION, the older and correct form of Mullion, q. v. MURAL, belonging to a wall. (F., - L.) 'He [Manlius Capitolinus]... was honoured with a murall crown of gold; 'Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. vii. c. 28. – F. mural, 'murall, of or belonging to a wall; Cot.—Lat. muralis, mural.—Lat. murus, a wall; C. Lat. moerus, moirus.

β. Probably akin to moenia, walls; from \(MU, to bind; hence, to protect. See Muniment. Der. im-mure.
MURDER, MURTHER, wilful killing of another man. (E.)

M. E. mordre, morder; Chaucer, C. T. 15057. Also morthre, Rob. of Glouc. p. 560, l. 9. — A. S. mordor, mordur, Grein, ii. 263. 4 Goth. maurthr.

β. The word appears without a suffix in A. S. and O. Sax. mord, O. Friesic morth, mord, G. mord, Icel. mord, death, murder, cognate with Lat. mors (stem mort-), death; see Mortal. Der. murder, vb., M. E. mortheren, P. Plowman, B. xvii. 278; murder-er; murder-ess, spelt mordrice in Gower, C. A. i. 351, last line; murder-ous or murther-ous, Mach. ii. 3. 147; murder-ous-ly.

MURIATIC, briny, pertaining to brine. (L.) In Johnson. — Lat. muriaticus, pickled or lying in brine. — Lat. muria, salt liquor, β. Prob. related to Lat. mare, the sea; see brine, pickle.

MURICATED, prickly. (L.) 'Muricated, in botany, prickly, full of sharp points; 'Ash's Dict., ed. 1775.—Lat. muricatus, adj. of the form of a pp. formed from muric-, stem of mures, a fish having sharp prickles, also, a sharp pointed stone, a spike. Root unknown. MURKY, MIRKY, dark, obscure, gloomy. (E.) The y is a modern addition. 'Hell is murky;' Macb. v. I. 41. M. E. mirke, merke. 'The merke dale;' P. Plowman, B. i. I. 'The mirke nith' [night]; Havelok, 404.—A. S. murc, myrce, mirce, murky, dark; Grein, ii. 269, 271. + O. Sax. mirki, dark. + Icel. myrkr. + Dan. and Swed. mörk.

B. The form of the word, according to Fick, iii. 234, is such as to remind us of Lithuan. margas, striped, variegated, which is certainly related to E. mark; in which case, the orig. sense was covered with marks, streaky, parti-coloured. See Mark (1). y. But we can hardly overlook the Russ. mrake, gloom, mrachite, to darken, obscure; though the final letters of the stem do not quite 8. The form of the root appears to be MARG; it is remarkable that the shorter form MAR, to rub, grind, is the root of Skt. malas, dirty, Gk. µέλαs, black, Skt. malina, obscure, Lithuan. mėlinas, livid blue, &c. These certainly seem to be related words; and even E. mark is of the same family.

6. Otherwise, from

MAR, to glimmer; see Morn. Der. murki-ly, murki-ness.

MURMUR, a low muttering sound; to mutter, complain in a low voice. (F., -L.) M. E. murmur, sb., Chaucer, C. T. Pers. Tale, De Invidia; murmuren, vb., id. 10518. -F. murmure, 'a murmure;' also murmurer, 'to murmure;' Cot. -Lat. murmur, a murmur; whence the verb murmurare. + Gk. μορμύρειν, to rush and roar as water. + Skt. marmara, the rustling sound of the wind. dently a reduplicated form from the imitative /MAR or MUR, expressive of a rustling noise; as in Icel. murra, G. murren, to murmur. Der. murmur-ous, Pope, tr. of Odyssey, b. xx. l. 19.

MURRAIN, an infectious disease among cattle. (F., -L.) M.E. moreyne, moreine, P. Plowman, C. iv. 97. -O. F. moreine*, not found; closely allied to O.F. morine, a carcase of a beast, a malady or murrain among cattle. See Roquefort, who cites an O.F. translation of Levit, xi. 8; 'tu eschiveras mortes morines' = thou shalt eschew dead carcases.' Cf. Span. morri.a, Port. morrinha, murrain. = O. F.

Mortal

MURREY, dark red; obsolete. (F., -L.) 'The leaves of some trees turn a little murray or reddish;' Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 512. Spelt murrey; Palsgrave. - O. F. morée, 'a kind of murrey, or dark red colour; Cot. This O. F. morés answers to a Low Lat. morata, fem. of moratus. We actually find Low Lat. moratum in the sense of a kind of drink, made of thin wine coloured with mulberries; see Ducange. Cf. Ital. morato, mulberry-coloured, from Ital. mora, a mulberry; Span. morado, mulberry-coloured, from Span. mora. Hence the derivation is from Lat. morus, a mulberry; and the sense is properly 'mulberry-coloured.' See Mulberry.

MURRION, another spelling of Morion, q.v.

MUSCLE (1), the fleshy parts of the body by which an animal moves. (F., -L.) Sir T. Elyot has the pl. muscules; Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 33. But this is a Latinised form. Spenser has muscles, Astrophel, 120. - F. muscle. - Lat. musculum, acc. of musculus, (1) a little mouse, (2) a nuscle, from its creeping appearance. Dimin. of mus, a mouse, cognate with E. mouse; see Mouse. Der. muscul-ar, in Kersey, ed. 1715, substituted for the older term musculous (Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674), from Lat. musculosus, muscular. MUSCLE (2), MUSSEL, a shell-fish. (L.) Really the same word as the above, but borrowed at a much earlier period, and directly from Latin. M. E. muscle, Chaucer, C. T. 7682; P. Plowman, C. x. 94; which follows the F. spelling. - A.S. muxle; 'Muscula, muxle;' and again, 'Geniscula, muxle;' Wright's Vocab. i. 65, 77. [Here the x (or cx) stands for cs, by metathesis for sc, just as in A. S. dixian for discian; see Ask. | Lat. musculus, a small fish, sea-muscle; the same word as musculus, a little mouse; see Muscle (1). ¶ The double spelling of this word can be accounted for; the Lat. musculus became A.S. muscle, early turned into musle, whence E. mussel, the final -el being regarded as the A.S. dimin. suffix. The spelling muscle is French. The remarkable change of sense in Lat. musculus from 'little mouse' to 'muscle' has its counterpart in Dan. mus-ling, a muscle (the fish), lit. 'mouse-ling.' Cf. Swed. mus, a mouse; mussla, a muscle (fish); Gk. µve, (1) mouse, (2) muscle, in both E. senses. We even find, as Mr. Wedgwood points out, F. souris, 'a mouse, also, the sinewy brawn of the arm;' Cot.

MUSE (1), to meditate, be pensive. (F., -L.) Chaucer, C. T. 5453; P. Plowman, B. x. 181. [We also find M. E. mosard, musard, a dreamer, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, pp. 229, 266; from F. musard, sb. 'a muser, dreamer,' also as adj. 'musing, dreaming, &c.; Cot.] - F. muser, 'to muse, dreame, study, pause, linger about a matter;' Cot. - O. F. muse*, the mouth, snout of an animal; only preserved in the dimin. musel, later museau, whence E. muzzle; see Muzzle.

B. Strange as it may seem, this etymology. muzzle; see Muzzle. β . Strange as it may seem, this etymology, given by Diez, is the right one; it is amply borne out by Florio's Ital. Dict., where we find: 'Musare, to muse, to thinke, to surmise, also to muzle, to muffle, to mocke, to jest, to gape idlie about, to hould ones muzle or snout in the aire.' This is plainly from Ital. muso, 'a musle, a snout, a face.' The image is that of a dog snuffing idly about, and musing which direction to take; and may have arisen as a hunting term. γ . Other derivations, such as from Lat. musinari, to meditate, or from O. H. G. muazón, to have leisure, or from Lat. mussare, to mutter, are (phonetically) incorrect. Der. mus-er, a-muse.

MUSKET, a small hawk; a hand-gun. (F., - Ital., - L.) old guns had often rather fanciful names. One was called the falconet, a dimin. of falcon; another a saker, which was also the name of a hawk; another a basilisk; another a culverin, i. e. snakelike; see Culverin. So also the musket was called after a small hawk of the same name. β. Shak. has musket, a hand-gun; All's Well, iii. 2. 111. M. E. musket, spelt muskytte in Prompt. Parv., and explained as a 'byrde.' 'Musket, a lytell hauke, mouchet;' Palsgrave. See Way's note, who remarks that 'the most ancient names of fire-arms were derived from monsters, dragons, or serpents, or from birds of prey, in allusion to velocity of movement.' - O. F. mousquet, 'a musket (hawke, or piece);' Cot. [Here piece = gun.] [Cotgrave also gives O.F. mouchet, mouschet, 'a musket, the tassel of a sparhauke; also the little singing-bird that resembles the friquet, [which is] a kind of sparrow that keeps altogether about walnut-trees.']— Ital. mosquetto, 'a musket; also, a musket-hawke;' Florio.

7. Just as O. F. mouchet, mouschet, is related to O. F. mouche, mousche, a fly, so Ital. mosquetto is related to Ital. mosca, a fly. The connection is not very obvious, but see the remarks in Scheler, who shews that small birds were sometimes called flies; a clear example is in G. gras-mücke, a hedge-sparrow, lit. a 'grass-midge.' The particular hawk here spoken of was so named from his small size. this, mere smallness of size, may be the reason for the name of 'fly,' not because of their speckled plumage, as some have supposed; the for noucheter, to speckled, is a longer form than mouchet, not the original of it. Ample proofs of this appear in Florio, in the forms moscardo, 'a kind of birde, also a musket hauke;' moscherino, 'a kind of flie, the name of a birde;' moschetti, 'a kind of sparowes in India, so little, as with feathers and all one is no bigger then [than] a little walnut;' all of which words are derived from mosca. [We may also compare the Span. and E. mosquito.]-Lat. musca, a fly; see Mosquito. Der. musket-eer, spelt musqueteer in Hudibras, pt. i. c. 2, 1. 567, from O. MUST (1), part of a verb implying 'obligation.' (E.) This verb is extremely defective; nothing remains of it but the past tense, which does duty both for past and present. The infinitive (mote) is obsolete; even in A.S. the infin. (motan) is not found. But the present tense is common in the Middle-English period. MUST (2), new wine. (L.) In early use. M.E. must, most; P. Plowman, B. xviii. 368; Layamon, 8723.—A.S. must, in a gloss (Bosworth). - Lat. mustum, new wine; neut. of mustus, young, fresh, new; whence also E. moist. See Moist. Der. must-ard.

MUSTACHE, MUSTACHIO; see Moustache.

MUSTARD, a condiment made from a plant with a pungent taste. (F., -L.; with Teut. suffix.) M. E. mustard, Prompt. Parv.; mostard, Ayenbite of Inwyt, ed. Morris, p. 143, l. 30. - O. F. mostards (a spelling evidenced by the occurrence of a related word mostaige in Roquefort), later moustarde (Cotgrave), mod. F. moutarde. Cf. Ital. and Port. mostarda, Span. mostaza (with a different suffix). β. The suffix -arde is of Teut. origin; see Brachet, Introd. to Etym. Dict. § 196. The condiment took its name from the fact that it was made by mixing the pounded seeds of the mustard-plant with must or vinegar (Littré). The name was afterwards given to the plant itself (Lat. sinapi). Y. From O. F. most *, only found in the form moust, mod. F. moût, must. Cf. Ital., Span., and Port. mosto. - Lat. mustum, must, new wine; see Must (2).

MUSTER, an assembling in force, display, a fair show. (F., -L.) The E. sb. is older than the verb, and is nearly a doublet of monster. M. E. moustre. 'And the moustre was thretti thousandis of men; Wyclif, 3 Kings, v. 13, earlier version; the later version has summe [sum]. 'And made a gode moustre' = and made a fair show; P. l'Iowman, B. xiii. 362. O. F. mostre (13th cent.), another form of O. F. monstre, 'a pattern, also a muster, view, shew, or sight;' Cot. Mod. F. montre, which see in Littré. Cf. Port. mostra, a pattern, sample, muster, review of soldiers, mostrar, to shew; Ital. mostra, a show, review, display, mostrare, to shew. - Low Lat. monstra, a review of troops, show, sample. Lat. monstrare, to shew. See Monster. Der. muster, vb., M. E. mustren, Romance of Partenay, ed.

3003; muster-master. MUSTY, mouldy, sour, spoiled by damp. (L.?) 'Men shall find little fine flowre in them, but all very mustie branne, not worthy so muche as to fede either horse or hogges; 'Sir T. More. Works, p. 649 h (not p. 694, as in Richardson). See Hamlet, iii. 2. 359. a. Of disputed origin; but it is evident that the final -y is the usual E. adjectival suffix, and equally evident that the sb. could only have been must. I see no reason why this may not be the usual E. must in the sense of new wine. This sb. was in very early use (as shewn) and was once common. All that is missing is sufficient historical evidence to shew how the new sense was acquired. β . We know (1) that Chaucer has moisty with respect to ale, C.T. 17009, where he really β. We know (1) that means musty ale, i. e. new ale; also (2) that moisty and musty are mere doublets from the same source. If moisty may have the sense of musty, there can be no reason why musty should not have the sense of moisty, i. e. damp; whence the senses of mouldy, &c. would easily result. We can further understand that a vessel once filled with must and afterwards emptied might easily leave a scent behind it such as we should call musty. Y. Until we have further evidence, I confidently reject all other interpretations; though admitting that some confusion with O.F. moisi, explained by Cotgrave as 'mouldy, musty, fusty, may have taken place. But to derive the word from O. F. moisi is, phonetically, impossible. moisty is used (in the sense of moist) by other authors; Rich. quotes from Brende, Quintus Curtius, fol. 87; and see Ascham, Toxophilus, ed. Arber, p. 156, l. 23. See Moist. Der. must-i-ly, -ness.

MUTABLE, subject to change. (L.) M. E. mutable, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. iv. pr. 6, l. 3945.—Lat. mutabilis, subject to change.

MUTE (2), to dung; used of birds. (F., -O. Low G.) In Tobit, ii. 10 (A. V.) = O. F. mutir, 'to mute, as a hawke;' Cot. A clipped form of O. F. esmeutir, 'to mute, as birds doe;' id. F. meute, a sedition (Burguy), better known by the mod. F. derivative émeute. The mod. F. meute, though the same word, is only used in the sense of 'a pack of hounds;' answering to Low Lat. mota canum (l'ucange). - Low Lat. mota, a pack of hounds, contracted form of movita, a movement, contention, strife. - Lat. mota, fem. of möius (= movitus), pp. of mouere, to move; see Move. γ. Thus the orig. sense is 'movement,' well expressed by our 'commotion.' Parallel forms are O. Ital. mutino, 'a mutinie' (Florio), mutinare, 'to mutinie' (id.), whence mod. Ital. ammutinarsi, to mutiny; also Span. motin, a mutiny, sedition, Port. motim, a mutiny, uproar. The Span, and Port, forms are important for shewing the vowel-sound. Der. mutiny, verb, As You Like It, i. 1. 24; mutin-er (as above), mutin-eer (as above), mutin-ous (as above), mutin-ous-ly, mutin-ous-ness.

MUTTER, to murmur, speak in a low voice. (E.) muttren, Chaucer, Troil. i. 542. Also moteren, whence the pres. part. moteringe, used to tr. Lat. mussitantes, Wyclif, 2 Kings, xii. 19. The word is rather E. than borrowed from Lat. mutire, to mutter. be divided as mot-er-en, where -er is the usual frequentative verbal suffix, and mot- or mut- is an imitative sound, to express inarticulate mumbling; see Mum. Cf. prov. G. mustern, to whisper, similarly formed from a base must-; Lat. mut-ire, mutt-ire, muss-are, to mutter, muttum, a muttered sound; &c.

MUTTON, the flesh of sheep. (F., -C.) M. E. motoun (with one t), spelt motons in Prompt. Parv. In P. Plowman, B. iii. 24, the word motoun means a coin of gold, so called because stamped with the image of a sheep. The older spelling molton is in Gower, C. A. i. 39.—O. F. moton (mod. F. mouton), a sheep; a still older spelling is molton (Burguy). - Low Lat. multonem, acc. of multo, a sheep, also a gold coin (as in P. Plowman). Cf. Ital. montone, 'a ram, a mutton,' Florio; where n is substituted for l, preserved in the Venetian form moltone, cited by Diez.

B. Of Celtic origin; as shewn by Irish and Manx molt, Gael. mult, W. mollt, Bret. maout, meut (for molt?), a wether, sheep. Root unknown.

7. Diez cites mod. Prov. mout, Como mot. Grisons mutt, castrated, which he thinks are corruptions from Lat. mutilus, mutilated, imperfect, which would be cut down to mutlus, and would then pass into multus. See Mutilate. Compare (says Diez) mod. Prov. cabro mouto, a goat deprived of its horns, which in old Prov. would have been cabra mouta, exactly answering to capra mutila in Columella, and to the Swiss form muttli, with the same sense. The Celtic solution is surely the simpler. Der. mutton-chop.

MUTUAL, reciprocal, given and received. (F., -L.) 'Conspyracy and mutuall promise;' Sir T. More, Works, p. 1019 c. - O. F. mutuël, 'mutuall, reciprocal;' Cot. Extended from Lat. mutu-us, β. The orig. sense mutual, by help of the suffix -el (= Lat. -alis). is 'exchanged;' from Lat. mutare, to change; see Mutable, Moult. Cf. mort-u-us, from the base mort-. Der. mutual-ly, Cf. mort-u-us, from the base mort-. Moult. mutual-i-ty.

MUZZLE, the snout of an animal. (F., -L.) M. E. mose, Chaucer, C. T. 2153. - O. F. mosel*, not found; later form musel (Burguy), whence museau, 'the muzzle, snout, or nose of a beast;'

O. French; but (as Diez shews) a still older form morsel is indicated by the Bret. morzeel, which (like Bret. muzel) means 'muzzle,' and is merely a borrowed word from O. French.

B. Again, the Provençal (according to Diez) not only has the form mus, but also mursel, in which the r is again preserved; but it is lost in Ital. muso, the muzzle, and in the E. Muse (1). Y. The O. F. morsel thus indicated is a dimin. (with suffix -el) from a form mors; cf. Ital. muso, standing for an older morso, which must have meant 'muzzle' as well as 'bit, bridle. or snaffle for a horse' (Florio). Cf. F. mors, to hit or biting!' MYRIAD, ten thousand, a vast number. (Gk.) In Milton, P. L. i. 87, &c. Englished from Gk. μυριάδ, stem of μυριάδ, the number of 10,000. – Gk. μυρίοδ, numberless. Root unknown.

MYRMIDON, one of a band of men. (L., -Gk.) Gen. in pl. myrmidons; the Myrmidons were the followers of Achilles; in Chapman, tr. of Homer, Iliad ii. 604; and in Surrey, tr. of Æneid, ii. 1. 10. - Lat. Myrmidones, Verg. Æn. ii. 7. - Gk. Μυρμιδόνες, a warlike people of Thessaly, formerly in Ægina (Homer). There was a fable (to account for the name) that the Myrmidons were ants changed into men; Ovid, Met. vii. 635-654. Cf. Gk. μυρμηδών, an ant's nest; μυρμηξ, an ant, cognate with Pers. múr, Lat. formica.

MYRRH, a bitter aromatic gum. (F., - L., - Gk., - Arab.) M. E. mirre, Ancren Riwle, p. 372, l. 7; now adapted to the Lat. spelling. - O. F. mirre (11th cent.); mod. F. myrrhe (Littré). - Lat. myrrha. - Gk. μύρρα, the balsamic juice of the Arabian myrtle. -Arab. murr, (1) bitter, (2) myrrh, from its bitterness; Rich. Dict., p.

1381.+Heb. mar, bitter.

MYRTLE, the name of a tree. (F., - L., - Gk., - Pers.) In Shak. Meas. for Meas. ii. 2. 117. - O. F. myrtil, 'a mirtle-berrie; also, the lesse kind of mirtle, called noble mirtle; 'Cot. Dimin. of myrte, meurte, 'the mirtle-tree;' id. - Lat. murtus, myrtus, myrta, the myrtle. - Gk. μύρτος. - Pers. múrd, the myrtle; Palmer, col. 617;

MYSTERY (1), anything kept concealed or very obscure, a secret rite. (L., - Gk.) M. E. mysterie, Wyclif, Rom. xvi. 25. Englished from Lat. mysterium, Rom. xvi. 25 (Vulgate). - Gk. μυστήριον, Rom. xvi. 25. - Gk. μύστης, one who is initiated. - Gk. μνείν, to initiate into mysterics. — Gk. μθειν, to close the eyes. — Gk. μῦ, a slight sound with closed lips; answering to ΜU, to bind, which appears to be of imitative origin. See Mute, Mum. Der. mysteri-ous, from F. mysterieux, 'mysterious,' Cot.; mysteri-ous-ly, -ness. And see mystic, mystify.

MYSTERY (2), MISTERY, a trade, handicraft. (F.,-L.)

Cotgrave translates O. F. mestier by 'a trade, occupation, mystery, soldier's occupation as being 'the noblest mysterie.' And we read of 'mystery plays,' so called because acted by craftsmen. This is a totally different word from the above, but sadly confused with it. It should rather be spelt mistery. Indeed, it owes to the word above not only the former y, but the addition of the latter one; being a corruption of M. E. mistere, a trade, craft, Chaucer, C. T. 615. -O. F. mestier (as above); mod. F. métier. [Cognate with Span. menester, want, need, employment, trade; Ital. mestiere, with same sense.] - Lat. ministerium, service, employment. - Lat. minister, a servant ; see Minister.

MYSTIC, secret, allegorical. (F., -L., -Gk.) Milton has mystick, P. L. v. 178, ix. 442; also mystical, P. L. v. 620. -F. mystique, 'mysticall;' Cot. - Lat. mysticus. - Gk. μυστικύε, mystic. -Gk. μυστικής

Cot. Here Chaucer preserves an older form mosel than is found in and formed directly from Gk. µ000s, a fable; see Mythology, which is a much older word in the language. Der. myth-ic, mythic-al, myth-ic-al-ly MYTHOLOGY, a system of legends, the science of legends. (F., - L., - Gk.) In Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. i. c. 8, Of Ctesias. - F. my/hologie, 'an exposition, or moralising of fables;' Cot. - Lat. my/hologia. - Gk. μυθολογία, legendary lore, a telling of fables. - Gk. μῦθο-, crude form of μῦθος, a fable; and λέγειν, to tell. β. The Gk. $\mu \hat{\nu}$ -θοε is from $\mu \hat{\nu}$, a slight sound, hence a word, saying, speech, tale; which is from MU, to utter a low sound, of imitative origin; see Mum. Cf. Skt. $m\hat{u}$, to sound, $m\hat{u}m$, to sound, man, to sound, murmur. Der. mytholog-ic, mytholog-ic-al, mytholog-ist.

N.

N. A few remarks upon this letter are necessary. An initial n, in English, is very liable to be prefixed to a word which properly begins with a vowel; and again, on the other hand, an original initial n is sometimes dropped. A. In the former case, the n is probably due to the final letter of an or mine; thus an ewt becomes a newt, mine uncle becomes my nuncle, and hence newt and nuncle, used independently. Other examples occur in nickname for eke-name, and nugget, formerly niggot = ningot, for ingot. In Middle-English, numerous similar examples occur, such as a noke for an oke, an oak (cf. John Nokes = John an-oaks, i. e. John of the oaks); a naye = an aye, an egg; thi nye = thin ye, thine eye; thi nynon = thin ynon, thine eyes; examples of all these are given in Halliwell, under noke, naye, nye, and nynon respectively. In the case of for the nonce, the n belongs to the old dat. case of the article, the older phrase being for then ones; see Nonce. B. On the other hand, an original n is lost in auger for nauger, in the sense of a carpenter's tool; in umpire for numpire, adder for nadder, orange for norange, apron for napron, ouch for nouch. See my note to P. Plowman, C. xx. 306.

NAB, to seize. (Scand.) A cant word, prob. introduced by sailors, but of perfectly respectable origin. Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. - Swed, nappa, Dan, nappe, to catch, snatch at. Prob. allied to Nip, q. v.

Rich. cites the word nab-cheats Prob. allied to Nip, q. v. ¶ Rich. cites the word nab-cheats from Beaum. and Fletcher, Beggar's Bush, ii. 1, with the sense of caps. This is a totally different word; here nab = knob, the head; cheat = a thing, in the cant language; and nab-cheat = head-thing, cap; see Harman's Caveat, ed. Furnivall, p. 82.

NABOB, an Indian prince, very rich man. (Hindi, - Arab.) See Burke, Speech on the Nabob of Arcot's debts. The word significs 'deputy' or vice-roy, csp. applied to a governor of a province of the Mogul empire (Webster). Also nobobb, a nobleman; so spelt by Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1665, p. 104, who assigns it that meaning 'in the language of the Mogul's kingdom, which hath mixt with it much of the l'ersian.' = Hindi nawwáb (pl. of naïb), 'vice-gerents, deputies; vulg. nabob;' Bate's Dict., p. 367. But the word is merely borrowed from Arabic; Devic notes that Hindi often employs Arab. plurals as sing.—Arab. nauwah, a nabob. Properly a plural form, signifying vice-gerents, deputies; pl. of naib, a vice-gerent, lieutenant, deputy. Cf. Arab. nawb, supplying the place of another. See Rich. Dict. pp. 1606, 1557, 1608. Palmer's Pers. Dict. col. 665, has: Arab. navub, 'a viceroy, governor; in Persia, this title is given to princes of the blood;' cf. col. 639. Cf. Port. nababo, a nabob.

NADIR, the point of the sky opposite the zenith. (Arab.)

Chaucer uses nadir to signify the point of the zodiac opposite to that in which the sun is situate; Treatise on the Astrolabe, pt. ii. sect. 6, 1. 1. - Arab. naziru's 'samt (or simply nazir), the point of the sky opposite the zenith. - Arab. nazir, alike, corresponding to; and as same, the azimuth, or rather an abbreviation of same ras, the zenith. Rich. Dict. pp. 1586, 848. See Azimuth, Zenith. The Arab. z here used is the 17th letter of the Arab. alphabet, an unusual letter with a difficult sound, which came to be rendered by d in Low Lat. and E.

MYSTIC, secret, allegorical. (F., -L., -Gk.) Milton has mystick, P. L. v. 178, ix. 442; also mystical, P. L. v. 620. -F. mystique, 'mysticall;' Cot. - Lat. mysticus. - Gk. µvorusos, mystic. - Gk. µv

NAIAD, a water-nymph. (L., -Gk.) In Shak. Temp. iv. 128. - Pa trace of it remains in Russ. znamenie, a sign, token (from znate, to Lat. naiad-, stem of naias, a water-nymph. - Gk. vaiás (gen. vaiáð-os). a water-nymph. - Gk. váciv, to flow; Æolic form vaveiv (= váFeiv). - ✓ SNU, to flow; cf. Skt. snu, to distil, flow.

NAIL, the horny scale at the end of the human fingers and toes; a spike of metal. (E.) M. E. nail, nayl; the pl. nayles, used of the human nails, is in Havelok, 2163; the pl. nailes, i. e. iron spikes, is in Chaucer, C. T. 6351. — A. S. nægel, in both senses, Grein, ii. 274. [The loss of g is regular, and occurs in hail, sail, &c.] + Du. nagel, in both senses. + Icel. nagl, the human nail; nagli, a spike, peg. + Dan. nagle, in both senses. + Swed. nagel, in both senses. + Goth. nagls *, only in the derived verb ganagljan, to nail. + G. nagel, in both senses. β. All from a Teut. type NAGLA or NAGLI, a nail (Fick, iii. 150); to be divided as nag-la, nag-li, the suffix denoting the agent. The sense is 'gnawer,' i. e. in the case of the finger-nails, 'scratcher,' and, in the case of the peg, 'piercer.' All from the Teut. base NAG, to gnaw, scratch, pierce, appearing in G. nagen, to gnaw, and in the E. nag, g-naw; see Nag (2), Gnaw. y. It is difficult to explain fully the allied words in other languages, in which only the sense of finger-nail or toe-nail survives. Still we may certainly connect Lithuan. nagas, a claw, nail, Russ. nogote, a nail, Skt. nakha (for nagha), a nail of the finger or toe; all from a NAGH, to gnaw or pierce, which is lost in these languages, except in so far as it is represented by Skt. niksh, to pierce. 8. The Gk. ovuf, a nail, claw, Lat. unguis, Gael. and Irish ionga, W. ewin, go back to a ✓ ANGH, which appears to be a transposed (and earlier) form of the ✓ NAGH; see Curtius, i. 400. Der. nail, vb., A.S. næglian, whence the pp. nægled, in Grein; nail-er. The remarkable whence the pp. nægled, in Grein; nail-er. The remarkable variation of Lat. unguis from A. S. nægel throws doubt on the above NAIVE, artless, simple, ingenuous. (F.,-L.) A late word; the adv. naively is used by Pope in a letter; see the quotation in Richardson. - F. naïve, fem. of naïf, which Cot. explains by 'lively, quick, naturall, kindly, .. no way counterfeit.' - Lat. natiums, native, natural; see Native. The fem. form naïve was chosen, because it appears in the adv. naïvement, and in the sb. naïveté; and, in fact, it is nearer the Latin original than the masc. naif. Der. naive-ly, put for F. naïve-ment; and naive-té, sb., directly from the French.

NAKED, bare, uncovered, exposed. (E.) Always dissyllabic. M. E. naked, Chaucer, C. T. 2068. — A.S. nacod (=nac-od), which is plainly an old pp., with the pp. suffix -od; Grein, ii. 272.+O. Fries. nakad, naken. + Du. naakt. + Icel. naktr, nakinn, nökviðr. + Dan. nögen. + Swed. naken. + G. nackt, M. II. G. nacket, O. H. G. nachot, nakot. + Goth. nakwaths (where -aths is the usual pp. suffix). B. All these forms point to an old pp. form; the Du. -t, Icel. -tr, -br, G. -t, Goth. -aths, are all pp. suffixes of a weak verb, and lead us back to the orig. Teut. type NAKW-ATHA, from a base NAKW, NAK; Fick, iii. 157. Y. But it is not a little remarkable that some of the forms, viz. Icel. nak-inn, Dan. nög-en, Swed. nak-en, O. Fries. nak-en, present the pp. suffixes of a strong verb from the base NAK, answering to an Aryan NAG, to strip, lay bare; whence are obviously also derived Skt. nagna, naked, Russ. nagoi, naked, Lith. nagas, naked (Schleicher), Lat. nūdus (= nugdus, for nogdus, nagdus). Further allied words are the Irish and Gael. nochd, naked, bare, exposed, desolate, 8. Lastly, it is remarkable that English erb, which appears in M.E. naken. The W. noeth, Bret. nôaz. alone has preserved the verb, which appears in M. E. naken. following are examples. 'He nakide the hous of the pore man,' Wyclif, Job, xx. 19, early version; the later version has 'he made nakid the hows.' 'O nice men, whi nake ye youre bakkes' = O foolish men, why do ye expose your backs (to the enemy, by turning to flee); Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. iv. met. 7, l. 4288. It is also found much later. 'Lus. Come, be ready, nake your swords, Think of your wrongs;' Tourneur, The Revenger's Tragedy, Act v (R.) We even find a derived verb nakner; 'A! nu nacnes mon mi lef' = Ah! now men strip my beloved; O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, i. 283, l. 10.

The sense of the Aryan NAG is somewhat doubtful; but the English use fairly assigns to it the sense 'to strip.' Hence also the secondary Skt. verb naj, to be ashamed, as the result of stripping. Der. naked-ly, M. E. nakedliche, Ancren Riwle, p. 316; naked-ness, M. E. nakednesse, Wyclif, Rev. iii. 19. Also stark-naked, NAME, that by which a thing or person is called, a designation.

(E.) M.E. name (orig. dissyllabic); Chaucer, C. T. 3939. — A.S. nama, noma, Grein, ii. 273. + Du. naam. + Icel. nafn, namn. + Dan. naun. + Swed. namn. + Goth. namo. + G. name, O.H.G. namo. + I.at. nomen (for gnomen); cf. Lat. co-gnomen, i-gnominia. + Gk. δνομα, Ionic οδνομα (for δ-γνομαν; Curtius, i. 399). + Skt. náman (for jnáman; Benfey). β. Perhaps from an Aryan form GNÁMAN, a name, designation by which a thing is known; from \checkmark GNA, to know; see Know. If so, an initial k or g is lost in all but Latin;

Allied words are co-gnomen, i-gnomin-i-ous, i-gno-ble; also nominal, de-nominate, noble, note, and all derivatives of Know. Doublet, noun.

Know. Doublet, noun. The Aryan form is disputed.

NANKEEN, NANKIN, a kind of cotton cloth. (China.)

Added by Todd to Johnson. So called from Nankin in China.

NAP (1), a short sleep. (E.) We now say 'to take a nap,' and treat nap as a sh. We also say 'to be caught napping,' where it is a sb. formed from a verb. It was formerly a verb, though napping was also used. M. E. nappen, to doze. 'Se! how he nappeth;' Chaucer, C. T. 16958. - A. S. hnæppian, to nap; hnæppan is a gloss upon dormit, Ps. xl. 9, ed. Spelman. The orig. sense is 'to nod,' or 'droop,' or 'bend forwards;' allied to A. S. hnipian, to bend oneself, Grein, ii. 91; also to Icel. hnipna, to droop, despond. Cf. Bavarian knappen, to nod with the head, knipfen, to hobble (Schmeller); G.

micken, to nod, doze. Der. napp-ing, A. S. hnappung, Grein, ii. oo.

NAP (2), the roughish surface of cloth. (C.) In Spenser, Muiopotmos, 1. 333. Shak. has napless = threadbare; Cor. ii. 1. 250. potmos, l. 333. Shak. has napless = threadbare; Cor. ii. 1. 250. The older form is nop. M. E. noppe; 'noppe of a cloth, villus;' Prompt. Parv. See Way's note where he cites passages to shew that noppe 'denotes those little knots, which, after cloth has passed through the fulling-mill, are removed by women with little nippers; a process termed burling cloth.' He cites: 'noppy, as cloth is that hath a gross woffe [woof].' Also: 'Clarisse the nopster (esbourysse) can well her craft, syth whan she lerned it, cloth for to noppe;' Caxton, Book for Travellers. We now apply the term, not to the knoppy or knobby (i. e. knotty) surface, but to the sheared surface, by a natural change in the sense, due to our not seeing the cloth till the process is completed. - A.S. hnoppa, nap of cloth; an unauthorised form given by Somner, but prob. correct. It is plainly a mere variant of A.S. cnap, a top, a knop, knob; see Knop, Knob. + Du. nop; O. Du. noppe, 'to shear of [off] the nap, id. NAPE, the joint of the neck behind. (C.) In Shak. Cor. ii. 1. 43. M. E. nape, Prompt. Parv. 'Dedly woundid through the nape;' King Alisaunder, I. 1347. The orig. sense is projection or 'knob;' and the term must have been first applied to the slight knob at the back of the head, felt on passing the finger upwards from the neck. It is, in fact, a mere variant of M. E. knappe, a knob, button, P. Plowman, B. vi. 272. Cf. Icel. hnappr, knappr, W. cnap, a knob, stud, NARRATION, a tale, recitation. (F., -L.) [The verb narrate is late.] Narration is in Minsheu, ed. 1627. It is prob. much earlier, and perhaps to be found in M.E. -F. narration, 'a narration; Cot. - Lat. narrationem, acc. of narratio, a tale. - Lat. narratus, pp. of narrare, to relate, tell; lit. to make known.—Lat. narus, another form of gnarus, knowing, acquainted with.—

NARROW, of little breadth or extent. (E.) M. E. narowe, narwe, narwe (with one r); Chaucer has narwe (=narrowly) as an adv., C. T. 3224; also as an adj., C. T. 627.—A.S. nearu, nearo, adj.; nearwe, adv., Grein, ii. 287, 288. + O. Sax. naru, adj., narawo, adv. β. There seems at first sight to be some connection with near; but this is an unoriginal word derived from nigh (see Near), and nigh also find Du. naaww. O. NARWHAL, the sea-unicorn. (Scand.) In Ash's Dict., ed. 1775. – Dan. and Swed. narhval; Icel. nahvalr, a narwhale. β. The latter part of the word is the same as E. whale. As to the sense of the prefix, the lit. sense of Icel. nú hvalr is 'corpse-whale,' from Icel. ndr (in compounds ndr-), a corpse; and the fish is often of a pallid colour. Such is the usual explanation. y. We should rather expect the prefix to stand for Icel. nas- (= nose), as in nas-hyrningar, a 'nose-horned' animal, a rhinoceros, from Icel. nos (stem nas-), the nose. The long horn projects like a nose from the upper jaw. The change from s to r is quite regular and common; cf. E. iron from A. S. isen, E. hare = G. hase. But this guess does not explain Icel. á.

NASAL, belonging to the nosc. (F., -L.) In Kersey, ed. 1715. Burton uses nasals for medicines operating through the nose; Anat. of Melancholy, p. 384 (R.); or p. 393 (Todd). - F. nasal, belonging to the nose; Cot. - Low Lat. nasalis, nasal; a coined word, not used in good Latin. - Lat. nas-us, the nose, cognate with E. nose; see Nose. Der. nas-turt-ium, q. v.

NASCEN'I, springing up, arising. (L.) A late word, added by Todd to Johnson. - Lat. nascent-, stem of pres. part. of nasci, to be born, to arise, an inceptive form with pp. natus. Sce Natal.

NASTURTIUM, the name of a flower. (L.) In Ash's Dict., ed. 1775. 'Cresses tooke the name in Latine nasturtium, a narium tormento, as a man would say, nose-wring, because it will make one writh and shrink vp his nosthrils; Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xix. c. 8.

-Lat. nasturtium, cress; better spelt nasturcium. - Lat. nas., stem of nasus, the nose; and turc-=torc-, from torquere, to twist, torment. See Nose and Torture.

NASTY, dirty, filthy, unpleasant. (Scand.) In Hamlet, iii. 4. 94. Formerly also (as Wedgwood points out) written nasky. 'Maulavé, ill-washed, slubbered, naskie, nasty, foul; 'Cot. In such cases, the form with k is the older. Of Scand, origin; preserved in Swed. dial. naskug, nasty, dirty, foul (used of weather); we also find the form nasket, dirty, sullied (Rictz). The word has lost an initial s (which occasionally drops off before n, as in Lat. nix beside E. snow). Cf. Swed. dial. snaskig, nasty, swinelike; Swed. snuskig, slovenly, nasty.—Swed. dial. snaska, to cat like a pig, to eat greedily and noisily, to be slovenly (Rictz); Dan. snaske, to champ one's food with a smacking noise. These words are of imitative origin, like various other suggestive words of a like character, such as Swed. snattra, to chatter, E. snap, snatch; see Snatch. The word appears also in Low G. nask, nasty, Bremen Wörterbuch; and in Norweg. nask, greedy, naska, to eat noisily. Der. nasti-ly, nasti-ness.

NATAL, belonging to one's birth. (F.,-L.) 'By natall Toves feest' = by the feast of Jove, who presides over nativity, Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 150. - F. natal, in use at least as early as the 15th cent. (Littré); though the true O. F. form is noel. - Lat. natalis, natal. also presiding over a birth. - Lat. natus (for gnatus), born. Cf. Gar.

Englished from Lat. nauseous, that produces nausea. - Lat. nausea, nausia, sea-sickness, sickness. -Gk. vavoía, sea-sickness. - Gk. vaûs, a ship, cognate with Lat. nauis; see Nave (2). also adopted the sb. nausea, which occurs in Phillips, ed. 1706.

NAUTICAL, naval, belonging to ships. (L., -Gk.)

Blount's
Gloss., ed. 1674, has nautical and nautick, the latter being the more orig. form. - Lat. nauticus, nautical. - Gk. ναυτικόs, pertaining to ships. - Gk. ναύτηs, a sea man. - Gk. ναΰs, a ship, cognate with Lat. nauis; see Nave (2). Der. nautical-ly.

NAVAL, belonging to ships, marine. (F., -L.) In Cotgrave. - F. naval, 'navall;' Cot. - Lat. naulis, naval. - Lat. nauis, a ship; Cot. - Lat. naualis, naval. - Lat. nauis, a ship; see Nave (2).

NAVE (1), the central portion or hub of a wheel, through which the axle passes. (E.) M. E. naue (with u=v). Chaucer, C. T. 7848 [not 7938].—A. S. nafu, nafa; Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, b. iv. pr. 6, cap. xxxix, § 7. + Du. naaf. + Icel. nöf. + Dan. nav. + Swed. naf. + G. nabe. + Skt. nābhi, the navel, the nave of a wheel, the centre. β. The Skt. word is supposed to be derived from nabh, to burst; hence the sense of swelling or projection easily results; similarly breast is connected with E. burst. 'The navel... appears at the first period of life as a button or small projection;' Wedgwood.

Der. nav-el, q. v. From the same root, nebula, nimbus, &c.

NAVE (2), the middle or body of a church. (F., -L.) In Phillips, World of Words, ed. 1706. Spelt nef in Addison, Travels in Italy, description of the church of St. Justina in Padua. - F. nef.

'a ship; also, the body of a church;' Cot. - Low Lat. nauem, acc. of nauis, the body of a church. The similitude by which the church of Christ is likened to a ship tossed by waves was formerly common. See my note to P. Plowman, C. xi. 32, where I cite the passage from Augustine about 'nauis, i. e. ecclesia;' S. Aug. Sermo lxxv. cap. iii. ed. Migne, v. 475.—Lat. nauis, a ship. + Gk. vaûs, a ship. + Skt. nau, a ship, boat. + A. S. naca, a boat; Grein, ii. 270. + Icel. nökkvi, a boat. + G. nachen, a skiff. β. All formed (with suffixes -wa or -ka) from a base na, for older sna, signifying to 'swim,' or 'float; cf. Lat. nare, to swim, Gk. νάειν, to flow. - SNA, SNU, to flow, swim, float; cf. Skt. sná, to bathe, snu, to flow. Der. nav-al, q. v., nau-ti-c-al, q. v., nau-ti-lus, q. v., argo-naut, q. v., nav-ig-ate (see navigation), nav-y. From the same root are nai-ad, ne-re-id, nau-sea, a-ner-oid; perhaps snake; perhaps adder.

NAVEL, the central point of the belly. (E.) Merely the dimin. of nave (1). We find nave used for navel, Mach. i. 2. 22; and conversely nauels (= navels) for the naves of a wheel, Bible, ed. 1551, 3 Kings, vii. 33. M.E. nauel (= navel), Chaucer, C.T. 1959.—A.S. nafela, Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, b. iv. c. 1. § 3. + Du. navel, from naaf, a nave. + Icel. nafli, from nöf. + Dan. navle, from nav. + Swed. nafle, from naf. + G. nabel, from nabe. Cf. Skt. nábhi, navel, nave, centre. See Nave (1).

NAVIGABLE, that may be travelled over by ships. (F.,-L.) In Cotgrave.-F. navigable, 'navigable;' Cot. - Lat. navigablis, navigable.-Lat. navigare, to navigate; see Navigation. Der.

NAVIGATION, management of a ship. (F.,-L.) In Shak. Macb. iv. 1. 54.-F. navigation, 'navigation, sailing;' Cot.-Lat. navigationem, acc. of navigatio, a sailing.-Lat. navigare, to sail, manage a ship.-Lat. nav., stem of navis, a ship; and -ig-, put for ag-, base of agere, to drive. See Nave (2) and Agent. Der. navigate, from Lat. navigatus, pp. of navigare, but suggested by the sb.; navigat-or, familiarly contracted to navy, formerly applied to the labourers on canals for internal navigation, and now applied to labourers on railways! Also circum-navigate.

NAVY, a fleet of ships. (F.,-L.) M. E. navie, Chaucer, Ho. of

NAVY, a fleet of ships. (F.,-L.) M. E. nauie, Chaucer, Ho. of Fame, i. 216.—O. F. navie, a fleet (Burguy); the orig. sense was a single ship.—Lat. navia, a ship, vessel.—Lat. navi-, crude form of nauis, a ship; see Nave (2).

NAY, no, a form of denial. (Scand.) There was a difference in usage between nay and no formerly; the former answered simple questions, the latter was used when the form of the question involved a negative expression. Besides this, nay was the simple, no the emphatic form, often accompanied by an oath. The distinction went out of use in the time of Henry VIII; see Skeat, Spec. of Eng. p. 192, l. 22, and the note; Student's Manual of the Eng. Language, ed. Smith, pp. 414, 422. Moreover, nay is of Scand. origin, whilst no is E. M. E. nay, Chaucer, C. T. 1667, 8693; spelt næi, nai, Layamon, 13132.—1ccl. nei, no, Dan. nei, Swed. nej; cognate with E. no; see No. Opposed to Aye.

NAZABITE, a Jew who made vows of abstinence, &c. (Heb.; with Gk. suffix.) 'To vowe a vowe of a Nazarite to separate [himself] vnto the Lorde;' Geneva Bible, 1561, Numb. vi. 5 (R.); [rather, vi. 2]. Formed with suffix -ite (= Lat. -ita, from Gk. -1775) from Heb. núzar, to separate oneself, consecrate oneself, vow, abstain. Der. Nazarit-ism.

NEAP, scanty, very low; said of a tide. (E.) M. E. neep, very rare. 'In the neep-resons,' i.e. in the neap-tide seasons, when boats cannot come to the quay; Eng. Gilds, ed. Toulmin Smith, p. 425.—A. S. nép, in the term nép-flód, as opposed to heih-flód = high flood; Wright's Vocab. i. 57, col. I. The word has lost an initial h, and nép stands for hnép, the orig. sense being 'scanty.' + Icel. neppr, hneppr, scanty. + Dan. knap, scanty, strait, narrow; cf. adv. knap, neppe, scarcely.

B. The orig. sense is 'pinched, narrow, scanty;' the derivation being from the verb to nip; see Nip.

Quite a distinct word from ebb. Der. neap-tide.

NEAR, nigh, close at hand. (E.) By a singular grammatical confusion, this word, orig. used as the comparative of nigh, came to be used as a positive, from which the new comparative nearer was evolved. In Schmidt's Shakespeare Lexicon, the explanation is given wrongly; he says that near is put by contraction for nearer, whereas it is the old form of the word. Shak uses both near and nearer as comparatives; both forms occur together, Macb. ii. 3. 146; cf. 'nor near nor farther off;' Rich. II, iii. 2. 64; 'being ne'er the near,' id. v. 1. 88. The form near-er is late, not found in the 14th cent., perhaps not in the 15th. Dr. Morris (Outlines of E. Accidence) observes that 'near, for nigh, first came into use in the phrase far and near, in which near is an adverb.' [He goes on to cite an A. S. neornan, not given in the dictionaries.] It is clear that the precise form was first of all adverbial; the M. E. form of nigher was nerre, whilst the adv. was ner, or neer. 'Cometh neer' = come near; Chaucer, C. T. 841.—A.S. near, comp. adverb from neah, nigh; Grein, ii. 283. + Icel. nær, adv.; both pos. and comp. See Nigh. Der. near-ly, Macb. iv. 2. 67; near-ness, Rich. II, i. 1. 119; near-sight-ed.

Mach. iv. 2. 67; near-ness, Rich. II, i. I. 119; near-sight-ed.

NEAT (1), black cattle, an ox, cow. (E.) M.E. neet, both sing. and pl.; used as pl. in Chaucer, C. T. 599.—A.S. neet, neut. sb., unchanged in the plural (like sheep, deer, also neuters); Grein, ii. 288. + Icel. naut. neut. sb., unchanged in the plural, and gen. used to mean cattle, oxen. + M. H. G. nóz, nóss, neut. sb., cattle. β. So named from their usefulness and employment. – A. S. neótan, niótan, to use, employ; Grein, ii. 292. + Icel. njóta, to use, enjoy. + M. H. G. niezen, O. H. G. niozan, G. geniessen, to enjoy, have the use of, + Goth. niutan, to receive joy (or benefit) from. γ. All from Teut. base NUT (Fick, iii. 164), answering to an Aryan base NUD, whence Lithuan. naudà, usefulness, naudingas, useful (Nesselman). Cf. Skt. nand, to be pleased, to be pleased with, nandaya, to gladden; Gk. δυίνημ, I profit, help, support, δυήσιμος, useful, δυγηός, profitable. See Schmidt, Vocalismus, i. 157. ¶ The etymology given in Ælfred's tr. of Boethius, c. xiv. § 3, from nitan, not to know (1), is an utter mistake. Der. neat-herd.

NEAT (2), tidy, unadulterated. (F., -L.) 'Neat and fine;' Two Gent. of Verona, i. 2. 10. Also spelt nett; Spenser, F. Q. iii. 12. 20. of the peach, -F. net, masc., nette, fem., 'neat, clean, pure;' Cot. [Cf. beast from O. F. beste.] - Lat. nitidum, acc. of nitidus, shining, clear, handsome, neat, elegant. - Lat. nitere, to shine. Prob. allied to Icel. gneist, a spark; see Gneiss. Der. neat-ly, neat-ness. Doublet, net (2).

NEB, the beak of a bird, the nose. (E.) In Winter's Tale, i. 2. O. H. G. nót.

183. M. E. neb. 'Ostende mihi faciem, scheau thi neb to me'=shew me thy face; Ancren Riwle, p. 90.—A.S. nebb, the face, John, xi. 44. + Du. neb, bill, beak, nib, mouth. + Icel. nef, the nose. + Dan. næb, beak, bill. + Swed. näbb, beak, bill. B. The word has lost an initial s; we also find Du. sneb, a bill, beak; G. schnabel, a bill, beak, nib; schneppe, a nozzle. The M. H. G. snabel, a bill, is derived from M. H. G. snaben, to snap; and the E. sb. nipple (dimin. of nib) is spelt with p. Hence sneb stands for snep, derived from the verb to snap; see Snap. Der See nib, nipple, snipe.

MEBULIA, a little cloud; a cluster of very faintly shining stars.

NABH, to swell, burst; Skt. nabh, to burst, injure; from the bursting of rain-clouds and storms. See Nave (1). Der. nebul-ar, nebul-ose, nebul-ous, nebul-os-i-ty.

NECESSARY, needful, requisite. (F., -L.) M. E. necessarie, Chaucer, C. T. 12615. - O. F. necessarie, 'necessary;' Cot. - Lat. necessarius, needful. - Lat. necesse, neut. adj., unavoidable, necessary. B. The usual derivation from ne, not, and cedere, to give way, is not satisfactory; it is more probably connected with Lat. nancisci (pp. nac-tus), to get, obtain, come upon; which would give to nec-esse the orig. sense of 'coming in one's way,' or nigh. See Nigh. Der. necessari-ly; also necessity, M. E. necessitee, Chaucer, C. T. 3044, from O. F. necessite = Lat. acc. necessitatem; hence necessit-ous, -ly, -ness, necessit-ate, necessit-ar-ian.

NECK, the part of the body joining the head to the trunk. (E.) M. E. nekke (dissyllabic), Chaucer, C. T. 5859.—A. S. hneeca, Deut, xxviii. 35. + Du. nek, the nape of the neck. + Icel. hnakki, the nape of the neck, back of the head. + Dan. nakke, the same. + Swed. nacke, the same. + G. nacken, O. H. G. hnach, the same. β. Frequently derived from A. S. hnigan, to bend, which is impossible; we cannot derive k from g. The evidence shews that the orig. sense is rather the 'nape of the neck,' or back of the head; and neck and nape are nearly parallel forms with much the same sense. Just as nape is a mere variant of knop, so neck is allied to knag, knuck-le. Cf. Norweg. nakk, a knoll, nakke, nape, neck; G. knocken, a knot, knag. The O. Du. knoke, 'the knobb or knot of a tree' (Hexham), explains both E. knuckle and F. nuque, the nape of the neck. See Knuckle. Der. neck-cloth, neckerchief (for neck-kerchief, see Kerchief), neck-band, neck-tie; neck-verse, Tyndall's Works, p. 112, compounded of neck and lace; neck-verse, Tyndall's Works, p. 112, col. 1, on which see my note to P. Plowman, C. xv. 129.

NECROLOGY, a register of deaths. (Ck.) Added by Todd to Johnson. From Gk. νεκρό-, stem of νεκρόε, a corpse; and -λογια, due to λόγος, discourse, from λέγειν, to speak. See Necromancy. NECROMANCY, divination by communion with the dead. (F., -L., -Gk.) The history of the word is somewhat concealed by our modern knowledge of Gk., which enables us to spell the word correctly. But the M. E. forms are nigromaunce, nigromancie, and the like. Precisely the same 'correction' of the spelling has been made in modern French. Spelt nygremauncye in King Alisaunder, l. 138; nigromancye in P. Plowman, A. xi. 158, on which see my Notes to P. Pl., p. 246. Trench rightly remarks, in his Eng. l'ast and Present, that 'the Latin mediaval writers, whose Greek was either little or none, spelt the word nigromantia, as if its first syllables had been Latin.' - O.F. nigromance, 'nigromancy, conjuring, the black art; 'Cot. Spelt nygromancye in the 15th cent.; see Littré. -Low Lat. nigromantia, corrupt form of necromantia. - Gk. VERPOμαντεία, necromancy. - Gk. νεκρό-, crude form of νεκρόs, a corpse; β. The Gk. and μαντεία, prophetic power, power of divination. νεκρός is extended from νέκυς, a corpse. dead body. - VNAK, to perish, to kill; whence Skt. nao, to perish, nagaya, to destroy, Lat. necare, to kill, and E. inter-nec-ine, q. v. γ. The Gk. μαντεία is from μάντιε, a prophet, seer, inspired one, from γ MAN, to think, whence also E. man-ia, men-tor. Der. necromanc-cr, Deut. xviii. II (A.V.); necromantic, from Gk. νεκρο-, and μαντικόε, prophetic; necromantic-al. From the singular confusion with Lat. niger, black, above mentioned, the art of necromancy came to be called the black art!

NECTAR, a delicious beverage. (L., -Gk.) In Spenser, Sonnet 39, l. 13. - Lat. nectar. - Gk. νέκταρ, the drink of the gods; Homer, Il. xix. 38, Od. v. 93. Root unknown. Der. nectar-ean, nectar-eous, nectar-ous, nectar-y; also nectar-ine, the name given to a variety of the peach, orig. an adj., as in 'Nectarine truits,' Milton, P. L.

NEED, necessity, distress. (E.) M. E. need, nede, Chaucer, C. T. 4523.—A. S. nýd, niéd, neád, néd; Grein, ii. 301. + Du. nood. + Icel. nauô. + Dan. and Swed. nöd. + Goth. nauths. + G. noth, O. H. G. nót. β. The Teut. type is NAUDI (Fick, iii. 156), to be divided as nau-di. The orig. sense is that of compulsion, or $1627. 'She was a busy negociating woman;' Bacon, Life of Hen. being driven or pushed about; of A.'S. d-nydan, to repel, drive away, force. The base is NU, appearing in O. H. G. niuwan, transact business.—Lat. negotium, business. Compounded of Lat. M. H. G. niuwen, nuen, to pound, to crush (orig. to drive, force), Wackernagel; and again, in Skt. nud (=nu-d), to push on, push away, drive. Cf. Russ. nydite, to force; nyjda, need. Der. need-ful, M. E. needful, Ancren Riwle, p. 260, 1 10; need-less, need-less-ly, need-less-ness; neec-y, M. E. nedy, P. Plowman, xx. 40, 41, 47, 48, 49, need-i-ly, need-i-ness. Also need-s, adv., M. E. needes, nedes, Chauccr, C. T. 1171, where the final -es is an adverbial ending, orig. due to A.S. gen. cases in -es; but in this case nedes supplanted an older form nede, Layamon, l. 1051, which originated in A.S. nýde, gen. case of nýd, which was a fem. sb. with gen. in -e.

NEEDLE, a sharp pointed steel implement, for sewing with. (E.) M. E. nedle, nedel, also spelt nelde, neelde; P. Plowman, C. xx. 56, and various readings. — A. S. nédl. Grein, ii. 274. + Du. neadd (for neadl), + Icel. nál (by contraction). + Dan. neadl. + Swed. nál. + G. nedel, O. H. G. nédela. + Goth. nethla. β. The Teut. type is NÂ-THLA (Fick, iii. 156), from a base NA, to sew, fasten with thread, preserved in O. H. G. nühen, G. nühen, to sew, and also in Lat. nere, Gk. νήθειν, νέειν, to spin. The suffix = Aryan -tar, denoting the agent. v. This is clearly one of the rather numerous cases in which an initial s has dropped off; the orig. root is \checkmark SNA, prob. to bind; see Curtius, i. 393. The initial s appears in Irish snathad, a needle, snathaim, 1 thread, or string together, snaidhe, thread, Gael. snathad, a needle, snath, thread, yarn; also G. schnur, a noose, and E. snare. From the same root is nerve. See Nerve, Snare. Der.

NEESE, NEEZE, to breathe hard, sneeze. (E.) 'To neeze'= to sneeze, Mids. Nt. Dr. ii. 1. 56. The sb. neesing is in Job, xli. 18 (A.V.). = M. E. nesen, vb., nesing, sb.; see Prompt. Parv., and Way's note. Somner gives an A. S. form niesan, but it is unauthorised. Still the word must be E., being known to all the Teut languages. + Du. niezen, to snecze. + O. Icel. hnjósa; mod. Icel. hnerra. + Dan. nyse. + Swed. nysa. + G. niesen, O. H. G. niusan.

β. From a Teut. base HNUS, to sneeze; Fick, iii. 82. The word, like the parallel form sneeze, is doubtless of imitative origin. ¶ In the later version of Wyclif, Job, xli. 18, the reading is fnesynge; this is not quite the same word, though of similar formation. The sense of fnesynge is 'violent blowing,' but it also means sneezing; cf. A. S. fneosung, sneezing, fnæst, a puff, Du. fniezen, to sneeze. Cf. 'And fneseth faste' = and puffs hard, Chaucer, C. T. Six-text ed., Group H, 1.62. It reminds us of Gk. πνέειν, to blow. Der. nees-ing, neez-ing, NEFARIOUS, unlawful, very wicked. (L.) In Butler, To the Memory of Du-Val, 1. 20. Englished from Lat. nefarius, impious, very wicked; by change of -us to -ous, as in arduous, &c. - Lat. nefas, that which is contrary to divine law, impiety, great wickedness. - Lat. ne, not; and fas, divine law, orig. that which is divinely spoken, from fari, to speak; see No and Fate. Der. nefarious-ly, NEGATION, denial. (F., -L.) In Shak. Troilus, v. 2. 127. - F. negation, 'a negation;' Cot. - Lat. acc. negationem, from nom. negatio. - Lat. negatis, pp. of negare, to deny. β. Negare is opposed to aiere, to affirm; and though the mode of its formation is not clear, it may be taken as due to ne, not, and aiere, to say. γ. This verb aiere is allied to Ck. ημί, I say, and to Skt. ah, to say, to speak. The Skt. ah stands for older agh; and all are from ✓ AGH, to say, speak, affirm. For the prefix ne, see No. Der. negative, adj., Wint. Tale, i. 2. 274, M.E. negatif (to be found, according to Richardson, in b. iii of the Testament of Love), from F. negatif = Lat. negativus; negative-ly, negative-ness; also negative, sb., Twelfth Nt. v. 24. From the same Lat negare we have de-ny, ab-negate, re-negate, re-negate.

Negligere = nec-legere.— Lat. nec, nor, not, contr. form of ne-que, compounded of ne, not, and que, enclitic particle related to qui, who; and legere, to gather, collect, select. NEGUS, a beverage of wine, water, sugar, &c. (E.) 'The mixture now called negus was invented in Queen Anne's time by Colonel Negus;' Malone, Life of Dryden, p. 484 (Todd's Johnson). Col. Francis Negus was alive in the reign of Geo. I. The Neguses are a Norfolk family; see Notes and Queries, I Ser. x. 10, 2 Ser. v. 224; Gent. Maga. Feb. 1799, p. 119.

NEIF, NEAF, the fist. (Scand.) In Shak. Mids. Nt. Dr. iv. 1. 20; 2 Hen. IV, ii. 4. 200. M.E. neue (= neve, dat. case), Havelok, 2405. - Icel. hnefi, the fist; Swed. nüfve; Dan. næve. The sense is the closed hand, with 'bent' fingers; as explained by the allied Gk. form κνάμπτειν, γνάμπτειν, to crook, bend, γνάμπτος, bent, curved. These are nasalised forms from κάμπτειν, to bend.

NEIGH, to make a noise as a horse. (E.) M. E. nezen, Wyclif, Isa. xxiv. 14, earlier version. - A.S. hnágan, to neigh; Ælfric's Grammar, 22. 30; whence the sb. hnågung, a neighing, id. 1. + Icel. gneggja, hneggja. + Swed. gnägga. + Dan. gnegge. + M.H.G. någen (Benecke). An imitative word. Der. nag (1).

NEIGHBOUR, one who dwells near. (E.) M. E. neighebour,

Chaucer, C. T. 9423.—A. S. neáhgebúr, a neighbour, John, ix. 8 ; so that the trisyllabic form neigh-e-bour in Chaucer is easily explained. The A.S. form neahbur also occurs, but more rarely. - A.S. neah, nigh; and gebûr, a husbandman, for which see the Laws of Ine, sect. vi, in Thorpe's Ancient Laws, i. 106. The A.S. gebûr or bûr is cognate with Du. boer, a boor (the prefix ge-making no difference). + M. II. G. náchgebúr, náchbúr; mod. G. nachbar. See Nigh and Boor. Der. neighbour, nutnour; moth G. nutnour. See Exign and Boor. Der. neighbour, nutnour; moth G. nutnour. See Exign and Der. neighbour-hod, M. E. neighbour-hede, Prompt. NEITHER, not either, (E.) M. E. nether, Wyclif, Mk. v. 3.

Variously spelt noither, nouther, nother (whence the contracted form nor); earlier nowther (Ormulum, 3124), nawther, nauther; see examples in Stratmann. - A. S. núwber, contracted form of ná-hwæber, neither; Sweet's A. S. Reader. - A. S. ná, no; and hwæber, whether. Thus neither = no-whether; see No and Whether.

B. It is rightly opposed to either, which also contains the word whether; see Either. Doublet, nor. for The word ought rather to be nother; it has been altered under the influence of cither.

NEMESIS, retributive justice. (L., -Gk.) In Shak. I Hen. VI, iv. 7. 78. - Lat. Nemesis. - Gk. νέμεσιε, distribution of what is due, retribution. - Gk. νέμειν, to distribute; see Nomad.

NEOLOGY, the introduction of new phrases. (Gk.) Compounded from Gk. νέο-, crude form of νέοs, new; and -λογία, from λόγοs, discourse, which from λέγειν, to speak. See New and Logic. Der. neologi-c, neologi-c-al, neolog-ise, neolog-ism, neolog-ist.

NEOPHYTE, a new convert, a novice. (L., -Gk.) 'There stands a neophite glazing of his face;' Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iii. 2 (Crites). - Lat. neophytus. -Gk. νεόφυνος, lit. newly planted, hence, a novice. - Gk. νέο-, for νεόs, new; and φυτόν, a plant, φυτόε, grown, from the vb. φύειν, (1) to cause to grow, (2) to grow, allied to E. be. See New and Be.

NEOTERIC, recent, novel. (L.,-Gk.) Spelt neoterique in Minsheu, ed. 1627; but not given in Cotgrave or Littré. - Lat. neotericus. - Gk. νεωτερικός, novel; expanded from νεώτερος, comp. of véos, new, which is cognate with E. new. See New. Der. neoteric-al. NEPENTHE, NEPENTHES, a drug which lulled sorrow. (Gk.) Spelt nepenthe in Spenser, F. Q. iv. 3. 43; better nepenthes, as in Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xxi. c. 21.—Gk. νηπενθές, an epithet of a soothing drug in Homer, Od. iv. 221; neut. of νηπενθής, free from sorrow.—Gk. $\nu\eta$ -, negative prefix allied to E. no; and $\pi\ell\nu\theta$ os, grief, a nasalised form allied to $\pi\delta\theta$ os, suffering. See No and Pathos.

NEPHEW, a brother's or sister's son. (F.,-L.) The old meaning is 'grandson,' as in I Tim. v. 4, &c. The ph is a substitute for the older v, often written u. M. E. neuew (= neuew), Chaucer, neglect; see Neglect. Der. negligent, M.E. negligent, Chaucer, C.T. 7398, from F. negligere; negligere; negligent (Cot.) = Lat. negligentem, acc. of pres. part. of negligere; negligentem; also negligee, from F. negligé, pp. of negliger, to neglect = Lat. negligere.

NEGOTIATE, to do business, transact. (L.) In Minsheu, ed. & b. iii. c. 6 (near the end). [This A.S. word was supplanted by the NEREID, a sea-nymph. (L., -Gk.) Minsheu has the pl. form Nereides. - Lat. Nereid-, stem of Nereis (pl. Nereides), a sea-nymph, a daughter of Nereus. - Gk. Nypets, a sea-nymph, a daughter of Nereus. reus. - Gk. Νηρεύε, an ancient sea-god. - Gk. νηρόε, wet; an allied word to vats, vaids, a naiad; see Naiad.

NERVE, physical strength, firmness, a fibre in the body conveying sensation. (F., -L.) M. E. nerfe, Chaucer, Troilus, b. ii. 1. 642. - F. nerf, 'a sinew, might;' Cot. - Lat. neruum, acc. of neruus, a sinew. + Gk. νεθρον, a sinew, string; cf. Gk. νευρά, a string.
β. The Lat. and Gk. forms have lost an initial s, which appears in G. schnur, a string, cord, line, lace, and in E. snare. The form of the root is SNA, to tie (?); hence also Irish snaidhe, thread, snaithaim, I thread together, and E. needle. See Needle, Snare. Der. nerve, verb, not in early use; nerv-ous, formerly used in the sense of 'sinewy (Phillips), from F. nerveux, 'sinewy' (Cot.), which from Lat. neruosus, full of nerve; nervous-ly, nervous-ness; also nerv-y, i. e. sinewy (ob-

NESH, tender, soft. (E.) Still in use in prov. E. M. E. nesh; 'tendre and nesh;' Court of Love, l. 1092 (15th cent.); 'That tendre was, and swithe [very] nesh;' Havelok, 2743.—A.S. hnæse, knese, soft; Grein, ii. 91. + Goth. hnaskwus, soft, tender, delicate,

NESS, a promontory. (E.) Preserved in place-names, as Tot-ness, Sheer-ness. — A.S. næs, nes, (1) the ground, (2) a promontory, headland, as in Beowulf, ed. Grein, l. 1360; the form næssa also occurs, Grein, ii. 277. + Icel. nes; Dan. næs; Swed. näs.

3. The sense of 'prois due to some confusion with nose; but it is not quite certain that the words are related.

NEST, the bed formed by a bird for her young. (E.) M. E. nest, P. Plowman, B. xi. 336. - A. S. nest, a nest; Grein, ii. 282. + Du. nest. + Swed. näste. + G. nest. + Bret. neiz. + Gael. and Irish nead. + Lat. nidus (for nis-dus). + Lithuan. lizdas (for nizdas); Nesselmann. + Skt. nída, a nest, a den. β. All from NAS, to go to, join oneself to, visit; cf. Skt. nas, to go to, join (Vedic); Gk. νέομαι, νίσσομαι, I go, νόστος, a return home, ναίειν (=νασ-yειν), to dwell. Thus the orig. sense is 'a place to go to,' a home, den, nest. Fick, iii. 161; Curtius, i. 391. Der. nest, vb.; nest-le, a frequentative form, orig. 'to frequent a nest;' nest-ling, with double dimin. suffix (=-l-ing), as in gos-ling, duck-ling.

NET (1), an implement made of knitted or knotted twine for catching fish, &c. (E.) M. E. net, nett, Wyclif, John, xxi. 6.—A.S. net, nett, Grein, ii. 282. + Du. net. + Icel. and Dan. net. + Swed.

nät. + Goth. nati. + G. netz.

β. Root uncertain; some consider it to be related to Goth. natjan, to wet, netzen, to wet, to steep; these are rather related words than original verbs, as shewn by their form. Probably named from their employment in rivers; cf. Skt. ¶ Certainly not connected with knit, which has nada, a river. initial k. Der. net, verb, (1) to use a net, (2) to make a net; nett-ing,

NET (2), clear of all charges. (F., -L.) Merely a doublet of neat; sec Neat (2).

NETHER, lower. (E.) M. E. nethere; 'the ouere lippe and the nethere' = the upper lip and the lower one, Wright's Vocab. i. 146, l. 14. = A. S. neodera, neodra, Ps. lxxxvii. 6, ed. Spelman. A comparative adj. due to the compar. adv. nider, niodor, downward; Grein, ii. 294. Related forms are nide, adv. below, neodan, adv. below, Grein, ii. 294, 290; but these are really forms suggested by nider, and not original ones. β. In fact, the word is to be divided as ne-ther, the suffix -ther being comparative, as in o-ther, and answering to the -ter in af-ter, and the Skt. -tara (Gk. -repos). + Icel. neori, nether, lower; neoarr, adv. lower; cf. neoan, from below. + Dan. neder-, in comp. nederdeel, the lower part of a thing; cf. neden, adv. below, nede, ned, down. + Swed. nedre, nether, as in nedre läppen, the nether lip; cf. nedre, below, neder, ned, down. + G. nieder, nether, lower. γ . As said above, the base is ni, and the orig. Teut, form is NI-THAR. This is shewn at once by the Skt. nitarim, adv. used in the sense of 'excessively, continually,' but grammatically a comparative form (with suffix -tara) from ni, downward, into. Cf. also Russ. nije, lower. Der. nethermost, I Kings, vi. 6; a false form, due to a popular etymology which connected the ending with most (as if the sense were 'most more down,' an absurd expression); it is really a corruption of A.S. nicemesta, in Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, b. ii. pr. 2 (cap. vii. § 3); and A. S. ni-de-m-est- is from ni, down, with the Aryan suffixes tama- (as in Lat. op-ti-mus, best) and the usual A. S. superl. suffix -est. For a further account of these double superl. forms, see After, Aftermost. Also be-neath.

F. form.] + O. H. G. nefo, nevo, G. neffe. Cf. Gk. dveψιόs, a first - A.S. netele, netle; Cockayne, A.S. Leechdoms, iii. 340. + Du. cousin, kinsman. Root uncertain. Der. nepot-ism, i. e. favouritism to relations, from Lat. stem nepot-, with suffix -ism. See niece.

O. H. G. nezzilá, nezilá.

B. A dimin. form, with suffix -la= Aryan -ra; the simple form appears in O. H. G. nazza, Gk. κνίδη, y. The Gk. form shews that the Teut. forms have a nettle. lost an initial h, which easily drops off in the Teut. languages. The common Teut. type is HNATILA, dimin. of HNATYA; see Fick, iii. 81. 8. All from a Teut. base HNAT = Gk. KNAD, to sting, scratch; cf. Gk. κναδ-άλλειν, to scratch; we also find Gk. κνίζειν (= wio-yew), to scrape, grate, cause to itch, but this is a derivative from the sb. wildy. Thus the orig. sense is 'scratcher;' alluding to its stinging. Allied to Nit, q.v. Der. nettle-rash; nettle, vb., Phillips, ed. 1706.

NEURALGIA, pain in the nerves. (Gk.) Modern; not in Todd's Johnson. Coined from Gk. νευρ-, stem of νεῦρον, a nerve, cognate with Lat. neruus; and Gk. άλγ-, stem of άλγοs, pain (root uncertain); with Gk. suffix -ia (-ia). See Norve. Der. neuralg-i-c. NEUTER, neither, sexless, taking neither part. (L.) The duke . . . abode as neuter and helde with none of both parties; Berners, tr. of Froissart, vol. i. c. 252 (R.)—Lat. neuter, neither. Compounded of ne, not; and uter, whether of the two (put for quoter), cognate with E. Whether, q. v. Cf. Skt. katara, whether of two. Thus neuter=no-whether; which is the exact force of E. neither; see Neither. Der. neutr-al, Macb. ii. 3. 115, from Lat. neutralis; neutr-al-ly, neutral-ise, neutral-is-at-ion; neutral-i-ty = F.

neutralité (Cotgrave), from Lat. acc. neutralitatem.

NEVER, not ever, at no time. (E.) M.E. neuer (with u for v), Chaucer, C. T. 1135.—A.S. næfre; compounded of ne, not, and æfre, ever; Grein, ii. 275. See No and Ever. Der. never-the-less, M.E. neuerpeles, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 9, 1. 16, substituted for the earlier form napeles = A. S. na pé læs (= no-the-less, not the less). In this phrase, the A.S. bé, also written bý, is the instrumental case of the def. article se, seo, pæt, and is cognate with Goth. the, on that account, instrum. case of sa, so, thata; for examples, see læs in Grein, ii. 164. See The.

NEW, recent, fresh. (E.) M. E. newe (dissyllabic), Chaucer, C.T. 459, 8733. - A.S. niwe, neowe, niowe, Grein, ii. 298. + Du. nieuw. + Icel. nýr. + Dan. and Swed. ny. + Goth. niujis. + G. neu, O. H. G. niuwi. + Lat. nouus. + W. newydd. + Irish nua, nuadh, Gael. nuadh. + Lithuan. naujas; of which an older form was perhaps nawas (Nesselmann). + Russ. novuii. + Gk. νέον. + Skt. nava, new. We also find Skt. nútana, new, fresh. β. All formed new. We also find Skt. nútana, new, fresh. β. All formed from a base NU, which is no other than E. now; cf. Skt. nu, nú, now; see Now. Thus new means 'that which is now,' recent. Der. new-ly, = A. S. niwlice, Grein, ii. 299; new-ness, used by Sir T. More, Works, p. 1328 g; new-ish, new-fashioned; and see newfangled, news, re-new; also nov-el, nov-ice.

NEWEL, the upright column about which a circular staircase winds. (F.,-L.) 'The staires, . . . let them bec upon a faire open winds. (r.,=L.) The staires, ... let them bee upon a naire open newell, and finely raild in; Bacon, Essay 45, Of Building. Cotgrave, s.v. noyau, spells it nuell, which is an older and better spelling. The right sense is much the same as that of nucleus, with which word it is closely connected. The form shews that the word was borrowed early, prob. not later than A.D. 1400. - O.F. nual (12th cent., see Littre), later F. noyau, 'the stone of a plumme, also, the nuell or spindle of a winding staire;' Cot. So called because it is the centre or nucleus of the staircase, round which the steps are ranged. - Lat. nucale, neut. of nucalis, lit. belonging to a nut; hence applied to the kernel of a nut or the stone of a plum. — Lat. nuc-, stem of nux, a nut; with suffix -alis. See Nucleus.

NEWFANGLED, fond of what is new, novel. (E.) The old sense is 'fond of what is new;' see Shak. L. L. i. i. 1. 106, As You Like It, iv. 1. 152; and in Palsgrave. The final -d is a late addition to the word, due to a loss of a sense of the old force of -le (see below); the M.E. form is newefangel (4 syllables), fond of novelty, Chaucer, C.T. 10032. So also Gower, C.A. ii. 273: 'But euery newe loue quemeth To him, that newefangel is '= but every new love pleases him who is fond of what is new.

B. Compound in of newe, new; and fangel, ready to seize, snatching at, not found in A. S., but formed with perfect regularity from the base fang, to take (occurring in A. S. fang-en, pp. of fón, contracted form of fangan, to take), with the suffix -el (=A. S. -ol) used to form adjectives descriptive of an agent.

7. This suffix is preserved in jectives descriptive of an agent. γ . This suffix is preserved in mod. E. witt-ol = one who knows, sarcastically used to mean an idiot; cf. A.S. spree-ol, fond of talking, talkative; wae-ol, vigilant; and see Nimble. So also formal ford of talking. and see Nimble. So also fangel = fond of taking, readily adopting, and new-fangle = fond of taking up what is new; whence new-fangle-d, by later addition of d.

8. The suffix -ol, by the usual interchange of l and r, is nothing but another form of the familiar suffix -er, NETTLE, a well-known stinging plant. (E.) M. E. netle, nettle expressive of the agent. Thus newfangle = new-fang-er. See (better with one t); 'Nettle in, dock out;' Chaucer, Troil iv. 461. Fang. Der. newfangled-ness, a corruption of M. E. newefangelnes,

NEWS, what is new, tidings. (E.) Formerly newes, which does not seem to be older than about A. D. 1500. 'Desyrous to here newes;' Berners, tr. of Froissart, vol. i. c. 66. 'What newes he brought;' Surrey, tr. of Virgil, Æn. ii. 1, 95. It is nothing but a plural, formed from new treated as a sb.; so also tidings. It is a translation of F. nouvelles, news, pl. of nouvelle, new (Cotgrave); so also Lat. noua = new things, i. e. news. See New. Der. news-boy, -monger,

I Hen. IV, iii. 2, 25, -paper, -room, -vendor.

NEWT, a kind of lizard. (E.) This is one of the words which has taken to itself an initial n, borrowed from the indef. art. an; see remarks on the letter N. A newt = an ewt. M. E. newte, ewte.

*Newte, or ewte, wyrme, lacertus; 'Prompt. Parv. p. 355. Ewte is a contraction of the older form euele (= evete). The O. F. lesard, a lizard, is glossed by evete (the MS. prob. has evete), in Walter de Biblesworth; see Wright's Vocab. i. 150.—A.S. efeta; 'Lacerta, efeta,' in a gloss; Wright's Voc. i. 78, col. 2. \(\beta \). The word is to be divided as ef-eta, where -eta is a suffix due to Aryan suffix -ta; see March, A. S. Grammar, p. 120. The base ef-, for af-, answers to Aryan AP, signifying 'river;' cf. Skt. ap, water (whence apchara, living in water), Lithuan. uppis, a stream.

7. The Lithuanian has the parallel form uppetakis, adj., that which goes in the water, which was used as a sb. to mean 'a trout' (Nesselmann). Hence a newt or eft is a 'water-animal,' or inhabitant of a stream, a name due to their amphibious nature. The mod. prov. E. eft is a contraction of A.S. efeta. For further references, see King Alisaunder, 1. 6027, Mandeville's Travels, p. 61, &c.; see Stratmann.

NEXT, nighest, nearest. (E.) Next is a doublet of nighest, of which it is an older spelling. 'When he bale is hest, henne is he bote nest' = when the sorrow is highest, then is the remedy nighest; Proverbs of Hendyng, st. 23. This is often cited in the form: 'When help is heat then heat is next,' and interest the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the state of the st bale is hext, then bote is next;' and just as hext or hest is a contraction of M. E. hehest (highest), so is next or nest a contraction of M. E. nehest (nighest). See Stratmann, s. v. neh. The A.S. forms are neáhst, néhst, nýhst, níhst, niehst; Grein, ii. 283. See Nigh.

NIB, the point of a pen. (E.) Another form of neb, which is the seem to be old. See Neb. Der. nipp-le, q. v.

NIBBLE, to eat in small portions. (E.) In Shak. Temp. iv. 1.

2. Not connected with nib, or neb, but with nip, of which it is the frequentative form, and means 'to nip often.' In fact, it has lost an initial k, and stands for knibble, just as nip does for knip. + Low G. nibbeln, knibbeln, to nibble, gnaw slightly; Bremen Wort. Cf. also Du. knibbelen, to cavil, haggle; the same word, differently employed.

See Nip. Der. nibbl-er.

NICE, hard to please, fastidious, dainty, delicious. (F., -L.) M. E. nice, foolish, simple; later, it took the sense of fastidious; and lastly, that of delicious. In Chaucer, C.T. 5508, 6520; in the latter passage 'wise and nothing nice' = wise and not simple at all. So also in P. Plowman, B. xvi. 33. 'For he was nyce, and kowbe no wisdom' = for he was foolish, and knew no wisdom; Rob. of Glouc. p. 106, last line. — O. F. nice, 'lazy, slothful, idle, faint, slack, dull, simple; 'Cot. The orig. sense was 'ignorant.'-Lat. nescium, acc. of nessius, ignorant.—Lat. ne, not; and sci., related to scire, to know. See No and Science. the sense may have been due to confusion with E. nesh, which sometimes meant 'delicate' as well as 'soft.' Der. nice-ty. M. E. nicetee, Chaucer, C. T. 4044, from O. F. nicete, 'sloth, simplicity' (Cot.);

NICHE, a recess in a wall, for a statue. (F.,-Ital.,-L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. - F. niche, 'a niche;' Cot. - Ital. nicchia, a niche; closely allied to nicchio, a shell, hence a shell-like recess in a wall, so called (probably) from the early shape of it. Florio explains nicchio as 'the shell of any shell-fish, a nooke or comer, also such little cubboords in churches as they put images in or as images stand in.' - Lat. mitulum, mytilum, acc. of mitulus, mytilus, a seamuscle. 'Derived in the same way as Ital. secchia from situla, a bucket, and Ital. vecchio from Lat. uetulus, old; as to the change of initial, cf. Ital. nespola with Lat. mespilum, a medlar; Diez. A similar change of initial occurs in E. napkin, due to Lat. mappa. β. Referred by some to Gk. μυτίλοι, a muscle; but the Gk. word may be of Lat. origin. The Lat. mytilus is also found in the form mūsulus, and is allied to musculus, a little mouse, also a sea-muscle: cf. Gk. µvaf, a sea-muscle.

γ. All dimin. forms from mu-, put for mus, a mouse. See Muscle, Mouse.

¶ The similarity to ¶ The similarity to E. nick is accidental.

NICK (1), a small notch. (O. Low G.) ⁴ Though but a stick with a nick; Fotherby, Atheom., p. 62, ed. 1622 (Todd's Johnson). ⁴To nick, to hit the time right; I nick'd it, I came in the nick of time, NICK (1), a small notch. (O. Low G.) 'Though but a stick with a nick;' Fotherby, Atheom., p. 62, ed. 1622 (Todd's Johnson).
'To nick, to hit the time right; I nick'd it, I came in the nick of time, just in time. Nick and notch, i. e. crena, are synonymous words, and to attain, Lat. nancisci, to acquire. Thus the sense of nigh is 'that Chaucer, C. T. 10924; formed by adding -nes (-ness) to M. E. newe- to nick a thing seems to me to be originally no more than to hit just the notch or mark; J. Ray, pref. to Collection of English (dialectal)

NEWS, what is new, tidings. (E.) Formerly newes, which does Words, ed. 1691. Nick is an attenuated form of nock, the old spelling of notch, and means a little notch; so also tip from top. See Notch. β. Hence nick, a score on a tally, a reckoning; 'out of all nick' past all counting, Two Gent. iv. 2. 76. Der. nick, to notch slightly,

Com. Errors, v. 175.

NICK (2), the devil. (E.) In the phrase 'Old Nick.' A name taken from the old Northern mythology. A. S. nicor, a water-sprite; Beowulf, ed. Grein, ll. 422, 575, 845, 1427. Heel. nykr, a fabulous water-goblin. + Dan. nök, nisse. + Swed. näcken, a sea-god. + O. H. G. nichus, a water-sprite; fem. nichessa; G. nix, fem. nixe.

Root unknown; cf. Fick, iii. 163.

NICKEL, a grayish white metal. (G., -Gk.?) One of the few G. words in E. Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. -G. nickel, nickel; kupfernickel, nickel of copper.

B. In Mahn's Webster we are told that nickel is an abbreviation of kupfer-nickel, i.e. 'copper of Nick, or Nicholas, a name given in derision, as it was thought to be a base ore of copper.' The Swed. form kopparnickel is added, word, but borrowed from Gk. Nikoláo; cf. Acts, vi. 5.

NICKNACK, the same as Knickknack, q. v.
NICKNAME, a surname, soubriquet. (E.) In Shak. Romeo, ii. 1. 12. One of the words which has acquired an unoriginal initial n; see remarks on the letter N. M. E. nekename, corruption of ekename, an additional name; in later times changed to nickname, from a popular etymology which connected the word with the verb nick, which properly means 'to notch,' not 'to clip.' It may further be remarked that a nickname is not so much a docking of the name, as an addition to it, a sur-name. 'Neke-name, or eke-name, agnomen; Prompt. Parv. p. 352. Way cites in his note similar glosses, such as: 'Agnomen, an ekename, or a surename (sic),' Medulla; 'An ekname, agnomen;' Catholicon. Spelt ekename, Testament of Love; Chaucer's Works, ed. 1561, p. 295 back, col. 2, l. 9. There can be no doubt as to the purely E. origin of the word, which has just the sense of Lat. agnomen, and is a mere variation of M. E. toname, a to-name, additional name, surname (cognate with G. zuname, a nickname), for which see P. Plowman, C. xiii. 211, Layamon, 9383. the word is simply compounded of eke and name; see Eke, Name. + Icel. auknafn, a nickname; from auka, to eke, and nafn, a name. + Swed. öknamn, from öka, to eke, and namn, a name. + Dan. ögenavn, rom öge, to eke. Der. nickname, verb, Hamlet, iii. 1.151.

NICOTIAN, belonging to tobacco. (F.) 'Your Nicotian [tobacco] is good too; Ben Jonson, Every Man, ed. Wheatley, A. iii. sc. 5, 1. 89.—O. F. Nicotiane, 'Nicotian, tobacco, first sent into France by Nicot in 1560;' Cot. Coined, with fem. suffix -iane France by Nicot in 1500; Cot. Comed, with constant (=Lat. -iana), from the name Nicot. Der. Hence also nicot-ine.

NTECE, the daughter of a brother or sister. (F.,-L.) The fem. form of nephew. M. E. nece, Rob. of Glouc. p. 353, l. 9; spelt neyce, King Alisaunder, l. 1712. — O. F. niece, mod. F. nièce. Cf. Prov. nepta, a niece, in Bartsch, Chrestomathie Provençale. — Low Lat. neptia, which occurs A. D. 809 (Brachet). - Lat. neptis, a granddaughter, a nicce; used as fem. of nepos (stem nepot-); see Nephew.

NIGGARD, a miser. (Scand.) M. E. nigard (with one g), Chaucer, C. T. 5915; whence the sh. nigardie, id. 13102. The suffix
-ard is of F. origin, as usual; and the F. -ard is of O. H. G. origin; see Brachet, Introd. to F. Etym. Dict. § 196. But this suffix was freely added to E. words, as in drunk-ard; and we find a parallel form in M. E. nygun. '[He was] a nygun and auarous' = he was a niggard and an avaricious man; Rob. of Brunne, Handlyng Synne, 1. 5578. We also find an adj. niggish; Richardson. Of Scand. origin. - Icel. knöggr, niggardly, stingy; Swed. njugg, niggardly, scanty, noga, exact, strict, precise; Dan. nöie, exact. + G. genau, close, strict, precise. + A. S. hneiw, sparing.

β. These forms answer to a Teut. type HNAWA, sparing; Fick, iii. 81. The form of the root is KNU (= Teut. HNU), preserved in Gk. κνύειν, to scratch, κνύοι, the itch, *\(\nu\)\vi\(\nu\)\a, a scratching; so that the orig. sense is 'one who scrapes.' Der. *\(\ni\)\gamma(\nu\)\range Hamlet, iii. 1. 13; *\(\ni\)\gamma(\nu\)\gamma(\nu\)\range Hen. V, ii. 4. 46; niggard-ly, adv., Merry Wives, ii. 2. 205; niggard-li-ness.

NIGH, near, not far off, close. (E.) M. E. neh, neih, ney, neigh, nigh; Chaucer, C. T. 1528; Havelok, 464; &c. - A. S. neih, neh, Grein, ii. 282, used as adj., adv., and prep. + Du. na, adv., nigh. + Icel. ná-, adv., nigh; only used in composition, as ná-búi, a neighbour. + Goth. nehw, nehwa, adv., nigh; whence nehwjan, to draw nigh. + G. nahe, adj., nach, prep., nigh, next, &c. \(\beta\). These forms answer to a Teut. type NAHW or NAHWA, adv., nigh, nearly, Chaucer, C. T. 23. -A. S. niht, neht, neaht, Grin, ii. 284.+Du. nacht. +Icel. nátt, nótt.+Dan. nat.+Swed. natt.+Goth. nahts.+G. nacht. +W. nos.+Irish nochd.+ Lithuan. nakis.+Russ. noche.+Lat. nox (stem noct-).+Gk. νύξ (stem νυκτ-).+Skt. nakta. β. All from the NAK, to fail, disappear, perish, from the failure of light; cf. Skt. nac, to disappear, Gk. vén-vs, a corpse, Lat. nex, death, destruction, Skt. nashta, lost, invisible, dead. Der. night-cap, -dress, -fall, -jar (from its jarring noise), -piece, -watch; also night-ly, M. E. nihtliche, Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 131 (Stratmann), night-less, night-ward; also numerous compounds in Shak., as -bird, -crow, -dog, -fly, -foe, -gown, &c. And see night-mare, night-shade, night-in-gale, nocturn.

NIGHTINGALE, the bird that sings by night. (E.) before g is excrescent, as in messenger for messager, passenger for passager, &c. M. E. nightingale, Chaucer, C. T. 98; earlier form niztegale, Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 241 (Stratmann).—A. S. nihtegale, Wright's Vocab. i. 62, col. 2. Lit. 'singer of the night.'—A. S. nihte, gen. case of niht, neaht, night; and gale = singer, from galan, to sing (Grein). + Du. nachtegaal. + Dan. nattergal. + Swed. nähtergal. + G. nachtigall, O. H. G. nahtagala, nahtegala, nahtigala. β. In each case the second syllable is due to a case-ending of the sb.; thus Dan. natter, Swed. näkter, answer to an O. Icel. gen. sing. náttar, mod. Icel. nætr; cf. Icel. náttartal, a tale or number of nights, a parallel form to nightertale in Chaucer, C. T. 97.

γ. The verb galan became galen in M. E., and occurs in Chaucer, C. T. 6414; it is cognate with Dan. gale, Swed. gala, to crow as a cock, O. H. G. kalan, to sing; and is closely related to E. yell. See Yell.

NIGHTMARE, an incubus, a dream at night accompanied by pressure on the breast. (E.) M. E. nightemare. Nyghte mare, or mare, or wytche, Epialtes, vel effialtes [ephialtes]; Prompt. Parv. [Tyrwhitt's reading of nightes mare in Chaucer, C. T. 3485, is unauthorised.] – A. S. neaht, niht, night; and mara, a night-mare, a rare word, occurring in Cockayne's A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 306, l. 12. + Du. nachtmerrie, a night-mare; an accommodated spelling, due to confusion with Du. merrie, a mare, with which the word has no connexion. A like confusion is probably common in modern English, though the A. S. forms are distinct. + Icel. mara, the nightmare, an ogress. + Swed. mara. + Dan. mare. + Low G. moor, nagi-moor; Bremen Wörterbuch, iii. 184, where the editor, against the evidence, confuses moor with Low L. märe, a marc. + O. H. G. mara, a nightmare, incubus; also spelt mar.

β. The sense is 'crusher;' from MAR, to pound, bruise, crush; see Mar. The A.S., Icel., and mare, incubus; also spelt mar. O. H.G. suffix -a denotes the agent, as in numerous other cases; e. g. A. S. hunt-a, a hunter, huntsman.

NIGHTSHADE, a narcotic plant. (E.) A. S. nihtscadu, nihtscada, nightshade; Cockayne's A.S. Leechdoms, iii. 340. Compounded of niht, night, and scadu, shade; perhaps because thought to be evil, and loving the shade of night. See Night, Shade.

NIGRESCENT, growing black. (L.) In Todd's Johnson.

nic-, allied to Skt. nig, night, which is an attenuated form of nakta, night. Thus the sense of niger is 'night-like.' See Night, Negro. Der. nigritude, from Lat. nigritudo, blackness; see Hood's Poems, A Black Job, last line but one.

NIMBLE, active. (E.) The b is excrescent. M. E. nimel, nimil see 'Nymyl, capax' in Prompt. Parv., and Way's note. Formed from A. S. nim-an, to take, catch, seize, with the A. S. suffix -ol, still preserved in E. witt-ol, lit, a wise man, used sarcastically to mean a simpleton. We find the parallel A.S. forms numol, numul, numel, occurring in the compounds scearp-numul, lit. 'sharp-taking,' i. e. efficacious, and teart-numul, also lit. 'tart-taking,' i.e. efficacious; Cockayne's A.S. Leechdoms, i. 134, l. 10, 152, l. 3, and footnotes; these are formed from num-, the base of the past tense pl. and pp. of the same verb niman. The sense is 'quick at seizing,' hence active, nimble. So also Icel. næma, keen, quick at learning, from nema, to take; Dan. nem, quick, apprehensive, adroit, from nemme, to apprehend, learn.

β. The A.S. niman, to seize, is cognate with Icel. nema, Dan. nemme, G. nehmen, Goth. niman, to take; a strong verb, with A.S. and Goth. pt. t. nam. The orig. sense is 'to take as one's share.' - I NAM, to apportion, distribute, allot; whence also Gk. νέμειν, to distribute, Lat. num-erus, a number, &c. Der. nimbl-y, simble-ness. From the same root, nem-esis, nom-ad, num-b-er, numism-at-ic. And see Numb.

NINE, a numeral, one less than ten. (E.) M. E. nyne, nine, Chaucer, C. T. 24. Here the final -e is the usual pl. ending, and nyne which reaches to, or 'that which suffices.' Der. near, q.v., neigh-& Dan. ni.+ Swed. nio.+ G. neun.+ Goth. niun.+ W. naw.+ Irish and bour, q.v., next, q.v. And see necessary, enough.

NIGHT, the time of the sun's absence. (E.) M. E. niht, night;

B. All from an orig. NAWAN, nine; of unknown origin. Cf. also Lithuan. devyni, devyni (Nesselmann), nine, Russ. deviate, with initial d for n. As Curtius remarks, the word reminds us of Skt. nava, Lat. nouns, new, and perhaps points 'to an old system of numbering by fours;' but this is mere guesswork. Der. nine-fold, nine-pins; nine-teen, A.S. nigontyne (Grein); nine-ty, A.S. nigontig (Grein); nin-th, A. S. nigoda, nigeda (id.); nine-teen-th, nine-ti-eth; nin-th-ly. And see Novem-ber.

NINNY, a simpleton. (Ital.) 'What a pied ninny's this!' Temp. iii. 2. 71. – Ital. ninno, a child, a dialectal form cited by Diez, not given in Florio nor in Meadows Dict., but the same word with Span. niño, a child, infant, one of little experience. Of imitative origin; cf. Ital. ninna, a lullaby, nurse's song to rock a child to sleep, ninnare, to lull to sleep, nanna, 'a word that women use to still their children with' (Florio). From the repetition of the syllables ni, ni, or na, na, in humming or singing children to sleep. See Nun.

NIP, to pinch, break off the edge or end. (E.) M. E. nippen; 'nyppyng his lyppes' = biting his lips, pressing them with his teeth, P. Plowman, C. vii. 104. Put for knip; see G. Douglas, Prol. to XII Book of the Eneid, l. 94. Not found in A.S., though the derivative enif, a knife, occurs; see Knife. + Du. knijpen, to pinch; cerivative enst, a kniie, occurs; see Kniie. + Du. knippen, to pinch, knippen, to fillip, crack, snap, entrap. + Dan. knibe, to pinch, nip. + Swed. knipa, to pinch, squeeze, catch. + G. kneifen, to pinch, nip; kneipen, to pinch, twitch. + Lithuan. żnybti, żnypti, to pinch, nip, as a crab with his claws, to bite as a goose with its beak (Nesselman). β. All from a Teut. base KNIB, to nip (Fick, iii. 48). Der. nip, sb., a cut, Tam. Shrew, iv. 3. 90; nipp-er, nipp-ers, nibb-le. And see knife, neap.

NIPPLE, a teat, a small projection with an orifice. (E.) In Shak. Macb. i. 7. 57; and in Minsheu, ed. 1627. A dimin. of nib, just as neble is the dimin. of neb. 'Neble of a womans pappe, bout de la mamelle; Palsgrave. Nib and neb are the same word; see Nib, Neb. The alleged 'A. S. nypele, a nipple,' in Lye's Dict., is wholly unauthorised. Der. nipple-wort.

NIT, the egg of a louse or small insect. (E.) M. E. nite, nyte, also used to mean a louse. 'Nyte, wyrme, Lens;' Prompt. Parv. — A.S. hnitu, to translate Lat. lens; Wright's Vocab. i. 24, col. 1. + Du. neet. + Icel. nitr, O. Icel. gnit. + Dan. gnid. + Swed. gnet. + G. niss, M. H. G. niz. Cf. also Russ. gnida, a nit, Gk. κόνιε (stem κόνιδ-). β. The Teut. type is HNITI or HNITA; Fick, iii. 81; the sense is 'that which attacks' or 'stings' (orig. 'that which makes to itch'), from the Teut. base HNIT, to attack, thrust. This appears in A. S. hnitan, only used of an ox, meaning 'to gore,' Exod. xxi. 28, Icel. hnita, to attack, strike. The corresponding Aryan root is KNID, appearing in Gk. κνίζειν (= κνίδ-γειν), to scrape, tease, make to itch; and KNID is another form of KNAD, which is the root of nettle; see Nettle.

MITRE, saltpetre. (F., -L., -Gk., -Arab.) Spelt niter in Minsheu, ed. 1627.-F. nitre, 'niter;' Cot.-Lat. nitrum.-Gk. νίτρον, 'natron, a mineral alkali, our potassa or soda, or both (not our nitre, i.e. saltpetre);' Liddell and Scott. This means that the sense of the word has changed; but the form is the same. - Arab. nitrún, natrún, natron, native alkaline salt; Rich. Dict. p. 1585. Der. nitr-ate, nitr-ic, nitr-ous, nitr-i-fy, nitr-ite. Also nitro-gen, i. e. that which produces nitre, from virpo-, crude form of virpov, and $\gamma \in \nu$ -, base of $\gamma i \gamma \nu \in \nu$, to produce; see Generate.

NO (1), a word of refusal or denial. (E.) M. E. no, Will. of Palerne, 2701, 3115. There is a clear distinction in M. E. between no and nay, the former being the stronger form; see Nay, which is of Scand. origin.—A.S. ná, nó, adv., never, no. Compounded of ne, not, and á, ever. The form á became oo in M.E., occurring in Genesis and Exodus, ed. Morris, l. 111; but this form was entirely superseded by the cognate word ai, ay, mod. E. ay, aye, which is of Scand. origin. See Aye, adv., ever. B. The neg. particle ne, signifying not, is cognate with O. H. G. ni, M. H. G. ne, not; Goth. ni, not; Russ. ne, not; Irish, Gael., and W. ni, not; Lat. ne, in non-ne; Skt. na, not. The Skt. form na is the most original. C. In mod. E. this neg. particle is represented by the initial n- of n-ever, n-aught, n-one, n-either, n-ay, n-or, and the like. ¶ It is quite a mistake to suppose that the M.E. ne, not, so common in Chaucer, is of F. origin. It is rather the A.S. ne, which happens to coincide in form with F. ne, of Lat. origin; and that is all.

NO (2), none. (E.) Merely a shortened form of none, as a is of an; see None. Der. no-body, q. v.

NOBLE, illustrious, excellent, magnificent. (F., -L.) In early use. M. E. noble, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, i. 273, l. 16. -F. stands for an older form nizene, extended form of nizen, Layamon, noble. - Lat. nobilem, acc. of nobilis (= gno-bilis), well-known, notable, 2804. - A. S. nigon, nigen, Grein, ii. 296. + Du. negen. + Icel. níu. + illustrious, noble. - Lat. gno-, base of noscere (= gnoscere), to know, adv.; noble-man, in O. Eng. Homilies, as above; noble-ness (a hybrid word, with E. suffix), Wint. Tale, ii. 3, 12. Also nobil-i-ty, K. John, word, with E. suffix), with Lake, at 3. 2. 2. 2. 42, from O. F. nobilite, nobilitet = Lat. acc. nobilitatem.

NOBODY, no one. (E.) In Shak. Merry Wives, i. 4. 14. Compounded of no, short for none, and body; not in early use. the place of M. E. no man, which is now not much used. See None and Body.

NOCK, the old form of Notch, q. v.

NOCTURN, the name of a service of the church. (F.,-L.) See Palmer, Origines Liturgicae, i. 202, ed. 1832. 'A nocturne of the Psalter;' Lord Berners, tr. of Froissart, vol. ii. c. 26 (R.) M. E. nocturne, Ancren Riwle, p. 270, l. 1. - F. nocturne, nocturnal; also, a nocturn. - Low Lat. nocturna, a nocturn; o ig. fem. of Lat. nocturnus, belonging to night. B. To be divided as noc-tur-nus, answering to Gk. vvs-rep-190s, nocturnal; from noc- = noct-, stem of nox, night, cognate with E. night; with Aryan suffixes -tar and -na. See Night. Der. nocturn-al, Milton, P. L. iii. 40, viii. 134, from late

Lat. nocturnalis, extended from nocturnus; nocturnal-ty.

NOD, to incline the head forward. (E.) M. E. nodden, Chaucer,
C. T. 16996. Not found in A.S., and difficult to trace. But it answers to a G. form notten*, found in the frequentative form nottein, a prov. G. word, meaning to shake, wag, jog (Flügel). To nod is to shake the head by a sudden inclination forwards, as is done by a sleepy person; to make a butting movement with the head. Closely allied to M. H. G. nuotύn, O. H. G. hnútún, to shake. β. A Closely allied to M. H. G. nuotón, O. H. G. hnótón, to shake. β. A parallel form occurs in prov. E. nog, to jog, to move on (Halliwell); Lowland Sc. noggan, 'walking steadily, and regularly nodding the head' (Jamieson). Cf. also Low Sc. nodge, to strike with the knuckles, nodge, a push or stroke, properly with the knuckles (Jamieson); mod. E. nudge. The orig. notion seems to be that of butting or pushing; and there is a connection with Icel. hnjóha, to hammer, clinch, rivet, hnyðja, a rammer for beating turf. Fick (iii. 82) gives HNUD as the form of the Teut. base of the latter words. See also Knock, Nudge. Not connected with Lat. nuere, to nod (base nu). Der. nod, sb.

NODDLE, a name for the head. (E.) In Shak. Tam. Shrew is NODDLE, a name for the head. (E.) In Shak. Tam. Shrew, i. 1. 64. Wedgwood well says: 'the noddle, noddock, or niddock is properly the projecting part at the back of the head, the nape of the neck, then ludicrously used for the head itself. M. E. nodle, nodil. 'Nodyl, or nodle of the head, or nolle, Occiput;' Prompt. Parv. B. It really stands for knodlel, and is the dimin. of knod, a word lost in Early É., but preserved in other languages; cf. O. Du. knodde, a knob (Hexham); Icel. hnúôr, a knob, ball; G. knoten, a knot, y. This knod is a mere variant of Knot, q.v. And see Node, below.

NODE, a knot. (L.) 'Nodes, in astronomy, are the points of the intersection of the orbit of the sun or any other (!) planet with the ecliptick; 'Phillips, ed. 1706. 'Nodus or Node, a knot, or noose, &c.; id. - Lat. nodus (= gnodus), a knot; cognate with E. Knot, q. v. Der. nod-ous, Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. iv. c. 4. § 1, Englished from Lat. nodosus; nod-os-i-ty, id. b. v. c. 5. § 2, from F. nodosité, 'knottiness' (Cot.) = Lat. acc. nodositatem; nod-ule, Englished from Lat. nodulus, a little knot, dimin. of nodus.

NOGGIN, a wooden cup, small mug. (C.) 'Of drinking-cups... we have . . mazers, broad-mouthed dishes, noggins, whiskins, piggins, &c.; Heywood, Drunkard Opened, &c., ed. 1635, p. 45 (Todd). Also in Minsheu, ed. 1627. — Irish noigin, 'a noggin, a naggin, quarter of a pint,' O'Reilly; Gael. noigean, a wooden cup. The word has lost an initial c, appearing in Irish cragaire, 'a naggin;' Gael. cragan, a little knob. peg, pin, an earthen pipkin.

B. All Gael. enagan, a little knob. peg, pin, an earthen pipkin.

B. All these words are from Gael. and Irish enag, a knob, peg, also a knock; note also Gael. cnagaire, a knocker, a noggin, cnagaidh, bunchy. Hence the noggin is named from its round form, or from its being made of a knotty piece of wood; cf. Irish enaig, a knot in wood. γ. Also the orig. sense of cnag was a knock, a blow, hence a bump, as being the effect of a blow. All from Irish and Gael. cnag, to knock; see Knag, Knock. ¶ Hence the spelling knoggin in Swift, cited by Richardson, is correct.

NOISE, a din, troublesome sound. (F., -L., -Gk.?) In early use. M. E. noise, Ancren Riwle, p. 66, l. 18. -F. noise, 'a brabble, brawle, debate, . . also a noise; 'Cot. β. The O. F. form is nose; and the Provençal has nausa, nausa, noisa, nueiza (Bartsch). The origin is uncertain; it is discussed by Diez, who decides that the Prov. form nausa could only have been derived from Lat. nausea, so that a noise is so called because nauseous; see Nausea. If this be right, the word is really of Greek origin. Y. Others hold to a derivation from Lat. noxia, harm, as if a noise were noxious; see Noxious. This latter derivation, though at first sight more obvious. See Apparel, and Par. hardly agrees with the Prov. nausa, and perhaps not even with O. F. NONPLUS, a state of perplexity; to perplex. (L.) Most mose. Der. nois-y, for which formerly noise-ful was used, as in Dryden, commonly a verb. 'He has non-plus'd me;' Dryden, Kind Keeper, cognate with E. know; with suffix -bilis. See Know. Der. nobl-y, Annus Mirabilis, st. 40; nois-i-ly, nois-i-ness; noise-less, -ly, -ness; also noise, verb, M. E. noisen, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. iii. met. 6, NOISOME, annoying, troublesome. (F., -L.; with E. suffix.) Formed from M. E. noy, annoyance, injury; with E. suffix -some = A. S. -sum, as in Winsome, q.v. We find three forms in use formerly, viz. noy-ous, Wyclif, 2 Thess. iii. 2; noy-ful, Sir T. More, Works, p. 481 e; and noy-some, id. p. 1389 h. β. Noy is a mere contraction of M. E. anoy, ano; see Romanut of the Rose, 4404, &c. The derivation is from the Lat. phrase in odio habere, as explained

s. v. Annoy, q. v. ¶ Not connected with Lat. nocere, to hurt. NOMAD, wandering; one of a wandering tribe. (Gk.) 'The Numidian nomades, so named of changing their pasture;' Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. v. c. 3. = Gk. νομάδ-, stem of νομάε, roaming, wandering, esp. in search of pasture. = Gk. νομάς, a pasture, allotted abode. -Gk. νέμειν, to assign, allot. - NAM, to assign; cf. Skt. nam, to bow to, bow, bend, upa-nam, to fall to one's share, upa-nata, due. Hence also nem-esis, nim-ble, num-ber; and the suffix -nomy in astronomy, auto-nomy, gastro-nomy, anti-nomi-an. Der. nomad-ic.

NOMENCLATOR, one who gives names to things. (L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627.—Lat. nomenclator, one who gives names, lit. 'name-caller.'-Lat. nomen, a name; and calare, to call. See Name and Calendar. Der. nomenclat-ure, from Lat. nomenclatura, a calling by name, naming.

NOMINAL, pertaining to a name, existing only in name. (L.)
'One is a reall, another a nominall;' Tyndal's Works, p. 104, col. 1; see Spec. of English, ed. Skeat, p. 176, l. 316. This refers to the famous dispute between the Nominalists and Realists; the founder of the former sect was condemned by a council at Soissons, A.D. 1092; Haydn, Dict. of Dates. - Lat. nominalis, nominal. - Lat. nomin-, stem of nomen, a name, cognate with E. Name, q. v. See Nominate. NOMINATE, to name. (L.) In Shak. L. L. L. i. 2. 16. - Lat.

nominatus, pp. of nominare, to name. - Lat. nomin-, stem of nomen, a name, cognate with E. Name, q.v. Der. nomination, Fryth's Works, p. 58, col. 2, from F. nomination, 'a nomination' (Cot.); nominat-or, nominat-ive, M.E. nominatif, Trevisa, i. 327, from O. F. nominatif, in use in the 13th century (Littré), from Lat. nominatiuus. Also nomin-ee, a term of law, formed as if from a F. verb nominer, with a pp. nominé; but the real F. verb is nommer.

NON, prefix, not. (L.) In compounds, such as non-appearance, non-compliance.—Lat. non, not; orig. none, not one; compounded of Lat. ne, not, and oinum, old form of unum, neut. of unus, onc. Thus

I.at. non is of parallel formation with E. None, q. v.
NONAGE, minority. (L.; and F., -L.) In Shak. Rich. III, ii. 13. Compounded of Lat. non, not, and age; see Non- and Age. NONCE, in phr. for the nonce. (E.) M. E. for the nones, Chaucer, C. T. 381. The sense is for the once, for the occasion or purpose. The older spelling is for then ones, still earlier for then anes, as in St. Juliana, ed. Cockayne, p. 71. Thus the n really belongs to the dat. case of the article, viz. A.S. Sim, later San, then. Ones = mod. E. once; see Once. We may note that ones was first a gen. case, then an adv., and was lastly used as a sb., as here.

NONCONFORMING, refusing to conform. (L.; and F., -L.; with E. suffix.) The Act of Uniformity came into operation on 24 Aug. 1662; Haydn, Dict. of Dates. Hence arose the name nonconformist, and the adj. nonconforming. Compounded of Lat. non, not; and Conform, q.v. Der. nonconform-ist, non-conform-i-ty. NONDESCRIPT, not yet described, novel, odd. (L.) Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. - Lat. non, non; and descriptus, pp. of describere, to describe; see Describe.

NONE, not one. (E.) M. E. noon, non; as in 'non other' = no other, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 5. Before a consonant it commonly becomes no, as in mod. E.; but in very early authors we find non even before a consonant, as in 'none tonge;' Rob. of Glouc. no. 285, l. 19.—A.S. nain, none; compounded of ne, not, and an, one; see No(1) § B, and One.

NONENTITY, a thing that does not exist. (L.) In Johnson.

From Non- and Entity.

NONES, the ninth day before the ides. (L.) Also used of the old church service at the ninth hour, which is the older use in E. This ninth hour or nones was orig. 3 P.M., but was changed to midday; whence our noon. See further under Noon.

NONJUROR, one who refuses to take the oath of allegiance. (L.; and F.,-L.) First used of those who refused allegiand Will. III in 1689. From Non- and Juror.

NONPAREIL, one without equal, matchless. (F.,-L.) First used of those who refused allegiance to Shak. Temp. iii. 2, 108. - F. non, not, from Lat. non; and pareil, equal, from Low Lat. pariculus, double dimin. from Lat. par, equal.

iii. I. The orig. phrase was, probably, 'to be at a non-plus,' which with which cf. prov. E. (Essex) gay, a painted picture in a child's occurs in Locke (Todd), and probably earlier. A half-ludicrous coined term for a state of perplexity, in which one can do no more, NOSOLOGY, the science of disease. (Gk.) In Johnson's Dict. nor go any further. - Lat. non plus, no more. See Non- and Plural.

NONSENSE, language without meaning. (L.; and F.,-L.) It occurs, according to Richardson, in an Elegy by Mr. R. B. in Memory of Donne. From Non- and Sense. Der. nonsens-ic-al. NONSUIT, a withdrawal of a suit at law. (L.; and F., -L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, which see. From Non- and Suit.

Der. nonsuit, verb.

NOOK, a corner, recess. (C.) M. E. nok, Havelok, 820; pl. nokes, Cursor Mundi, 17675. The comp. feower-noked = four-cornered, occurs in Layamon, ii. 500, l. 21999. The Lowland Sc. form is new (Jameson); which leads us to the Celtic. = Irish and Gael. niue, a nook, corner. Root unknown; nor is it at all certain that there is any connection with nock or notch.

NOON, midday. (L.) Orig. the ninth hour of the day, or 3 P.M., but afterwards the time of the church-service called nones was altered, and the term came to be applied to midday. M. E. nones, pl., P. Plowman, B. v. 378, vi. 147 (see notes). A. S. non-tid (=noon-tide), the ninth hour, Mark, xv. 33, 34.—Lat. nona, put for nona hora, ninth hour; where nona is the fem. of nonus, ninth. Nonus=noui-mus, from nouem, nine; cf. decimus from decem, ten. The Lat. nouem is cognate with E. Nine, q.v. Der. non-tide, A.S. non-tid, as above; noon-day, Jul. Cæsar, i. 3. 27. Also nones, nun-chion.

NOOSE, a slip-knot. (Unknown.) 'Caught in my own noose;'

Beaum. and Fletcher, Rule a Wife, iii. 4 (Perez). Perhaps not found earlier. Origin unknown; perhaps it is due to O. F. nous, pl. of nou or neu, mod. F. næud, a knot; which is from Lat. nodus, cognate with E. Knot. See Littré. Wedgwood cites Languedoc nouscouren, a running-knot; nouzelut, knotty.

B. Mahn suggests W. nais, a band, tie; Gael. nasg, a tie-band, a wooden collar for a cow; Irish nasc, nasg, a tie, collar, chain, ring; Bret. nask, a cord used for tying up cows by their horns, either to fasten them to the stall, or to lead them about. Cf. Lat. nexus, a tie, fastening, noose. v. The Celtic verb appears in Irish nasgaim, I bind, tie, chain, Gael. naisg, to bind, make fast, Lat. nectere, to fasten. ¶ The vowel occasions a difficulty in the latter case. Der. noose, verb.

NOR, neither. (E.) M. E. nor, short for nother, which is merely another spelling of neither. 'Vor her hors were al astoned, and node after wylle Sywe nober spore ne brydel '= for their horses were all astonied, and would not, according to their will, obey nor spur nor bridle; Rob. of Glouc. p. 396. For a full account of the word, see Matzner, Gramm. ii. 2. 352. See Neither.

NORMAL, according to rule. (L.) A late word; added by Todd to Johnson. - Lat. normalis, made according to a carpenter's square. - Lat. norma, a carpenter's square, rule, pattern. Contracted from a form gnorima*, and perhaps merely a borrowed word from Gk. The corresponding Gk. word is γνωρίμη, fem. of γνώριμος, well-known, whence the sense of 'exact' in Latin; cf. Gk. γνώμων, that which knows or indicates, an index, a carpenter's square. Both γνώμων and γνώμων are from the GNA, to know. See Gnomon and Know. Der. normal-ly; also e-norm-ous, q.v., abnorm-al (modern).

Root unknown. The Skt. nára, water, does not help us; the suggestion that north meant 'rainy quarter' is a mere guess. Der north-ern, Chaucer, C.T. 1989, A.S. nordern (Grein), cognate with O. H. G. norda-róni, where the suffix is from the verb to run, and means north-running, i.e. coming from the north (Fick, iii. 251). Also north-east, west, &c. Also north-ward; north-er-ly (short for northern-ly), &c. Also Nor-man, Nor-se.

Swed arrow; 'Hexham. +O. Swed. nocka, a notch, incision (Ihre); Swed. dial. nokks, nokk, an incision or cut in timber (Rietz). β . Whether this is the same word with Dan. nok, a pin, peg, Icel. hnokki, a small metal hook on a distaff, is not clear; perhaps not, though both senses are given by Rietz under the same form nokk.

7. The O. Ital. nocca, 'the nocke of a bowe' (Florio), is merely a borrowed word from Teutonic; the E. nock is older than the period of our borrowings from Italian. Der. notch, verb, Cor. iv. 5. 199. Also nick (1), q. v.

Lat. nudus = nugdus, allied to Skt. nagna, naked, and to E. Naked, q. v. Der. nude-ly; nud-i-ty, spelt nuditie in Minsheu, from F. nudité, 'nudity' (Cot.), from Lat. acc. nuditatem.

NUGGET, a lump or mass of metal. (E.) Formerly spelt niggot. 'After the fire was quenched, they found in niggots of gold and silver mingled together, about a thousand talents;' North, tr. of and silver mingred together, about a mousand talents; Morin, ir. of Plutarch's Lives, p. 499; cited in Trench, Eng. Past and Present, without a statement of the edition used; it is not that of 1631. Another quotation from the same author is also cited. Niggot is supposed to be a corruption of ningot, which stands for ingot; as to the frequent prefixing of n in English words, see note on the letter N. See Ingot, a purely E. word.

NUISANCE, a troublesome or annoying thing. (F., -L.) Spelt nuissance in Minsheu, ed. 1627; but nuisance is better, as in Cotgrave.

- F. nuisance, 'nuisance, hurt, offence;' Cot. - F. nuisant, 'hurtfull,' id.; properly the pres. part. of nuire, to hurt. - Lat. nocere, to hurt;

see Noxious.

NULL, of no force, invalid. (L.) In Dryden, tr. of Juvenal, Sat. i. 87. Rather from the Lat. than the F.; or prob. suggested by the sb. nullity, which occurs earlier, in Minsheu, ed. 1627.—Lat. nullus, none, not any.—Lat. ne, not, related to E. no; and ullus, any, short for unulus, dimin. from unus, one. See No (1) and One. Der. nulli-i-ty, from F. nullité, 'a nullity' (Cot.), from Low Lat. acc. nullitatem; nulli-fy, formed (as if from F. nullifier) from Lat. nullificare, to make void, from nulli-enullo-, crude form of nullus, and fic-, for facere, to make; also null, verb, Milton, Samson, 935. Also an-nul, NUMB, deprived of sensation. (E.) The b is excrescent; spelt numme in Shak. I Hen. VI, ii. 5. 13 (first folio). M.E. nome, a shortened form of nomen, which was orig. the pp. of M. E. nimen, to take. Thus nome = taken, seized, hence overpowered, and lastly, deprived of sensation. 'When this was said, into weping She fel, as she that was through-nome With love, and so fer overcome' = when this was said, she fell a-weeping, as being thoroughly overcome by love, &c.; Gower, C. A. ii. 249. Gower uses the same word nome elsewhere in the ordinary sense of 'taken;' C. A. ii. 227, l. 23, ii. 386, l. 4. = A. S. numen, pp. of niman, to take; see Nimble. So also Icel numinn, the pp. of nema, to take, is similarly used; as in numinn mdli, bereft of speech; fjörvi numna, life-bereft. Der. benumb, q.v.; also numb, verb, Spenser, F. Q. vi. 11. 45; numb-ness, Wint. Tale, v. 3. 102 (spelt numnesse in the first folio). Also numscull.

NUMBER, a unit in counting, a quantity. (F., -L.) The b is excrescent in the F. form. M. E. nombre, noumbre, Rob. of Glouc.

Du. schenkhan means a pot with a pipe or a gullet (see Philip de Thaun, Livre des Creatures, l. 127, in Wright, Popular to pour out, Sewel. A precisely parallel interchange of sense occurs Treatises on Science, p. 24).—Lat. numerum, acc. of numerus, a in G. rohr, a reed, tube, pipe; whence röhrbein, the hollow bone of a (see Philip de Thaun, Livre des Creatures, l. 127, in Wright, Popular Treatises on Science, p. 24).—Lat. numerum, acc. of numerus, a number.—

Der. numerous-ly, numerous-ness; also (obsolete) numerosity = F. numerosité, 'numerosity, a great number' (Cot.) So also numer-ic, Butler, Hudibras, pt. i. c. 3, l. 461, as if from Lat. numericus* (not used); numeric-al, -al-ly.

numismaticks was added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. Coined from Lat. numismat-, stem of numisma, current coin. - Gk. νόμισμα, a custom, also, current coin. - Gk. νομίζειν, to practise, adopt, to use as current coin. - Gk. νόμος, usage. - Gk. νέμειν, to distribute; see Nomad. Der. numismatic-s; numismato-logy, from -λογία, which NUN, a female celibate, living in seclusion. (L.) M. E. nonne, Chaucer, C. T. 118; but this is an alteration to the F. spelling; cf. F. nonne, a nun. The mod. E. agrees with the A.S. spelling, and with M. E. nunne, as found in the Ancren Riwle, p. 316, last line. -A. S. nunna, a nun; Laws of Ælfred (political), sect. 8; in Thorpe's Ancient Laws, i. 66. - Low Lat. nunna, more commonly nonna, a nun, orig. a title of respect, esp. used in addressing an old maiden lady, or a widow who had devoted herself to sacred duties. The old sense is 'mother,' answering to Lat. nonnus, father, later, a monk; a word of great antiquity. + Gk. νάννη, νέννα, an aunt; νάννας, νέννος, an uncle. + Skt. naná, a familiar word for mother, used by children; see the St. Petersburg Dict. iv. 25; answering to Skt. tata, father. β. Formed by repetition of the syllable na, used by children to a father, mother, aunt, or nurse; just as we have ma-ma, da-da or daddy, and the like. Compare Mamma, and Dad. Der. nunn-er-y, M. E. nonnerie, Rob. of Glouc. p. 291, l. 13, from O.F. nonnerie, spelt nonerie in Roquefort, which was formed from O.F. nonne, a nun, from Lat. nonna.

NUNCHION, a luncheon. (Hybrid; L. and E.) Hudibras, i. 1. 346. Cotgrave explains O.F. ressie by 'an afternoon's nunchion, or drinking;' and rightly, for the old sense had relation to drinking, not to eating, as will appear. The M.E. spelling, in one instance at least, is nonechenche. We find that certain donations for drink to workmen are called in the [London] Letter-book G, fol. iv (27 Edw. III), nonechenche; see Riley, Memorials of London, p. 265, note 7; see my note to P. Plowman, C. ix. 146. It should rather be spelt noneschenche. β. The etymology is obvious, viz. from M. E. none, noon; and schenche, a pouring out or distribution of drink. The none-schenche or 'noon-drink' was the accompaniment to the none-mete or 'noon-meat,' for which see nunmete in the Prompt. Parv. p. 360, and Way's note upon it. Y. The M. E. none, noon, is from Lat. nona, the ninth hour, as explained s. v. Noon. 8. M. E. schenche, a pouring out of drink, is a sb. made from M. E. schenchen, to pour out drink. Bachus the wyn hem schenchith al aboute' = Bacchus pours out the wine for them all round; Chaucer, C. T. (Harleian MS.) ed. Wright, l. 9596. Tyrwhitt's ed. has skinketh, l. 9596; the Six-text edition (E. 1722) has skynketh, shynketh, shenketh, schenketh, as various readings. All these are various forms of the verb skenken, from A.S. scencan, to pour out drink, occurring in Beowulf, ed. Grein, 1. 496. This A.S. verb is cognate with Du. schenken, to pour out, fill, give, present, Icel. skenkja, to serve drink, fill one's cup, Dan. skienke, G. schenken, eine. The derivation of A. S. scencan is very curious; it is a causal verb, derived with the usual vowel-change of a to e, from A. S. scane, usually written sceane, a shank; see Shank. The explanation is, that a shank also meant a hollow bone, a bone of the leg, shin-bone, and hence 'a pipe;' in particular, it denoted the pipe thrust into a cask to tap it and draw off the liquor. Thus prov. E. shank means 'a tunnel for a chimney' (Halliwell), i.e. a chimney- for musge, which from Lat. muscum, acc. of muscus, musk; see Musk.

leg, shin-bone; röhrbrunnen, a jet of a fountain; röhre, a pipe, also a funnel, shaft, or tunnel (like the use of prov. E. shank). would be easy to add further proofs of this curious derivation of nuncheon from noon-shenk, and of shenk from shank. We can now understand the full force of the quotation in Way's note from Kennett's MS., viz. 'Nooning, beavre, drinking, or repast ad nonum, three in the afternoon, called . . . in the North parts a noonchion, an afternoon's nunchion.' In many parts, the use of nuncheon was driven out by the use of bever (lit. a drinking) in the same sense, and in East Anglia by the more intelligible word nooning. Lastly, by a curious confusion with the prov. E. lunch, a lump of bread, nuncheon was turned into the modern luncheon; see Luncheon. The same change of initial n to l occurs in lilac, from Pers. nil, blue; see Lilac. The verb, schenchen is used by Gower as well as Chaucer; see the quotation in Halliwell; it was afterwards turned into skink, and occurs in Shakespeare in the deriv. under-skinker, 1 Hen. IV, ii. 4. 26. The derivation of the verb from shank is given by Fick and Wackernagel, and is nothing new; but the complete history of nuncheon and luncheon is now (I believe) here given for the first time.

NUNCIO, a messenger, esp. a papal ambassador. (Ital., -L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627; and in Shak. Tw. Nt. i. 4. 28. - Ital. nuncio, nuntio, 'an ambassador;' Florio. - Lat nuntium, acc. of nuntius, a bringer of tidings; see further under Announce. Cf. de-nounce, F. norrice, nurrice (Littré), later nourrice (Cot.), a nurse. - Lat. nutricem, acc. of nutrix, a nurse, formed with fem. suffix from nutrire, to feed, nourish; see Nourish. Der. nurse, verb, Wyatt, To his Ladie, cruel ouer her yelden Louer, 1. 5. in Tottell's Miscellany, ed. Arber, p. 62; nurs-er, 1 Hen. VI, iv. 7, 46; nurs-er-y, K. NUT, the fruit of certain trees, a hard shell with a kernel. (E.) M. E. note, Havelok, 419; King Alisaunder, 3293; nute, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morsis, i. 79, l. 14.—A. S. hnuu, to translate Lat. nux; Wright's Vocab. i. 32, col. 2, l. 1. + Du. noot. + Icel. hnot. + Swed. nöt. + Dan. nöd. + G. nuss.

B. Fick (iii. 81) gives the Teutonic type as HNOTI, from the Teut. base HNAT, to bite, for which see Nettle. Cf. Lithuan. kandulas, a kernel (Schleicher), from the verb kandu, I bite (Nesselmann). ¶ It cannot be brought under the same form with Lat. nux. Der. nut, verb, to gather nuts; nut-shell, M. E. noteschale, Trevisa, iv. 141; nut-brown, M. E. nute-brun, Cursor Mundi, 18846; nut-cracker, nut-hatch, a bird also called the nutjobber or nutpecker, M. E. nuthake, Squire of Low Degree, 55, the sense being nut-hacker, the bird that hacks or pecks nuts, see Hatch (3) and Hack (1). And see nut-meg.

NUTMEG, the musk-nut. (Hybrid; E. and F., -L., -Pers., -Skt.) M.E. notemuge, Chaucer, C.T. 13693; later nutmegge, Rom.

This O.F. muge occurs in a quotation cited by Littre from Ducange, & [The Lat. stuppa means 'tow.'] 'Que plus que muge ne que mente Flaira souef lor renomee'=that their renown will smell sweeter than musk or mint. The s of the form musge occurs in the dimin. form musguet (Burguy), the old form of mod. F. muguet, a lily of the valley, similarly named from its scent; the same s is represented by r in the dialectal F. murguet cited by Littré.

v. The identification is completely established by comparing O. F. muguette, 'a nutmeg,' Cot.; F. noix muscade, 'a nutmeg, id.; Span. nuez moscada, a nutmeg, Ital. noce moscada, the same; Low Lat. muscata, a nutmeg, lit. 'musk-like.' formed with suffix ata from musc, stem of muscus. The Lat. muscus is from the Pers., and this again from the Skt., as shewn s.v. NUTATION, a nodding, vibratory movement of the earth's axis.

(L.) In Pope, Dunciad, ii. 409. Astronomical. Englished from Lat. nutatio, a nodding, swaying. - Lat. nutatus, pp. of nutare, to nod, frequentative form of nuere, to nod. + Gk. νεύειν, to nod. From a base NU, signifying 'to move slightly.' Der. Hence also in-nu-endo.

NUTRIMENT, nourishment, food. (L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. - Lat. nutrimentum, food; formed with suffix -mentum from nutri-re, to nourish; see Nourish. Der. nutriment-al; and see nutritious.

NUTRITIOUS, furnishing nutriment. (L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. Englished from Lat. nutritius, by change of -us to -ous, as in ardu-ous, &c. The Lat. word is also (better) spelt nutricius. -Lat. nutric-, stem of nutrix, a nurse; see Nurse. Der. nutritious-ly, -ness. So also nutrition, Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 64; a coined word.

NUTRITIVE, nourishing. (F.,-L.) In Minsheu and Cot-grave. - F. nutritif, 'nutritive'; Cot. Formed with suffix -if (= Lat. -iuus) from nutrit-, stem of pp. of nutrire, to nourish; see Nourish. Der. nutritive-ly, -ness.

NUZZLE, to thrust the nose in. (E.) Also spelt nousle; Shak. Venus, 1115; Pericles, i. 4. 42; nosyll in Palsgrave. A frequentative verb, with suffix -le, from the sb. nose. It means to nose often, i.e. to keep pushing the nose or snout towards. Cf. Low G. nusseln, with the same sense. See Nose, and cf. Nozzle.

NYLGHAU, a large species of antelope. (Pers.) cow;' the males being of a blueish colour. - Pers. nilgaw, 'the white-footed antelope of Pennant, and antelope picta of Pallas; Rich, Pers. Chaucer, C. T. 2930. - F. nymphe, 'a nimph;' Cot. - Lat. nympha. -Gk. νύμφη, a bride, lit. 'a veiled one,' like Lat. nupta. A nasalised form from the same root as νέφος, a cloud, covering; see Nuptial, Nebula, Nimbus. Der. nymph-like, Milton, P. L. 452.

O(1), OH, an interjection. (E.) M. E. o, Ancren Riwle, p. 54; Layamon, 17126. Not in A.S. + Du. o. + Dan. and Swed. o. + G. o. + Goth. o, Mk. ix. 19. + Lat. o. + Gk. ω, ω. β. A natural exclamatory sound, akin to Ah! ¶ There is no particular reason for the spelling oh, which is not old. Some make a distinction in use between o and oh; this is merely arbitrary.

O(2), a circle. (E.) In Shak. Hen. V, prol. 13; Mids. Nt. Dr.
iii. 2.188. So called because the letter o is of a circular shape.

OAF, a simpleton. (Scand.) You oaf, you! Dryden, Kind Keeper, i. 1; where the old ed. has auph; see ed. 1763, vol. iv. p. 302. In Drayton's Nymphidia, l. 79, the old ed. of 1627 has aulf; Prof. Morley prints oaf. It is the same word as prov. E. auf, an elf (Halliwell). Again, auf or auf stands for aulf, a dialectal variety of E. elf. – Icel. alfr, an elf, cognate with E. Ellf, q.v. B. Thus oaf is the Northern or Scand, variant of elf; a similar loss of l is common in the North; cf. Lowland Sc. bawk for balk, a' for all, &c.

S. de, Grein, i. 14; the long a changes into later oo, by rule. + Du. eik. + Icel. eik. + Dan. eeg. eg. + Swed. ek. + G. eiche. β. All from the Teut. type AIKA; Fick, iii. 3. Cf. Lith. auzolas, an oak. Root unknown. Der. oak-en, adj., A. S. deen (Bosworth), with adj. suffix -en as gold-en, beech-en, &c. Also oak-apple, oak-leaf, oak-gall. [But not acorn, as often wrongly supposed.]

OAKUM, tow, old ropes teased into loose hemp. (E.) Spelt ockam in Skinner, ed. 1671. Spelt oakam in Dampier's Voyages, v. i. p. 295, an. 1686 (R.)—A.S. dcumba. tow, in a gloss (Leo); cf. [The Lat. stuppa means 'tow.] β. The sense is 'that which is combed out;' the prefix is the usual A. S. ά-, cognate with G. εr-, Goth. us-; see A- (4), prefix. The rest of the word is related to A. S. cemban, to comb, and camb, a comb; see Comb. Mr. Wedgwood says: 'O. H. G. ácambi, tow; M. H. Holland's translation of the passage is as follows: 'Now that part thereof which is vtmost and next to the pill [peel] or rind, is called tow or hurds, and it is the worst of the line or flaxe, good for little or nothing but to make lampe-match or candle-wiek; and yet the same must be better

OAR, a light pole with a flat blade, for rowing boats. (E.) M.E. ore, Havelok, 1871; Northern form ar, Barbour's Bruce, iii. 576, 691.

-A. S. ár, Grein, i. 34; the change from á to long o being quite regular. + Iccl. ár. + Dan. aare. + Swed. åra.

B. Further allied to Gk. άμφ-ήρ-ηs, double-oared, άλι-ήρ-ηs, rowing through the sea, έρ-έτης, an oarsman, έρ-έσσειν, to row, έρ-ετμύς, an oar = Lat. rēmus (for eretmus); also to Lithuan. ir-ti, to row, ir-klas, an oar; also to Skt. ar-itra, a rudder (orig. a paddle). γ . All from the $\sqrt[4]{AR}$, perhaps in the sense 'to drive;' see Curtius, i. 427, Fick, i. 19, iii. 22. Der. oar, verb, Temp. ii. 1. 118; oar-ed; eight-oar, i. e. eight-oared boat, &c.; oar-s-man, formed like hunt-s-man; from the same root we have also row, rudder.

OASIS, a fertile spot in a desert. (L., -Gk., -Egyptian.) Quite modern, but now common; see Todd. - Lat. oasis. - Gk. δασιε, αὐασιε, a name of the fertile islets in the Libyan desert; Herod. iii. 26. Of Egyptian origin; cf. Coptic ouahe, a dwelling-place, oasis; outh, to dwell; from outh, to add; Peyron, Copt. Lexicon, 1835, pp. 159, 160.

OAST, OAST-HOUSE, a kiln for drying hops. (E.) oast or east in Ray's Collection of South-Country Words, ed. 1091. [The form east is from Du. eest.] M. E. ost, oste; for examples, see Pegge's Kenticisms (E. D. S.), s. v. oast. = A. S. ást, a kiln. 'Siccatorium [i. e. a drying-house], cyln, vel ást;' Wright's Vocab. i. 58, col. 1. Thus the word is purely E., the change from á to oa being quite regular; cf. A. S. ác, an oak, ár, an oar. + Du. eest; O. Du. ast; 'een ast, a place where barley is dryed to make malt with;' Hexham.

B. Allied to A. S. ad, a funeral pile (Leo), M. H. G. eit, a fre, oven; just as Lat. astus, glow, is related to Lat. ades, a hearth, house. Cf. Gk. alous, a burning heat. — IDH, to kindle; see Ether.

OATH, a solemn vow. (E.) M. E. ooth, oth; Chaucer, C. T. 120. - A.S. á8, Grein, i. 17; the change from á to oa being regular, as in ác, oak, ár, oar. + Du. eed. + Icel. eiðr. + Dan. and Swed. ed. + Goth. aiths. + G. eid; O. H. G. eit. β. The Teut. type is AITHA; Fick, iii. 4; allied to O. Irish oeth, oath (Rhys); cf. W.

OATS, the name of a kind of grain. (E.) M. E. otes, s. pl., Chaucer, C. T. 7545. The sing form appears in mod. E. oat-cake, oat-meal, and the adj. oat-en. - A. S. úta; we find wilde úta as a gloss to zizania in the Northumb. gloss to Matt. xiii. 38; also æcer-sæd áten, an acre-seed of oats, A. S. Chron. an. 1124, where áten is for átan, gen. sing. of áta.

β. Mr. Wedgwood compares A. S. áta átan, gen. sing. of áta. with Icel. áta, food to eat; but the A.S. word rightly answering to Icel. áta is át, Grein, i. 73, which of course is from the verb etan, to eat.

y. Instead of this, I should prefer to connect A.S. áta with Icel. eitill, a nodule in stone, Norweg. eitel, a gland, knot, nodule in stone, Russ. iadro, a kernel in fruit, bullet, ball, shot, Gk. oldos, a swelling. If this be right, the orig. meaning of oat was grain, corn, kernel, with reference to the manner of its growth, the grains being of bullet-like form; and it is derived from \(\sqrt{ID}\), to swell, not from ✓AD, to eat. See Fick, i. 28, iii. 4. Der. oat-en, adj., with suffix -en as in gold-en, oak-en; oat-meal, oat-cake.

OB-, prefix. (L.) A common prefix, changing to oc-before c, of-before f, and op-before p, as in oc-cur, of-fer, op-pose. obliteratus, pp. of obliterare or oblitterare, to efface, smear out. — Lat. ob, over; and litera littera, a letter; see Letter, Line.

B. The ctymology is generally given from linus, pp. of linere, to smear; which will not account for the syllable -er-; the fact is, that the orig. sense of litera is a smear, mark, stroke, and that it is litera which is connected with litus.

y. Hence the usual derivation is ultimately correct, but it passes over (without explanation) a stage in the word's history. Der. obliterat-ion.

'None odde wedding' = no irregular marriage; Myrc's Instructions for Parish Priests. ed. Peacock, 1. 198. -Icel. oddi, a triangle, a point of land; metaph. from the triangle, an odd number, opp. to even; also used in the metaphorical phrase standask i odda, to stand at odds, be at odds, quarrel. In composition, we find Icel. oddamaor, the odd man, the third man, one who gives a casting vote; oddatala, an odd number. Hence it is clear that the notion of 'oddness' arose from the figure of a triangle, which has two angles at the base and an odd one at the vertex. Also oddi is closely related to oddr, a point of a weapon, which stands for ordr, by assimilation. + A.S. ord, point of a sword, point, beginning, chief. + Dan. od, a point; odde, a tongue of land. + Swed. udda, odd, not even; udde, a point, cape, promontory; udd, a point, prick. + G. ort, a place, region, M.H.G. ort, an extreme point. $\beta$. The common Teut. type is USDA, Fick, iii. 36; and the orig. sense is sharp point or edge, esp. of a weapon. — WAS, to cut; cf. Skt. vas, to cut. Perhaps Gk. vvvs, a plough-share, and Lat. uomer, a plough-share, are also from this root. And cf. Skt. visi, a carpenter's adze. The sense of 'strange,' or 'queer,' seems to be a more development from that of uneven. The W. od, notable, excellent, odd, is prob. mcrely borrowed from E.; the sense of 'notable' is sometimes attached to A.S. ord. The phrase odds and ends means 'points and ends,' hence, scraps; it is closely allied to the M. E. ord and ende = beginning and end; see Tyrwhitt's note to Chaucer. C.T. 14639, and my note to the same line in the Monkes Tale, Group B, 1. 3911. Quite distinct from Orts, q. v. Der. odd-ly, odd-ness, odd-i-ty, odd-fellow; odds, Oth. ii. 3. 185.

ODE, a song. (F., -L., -Gk.) In Shak. L. L. L. iv. 3. 99. -F. ode, 'an ode; Cot. - Lat. oda, ode. -Gk. ψδη, a song; contracted form of doιδη, a song. -Gk. ἀείδειν, to sing; related to dηδών, a β. The base of ἀείδειν is ἀΓιδ, where nightingale, singing bird. \dot{a} is prosthetic, and $Fi\delta$ is a weakened form of $Fa\delta = vad$, cognate with Skt. vad, to sound, to speak; cf. Skt. vádaya, to cause to sound, to play, vádya, a musical instrument. — VWAD, to speak, call, sing.

ODIUM, hatred. (L.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. [The adj. odious is much older; in Henrysoun, Complaint of Creseide, st. 19, last line.] - Lat. odium, hatred. - Lat. odi, I hate; an old pt. t. used as a present. Allied to Gk. & Och, to thrust, push; so that the orig. sense was 'to thrust away.' Also to Skt. vadh, to strike. — WADII, to strike. See Curtius, i. 323. Der. odi-ous, Test. of Creseide, st. 33, from F. odieux, 'odious' (Cot.), which from Lat. odiosus, adj., formed from odium; odi-ous-ly, -ness. And see annoy.

ODOUR, scent, perfume. (F., - L.) M.E. odour, Wyclif, Eph. v.
2. - F. odeur, 'an odor, sent;' Cot. - Lat. odorem, acc. of odor, a scent. - AD, to smell; whence also Gk. οζειν (= δδ-yειν), to smell; and Lithuan. udziu, I smell. Der. odor-ous, Mids. Nt. Dr. ii. 1. 110, from Lat. odörus, by change of -us to -ous, and throwing back the accent; odor-ous-ly. Also odori-fer-ous, L. L. L. iv. 2. 128, coined from Lat. odori-fer, odour-bearing; which from odori-, crude form of odor, and fer, bearing, from ferre, to bear; see Bear (1). And see Olfactory, Osmium, Ozone, Redolent.

OF, from, belonging to, among. (E.) M. E. of; passim.—A. S. of, of; Grein, ii. 308. + Du., Icel., Swed., Dan., and Goth. af. + G. ab; O.H. G. aba. + Lat. ab. + Gk. dπb. + Skt. apa, away. β. Apparently an instrumental case from a base AP. From the same base we have the gen. case appearing in Gk. dψ, back again, Lat. abs, away from; also the locative case appearing in Gk. ii, Lat. ob, near to. Also Lat. apud, near, at.

OFF, away, away from. (E.) Merely another form of of; and in old authors there is no distinction between the words, the spelling of doing duty for both. 'Smiteth of my hed'=smite off my head; Chaucer, C.T. 784. The spelling off for of occurs in Barbour's Bruce, i. 27, &c. The earliest instance appears to be in the line: 'For thou art mon off strange lond;' Rob. of Glouc. p. 115, l. 15. In the 13th century the spelling off is (I believe) never found. See Of. Der. see below, of-fal, off-ing, off-scouring, off-set, off-shoot, off-

OFFAL, waste meat, refusc. (E.) See Trench, Select Glossary. M. E. offal; 'Offal, that ys bleuit of a thynge, as chyppys, or other lyke, Cadscum;' Prompt. Parv. OFFEND, to annoy, displease. (F., -L.) M. E. offenden, Chaucer, C. T. 2396. - F. offendre, 'to offend, hurt;' Cot. - Lat. offendere (pp. offensus), to strike or dash against, hurt, injure.—Lat. offenders (pp. offensus), to strike or dash against, hurt, injure.—Lat. of (put for ob before f), against; and fenders *, to strike, only occurring in compounds. OFFER, to propose, present, lay before. (L.) Directly from Latin. In very early use; found even in A.S. M.E. offren, Chaucer, C. T. 12841; Rob. of Glouc. p. 14, l. 16.—A.S. offrian, to offer; see exx. in Sweet's A.S. Reader.—Lat. offerre, to offer.—Lat. of- (for ob before f), near; and ferre, to bring, to bear, cognate with E. bear. See Ob- and Bear. Der. offer, sb., offer-er; offer-ing = A. S. offrung, Mark, ix. 40. Also offer-tor-y, M. E. offertorie, Chaucer, C. T. 712 = F. offertoire (Col.), from Lat. offertorium, a place to which offerings were brought, an offertory, extended from offertor, an offerer, formed from the verb offerre with agential

OFFICE, duty, employment, act of worship, &c. (F., -L.) In carly use. M. E. offiz, office. 'On thin offiz' = in thy official position; Genesis and Exodus, ed. Morris, l. 2071.- F. office.-Lat. officium, duty, service, lit. the doing of a service; contracted from opificium.—
Lat. opi-, crude form of opes, sb. pl. wealth, also aid, help; and facere, to do. See Opulent and Fact. ¶ We can hardly derive opificium from opus, work. Der. office-bearer; office-r, M. E. officere, Chaucer, C. T. 8066, from F. officere = Low Lat. officiarius, one who performs an office; offici-al, P. Plowman, B. xx. 136, from O. F. official, 'an officiall' (Cot.), which from Lat. officialis; officially; offici-ate, in Milton, P. L. viii. 82, from Low Lat. officialus, pp. of officiare, to perform an office occurring A. B. 1214 (Duesnge) of officiare, to perform an office, occurring A. D. 1314 (Ducange). Also officious (see Trench, Select Glossary), used sometimes in a good sense, Titus Andron. v. 2. 202, from F. officieux, 'officious, dutifull, serviceable' (Cot.), which from Lat. officiosus, obliging; offici-ous-ly, offici-ous-ness.

OFFSCOURING, refuse. (E.) Lit. anything scoured off; hence, refuse. In I Cor. iv. 13 (A. V.) From Off and Scour.

OFFSET, a young shoot, &c. (E.) Used in several senses. The sense 'shoot of a plant' occurs in Ray, as cited in Todd's Johnson (without a reference). From Off and Set.

OFFSHOOT, that which shoots off. (E.) Not in Todd's John-From Off and Shoot.

OFFSPRING, progeny, issue. (E.) M. E. ofspring. Rob. of Glouc. p. 164, l. 14. The odd spelling oxspring occurs in Cursor Mundi, l. 11415.—A. S. ofspring. Gen. iii. 15.—A. S. of, off, from;

Mundi, I. 11415.—A. S. ofspring. Gen. iii. 15.—A. S. of, off, from; and springan, to spring. See Off, Of, and Spring.

OFT, OFTEN, frequently. (E.) Oft is the orig. form; this was lengthened into ofte (dissyllabic), because -e was a common adverbial ending in the M. E. period. Lastly, ofte was lengthened to often before a vowel or h in hadde, &c. Thus: 'Ful ofte tyme,' Chaucer, C. T. 358 (Group A, 356), where Tyrwhitt prints often nunccessarily, the best MSS. having ofte. Again: 'That often hadde ben,' id. 312 (Group A, 310).—A. S. oft, Grein, ii. 320. + Icel. oft, opt (pronounced oft). + Dan. ofte. + Swed. ofta. + G. oft: O. H. G. ofto. + Goth. usta, adv. oft. Mk. v. 4; used as adj. in the phrase thizo usta sauhte, frequent infirmities, I Tim. v. 23. B. The common Teut. type is UFTA, adv. Fick, iii. 34. In form, the word common Teut. type is UFTA, adv. Fick, iii. 34. In form, the word answers to Gk. υπατος, highest, best; and it is closely related to Gk. υπέρ, Lat. super, E. over; see Over. From the notion of what is 'over' or superfluous, we pass to that of frequency. Der. often, adj.,

We now say often-er, often-est; the old forms were

OGEE, OGIVE, a double curve. (F., - Span., - Arab.) Sometime absurdly written OG, as if compounded of two letters of the alphabet. Oges is another form of ogive (with i as in machine). 'An Ogius or Oges, a wreath, circlet, or round band in architecture;' Minsheu, ed. 1627. It is now generally used to mean a double curve, formed by the union of a convex and concave line. An ogee arch is a pointed arch, with doubly-curved sides. - O. F. augive, 'an ogive, a wreath, circlet, round band, in architecture; 'Cot. He also has: 'Ogive, an ogive, or ogee in architecture.' β. The suggeshas: 'Ogive, an ogive, or ogee in architecture.' tion in E. Müller is certainly right; he compares the Span. auge, highest point. Excellent examples of the ogee curve are to be found in Moorish domes and arches, and we may derive the term from the pointed top of such domes, &c. Cf. Span. cimacio ogee, an ogee moulding, where cimacio is derived from cima, a summit, top; late Lat. cymatium, an ogee curve (Vitruvius). Similarly, the F. augive is derived from Span. auge, highest point, which curious y. The Span. auge is word is also found in Port. and Italian. obviously derived from Arab. úwj, top, summit, vertex; Rich. Dict. Der. ogiv-al, adj., sometimes oddly corrupted to ogee-fall.

OGLE, to look at sideways, glance at. (Du.) Not an old word in E. In Pope, Rape of the Lock, v. 23. Certainly of Du. origin; answering to a Du. verb oogelen* (not in the Dictt.), a regular frequentative of oogen, 'to cast sheeps eyes upon one;' llexham. Such frequentative verbs are extremely common in Dutch, and may be numbered by hundreds; and we actually find the Low G. oegeln, to ogle, in the Bremen Wörterbuch, used as a frequentative of oegen, to look at; as well as O. Du. oogheler, a flatterer, eye-servant, i. e. ogler (Oudemans). - Du. ooge, the eye; cognate with E. Eye, q. v.

OGRE, a monster, in fairy tales. (F., - Span. - L.) Late. Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. The quotation in Todd is from the E. version of the Arabian Nights, which was taken from the F. version. It is pretty clear that the word came to us by means of that very book. = F. ogre, an ogre; by no means an early word; used by Voltaire in 1740 (Littré). Traced by Diez as borrowed from Span. ogro (not in Meadows), O. Span. huergo, uerco; cognate with Ital. orco, a hobgoblin, demon. - Lat. orcum, acc. of orcus, (1) the abode of the dead, (2) the god of the infernal regions, Orcus, Pluto. The O. Lat. form is said by Festus to have been uragus (White). Cf. A. S. orc, a demon; occurring in orcneas (perhaps better orcenas) = monsters, Beowulf, ed. Grein, 112. Der. ogr-ess, from F. ogresse.

OH, a later spelling of O, q. v.

OIL, juice from the olive-tree, a greasy liquid. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) We find in A. S. the form ele, in Goth. alew, forms borrowed ultimately from the Gk., but at a very early period; see Curtius, i. 448. The M. E. oile was borrowed from French; it occurs in Chaucer, C. T. 2963 .- O. F. oile (Burguy), later huile (Cotgrave). - Lat. oleum. -Gk. έλαιον, oil; cf. έλαία, an olive-tree, also an olive. So named from its liquidity. — \checkmark LI, later form of \checkmark RI, to flow; see Liquid. β. 'With Benfey, ii. 120, Diefenbach, Wtb. i. 36, Hehn, 422, I now regard the words in all other languages as borrowed from έλαία; oliua is to exaia as Achiui to 'Axaiol; initial o for e as in elogium = λλεγείον. We ought perhaps to consider as the root of έλαιον (with Pott, i. 1. 208) the root LI, liquefacere. In Greek, the prefixing of a vowel is justified; it would not be so in the other languages; 'Curtius, Der. oil, verb; the pp. oyled occurs in Hall's Satires, b. iv. sat. 4, 1. 38. Also oil-y, K. Lear, i. 1. 227; oil-i-ness. Also oil-bag, cake, -cloth, -colour, -nut, -painting. And see Olive, Oleaginous, Oleaster.

OINTMENT, a greasy substance for anointing wounds, &c. The t is due to confusion with verb to anoint; the (F., - L.) M.E. form being oinement or oynement. '[They] bousten [bought] swete-smelling oynementis, to come and to anoynte Jesu; Wyclif, Mark, xvi. I. Spelt oinement in Chaucer, C. T. 633. — O. F. oignement, an anointing, also an unguent, liniment; Burguy. Formed with suffix -ment (= Lat. -mentum) from O. F. ongier (Burguy), another form of O. F. (and mod. F.) oindre, to anoint. = Lat. ungere, to anoint; see Unguent, Anoint.

OLD, aged, full of years, ancient. (E.) M. E. old, def. form and pl. olde; Chaucer, C. T. 5240, 10023. — A. S. eald, O. Northumb. ald, Luke, i. 18. + Du. oud (for old). + G. alt. + Goth. altheis. And cf. Lat. ad-ultus, an adult, one of full age. β. The common Teut. type is ALTHA, whence ALDA; Fick, iii. 26. Like the ultus in Lat. adulus, it is a pp. form from the AL, to nourish, as seen in Goth. alan, to nourish, Lat. alere, to nourish; cf. Goth. us-althan, to grow old. It means 'well nourished grown up.' See further under first found in the phr. ofte tyme or often-tyme, Chaucer, C.T. 52, 358; Da Scand. word from Icel. aldinn, old, or perhaps the adj. suffix -en is merely tacked on; cf. gold-en. Also old-ness, K. Lear, i. 2. 50; cf. eldness, Wyclif, Rom. vii. 6. Also eld, sb., eld-er (1), eld-est, ald-er-man OLEAGINOUS, oily. (L., - Gk.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - Lat. oleaginus, belonging to olive-oil; by change of -us to -ous, as in arduous, &c. An adj. form from oleum, oil. Not a true Lat. word, but borrowed from Gk. έλαιον; see Oil.

OLEANDER, the rose-bay-tree (F., - Low Lat.) 'Oleander, rose-bay, rose-tree.' = O. F. oleandre, 'the rose-tree, rose-bay, rose-lawrell, rose-bay-tree;' Cot. The same as Ital. oleandro, Span. eloendro, 'the rose-bay-tree,' Minsheu (1623), Port. eloendro, loendro. All those forms are variously corrupted (it is supposed) from Low Lat. lorandrum, a word cited by Isidore of Seville. β. Again, it has been suggested that lorandrum is an attempt at rendering rhododendron. This is but a guess; and there is no very great resemblance between the shrubs. Perhaps we may rather guess lorandrum to represent laurodendron*, a quite conceivable compound from lauro-, from Lat. laurus, laurel, and Gk. δένδρον, a tree. y. The change from lorandrum to oleandrum is clearly due to confusion with oleaster.

OLEASTER, the wild olive. (L., -Gk.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. - Lat. oleaster, Rom. xi. 17 (Vulgate). Formed with suffix soler (as in poeta-s-ter) from olea, an olive-tree. - Gk. ελαία, an olive-tree.

See Oil.

OLFACTORY, pertaining to smell. (L.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. - Lat. olfactorius, belonging to one that smells; only appearing in the fem. and neut. forms, olfactoria, olfactorium, a smelling-bottle. - Lat. olfactor, one who smells; (but only the fem. form olfactrix occurs). - Lat. olfactus, a smelling, also pp. of olfacere, to smell, to scent; of which a fuller form olefacere also occurs. - Lat. ole-re, to smell; and facere, to make; hence, to emit a scent. almost certain that olere stands for odere*, whence odor, smell. The change of d to l is a peculiarity of Latin, as in Ulysses for Odysseus, lacruma for dacruma; see Tear (2). See Odour.

OLIGARCHY, government by a few. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) oligarchie in Minsheu, ed. 1627. - F. oligarchie, 'an oligarchie; Cot. - Low Lat. oligarchia (Ducange). - Gk. ολιγαρχία, government in the hands of a few. - Gk. δλίγ-, for δλίγοs, few, little; and -apχία, from ἀρχεῖν, to rule. β. In the Gk. δ-λίγ-ος, the δ- is prosthetic; the word is akin to Lithuan. lësas, thin, lean, and to Skt. lega, smallness, from liq, to become small. And see Arch-, prefix. Der. oligarchi-c-al; also oligarch, Gk. δλιγάρχης; oligarch-al.

OLIO, a mixture, medley. (Span., - L.) A mistaken form of olia, which is an E. spelling of Span. olla, sounded very nearly as olla, the Span. ll answering to E. ly or to E. lli in million. The mistake occurs in Eikon Basilike, cap. xv, and is noticed by Milton. 'Not to tax him for want of elegance as a courtier in writing oglio for olla, the Spanish word; Milton, Answer to Eikon Basilike, cap. 15.—Span. olla, 'a round earthen pot, an oglio' (sie); Meadows. Properly, the latter sense is due to the Span dish called olla podrida, a dish of various meats and vegetables, hence a mixture, medley, olio. - Lat.

OLIVE, the name of an oil-yielding tree. (F., -L., -Gk.) M. E. oliue (with u for v), O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, ii. 89, 1. 5 from bottom. – F. olive. – Lat. oliua. – Gk. ἐλαία, an olive-tree. See further under Oil.

OMBRE, a game at cards. (F., -Span., -L.) In Pope, Rape of the Lock, i. 56. - F. hombre, ombre (Hamilton). - Span juego del hombre, the game of ombre; lit. 'game of the man;' see Eng. Span. part of Meadows Dict. The Span. juego is from Lat. iocus; see Joke. The Span. hombre is from Lat. hominem, acc. of homo, a man; see Human.

OMEGA, the end. (Gk.) In Rev. i. 8. The sense 'end' is due to the fact that omega is the last letter of the Gk. alphabet. Its force is that of long o.—Gk. ω, called ω μέγα, i. e. great o or long o; where µέγα is the neut. of µέγαs, great, allied to E. mickle; see Mickle. ¶ Opposed to alpha, the first letter; see Alphabet.

OMELET, a pancake made chiefly of eggs. (F., -L.) In Cotgrave. - F. omelette, 'an omelet or pancake of eggs;' Cot. An older form was aumelette; Cot. also gives: 'Aumelette d'œufs, an omelet, or pancake made of egges.'

β. The forms of the word are various; a very common old form, according to Scheler, was amelette, but this was preceded by the forms alemette, alemelle, and alumelle. It is clear that amelette is a corruption from the older alemette; and it seems that alemette, in its turn, took the place of alemelle.

y. Now the O. F. alemelle signified 'a thin plate,' esp. the blade of a knife, and is still preserved in the mod. F. alumelle (a corrupted spelling), with the sense of 'sheathing of a ship,' as a nautical term (Hamilton). That is, the omelet was named from its Adult, Adolescent. Der. old-m, Macbeth, iii. 4. 75, apparently thin, flat, shape, and has nothing to do with F. auf., eggs, as some supposed; so that the old expression in Cotgrave, viz. aumelette d'aufs, un-ique, un-ite, un-ion, un-animous, uni-son, uni-versal, on-ion; also is quite correct, not tautological. See alemele, the blade of a knife, n-one, n-on-ce, an-on (=in one), an-other. Doublet, an or a. in Roquefort.

8. Lastly, alemelle (or alemele) is a mistaken form, due to confusion of la lemelle (the correct form) with l'alemelle, as if the article had been elided before a vowel. - Lat. lamella, a thin plate, properly of metal; dimin. of lamina, a thin, flat plate; see Lamina. There seems to be no reason for doubting the correctness of this curious etymology, due to Littré; see the articles in Littre and Scheler, under the words omelette and alumelle.

OMEN, a sign of a future event, prognostication. (L.) In Shak. Hamlet, i. 1. 123. - Lat. omen, an omen; O. Lat. osmen. β. Root uncertain; some connect it with os, the mouth, others with ausculture, to hear, and auris, the ear; the latter is more likely. Der. omen-ed, chiefly in ill-omened; omin-ous (Minsheu), imitated from Lat. ominosus, adj., formed from omin-, stem of omen; omin-ous-ly, omin-ous-ness. Also ab-omin-ate.

OMIT, to leave out, neglect. (L.) 'Nor omitted no charitable meane; Sir T. More, Works, p. 887 e. — Lat. omittere, to omit; lit. 'to let go.' Put for ommittere, which stands (by assimilation) for obmittere. — Lat. ob (which often scarcely affects the sense); and mittere, to send, let go. See Ob- and Mission. Der. omission, Troil. iii. 3, 230, from F. omission, 'an omission' (Cot.), which from Lat. omissionem, acc. of omissio, from pp. omissus. Also omitt-ance, a coined word, As You Like It, iii. 5.133.

OMNIBUS, a public vehicle. (L.) The name seems to have been first used in France. They were used in Paris about 1828; and were so called because intended for the use of all classes.—Lat.

omnibus, for all, dat, pl. of omnis, all. Root uncertain.

OMNIPOTENT, almighty. (F., - L.) M. E. omnipotent, Chaucer, C. T. 6005. - F. omnipotent; Cot. - Lat. omnipotent, stem of omnipotens, all-powerful. - Lat. omni-, crude form of omnis, all; and potens, powerful; see Potent. Der. omnipotent-ly, omnipotence, from F. omnipotence (Cot.).

OMNIPRESENT, everywhere present. (F.,-L.) Milton has omnipresence, P. L. vii. 590, xi. 336. Coined from omni-, crude form of omnis, all; and Present, q. v. Der. omnipresence.

OMNISCIENT, all-knowing. (L.) In Milton, P. L. vi. 430. Coined from omni-, crude form of omnis, all; and scient-, stem of sciens, pres. part. of scire, to know. See Science. Der.

OMNIVOROUS, all-devouring, feeding on all kinds of food. (L.) In Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674. - Lat. omniuorus, all-devouring; by change of -us to -ous. - Lat. omni-, crude form of omnis, all; and -uorus, devouring, from uorare, to devour; see Voracious.

ON, upon, at, near. (E.) M. E. on; passim. – A. S. on; passim. + Du. aan. + Icel. \acute{a} (for an). + Dan. an, prep. and adv. + Swed. \mathring{a} , prep.; an, adv. +G. an.+Goth. ana, to, upon, on.+Gk. ἀνά.+Russ. na. β. All from ANA, pronom. base of the third person; ἀνά is evidently a case-form of the demonstrative stem, which is preserved as ana in Skt., as anas (= ille) in Lithuanian, and as on with the same meaning in Church-Slavonic; 'Curtius, i. 381. See In, which is a weakened form, or a different case; on is perhaps an instrumental case, and in a locative case. Der. on, adv.; on-set, on-slaught, on-ward, on-wards; and see anon.

ONCE, a single time, at a former time. (E.) M.E. ones, oones, onis, Chaucer, C.T. 5592, 5595; cf. at ones, id. 767. The final s was sharp, not pronounced as z; and this is why the word is now spelt with ce, which is an attempt to shew this. - A. S. anes, once; orig. gen. case masc. and neut. of an, one; the gen. case was sometimes used adverbially, as in need-s, twi-ce, thri-ce. See One (1). Der.

nonce, in the phr. for the nonce; see Nonce. ONCE, OUNCE, an animal; see Ounce (2).

ONE (1), single, undivided, sole. (E.) [The mod. pronunciation [wun] seems to have arisen in the W. of England; it is noticed by Jones, in 1701, as in use 'in Shropshire and some parts of Wales;' Ellis, On Early Eng. Pronunciation, p. 1012. It does not appear to be older in literature than about A.D. 1500; I believe the spelling won occurs in the Works of Tyndal (a Gloucestershire man), but I have lost the reference. At any rate, the M. E. pronunciation was have lost the reference. At any rate, the M. E. pronunciation was like that of -one in stone, bone, and is still preserved in al-one, at-one, on-ly; we never say wunly. n-one, n-on-ce, an-on (=in one), an-other. Doublet, an or a.
The Gk. ele, one (base her) cannot be fairly referred to the same source, but appears to be related to E. same; see Ace.

ONE (2), a person, spoken of indefinitely. (E.) In the phrase one says, the one means a single person. Cf. One that moche wo wrougte, Sleuthe was his name '= one who wrought much wo, whose name was Sloth; P. Plowman, B. xx. 157. See Mätzner, Engl. Grammatik. 'The indefinite one, as in one says, is sometimes, but wrongly, derived from the F. on, Lat. homo. It is merely the use of the numeral one for the older man, men, or me; Morris, Hist. Outlines of Eng. Accidence, p. 143; which see for examples. The false explanation, that one stands for F. on, seems hard to kill; but the more Middle-English is studied, the sooner it will be disbelieved.

ONEROUS, burdensome. (F., -L.) In the Rom. of the Rose, 5636. - F. onereux, 'onerous; Cot. - Lat. onerosus, burdensome. -Lat. oner-, stem of onus, a burden.
compares onus with Skt. anas, a cart.

$\begin{align*} \beta. \text{ Benfey (Skt. Dict. p. 19)} \text{ Der. onerous-ly, -ness; also} \end{align*}

unus, one; cognate with E. One, q.v. Doublet, union, esp. in the sense 'a large pearl,' Hamlet, v. 2. 283.

ONLY, single, singly. (E.) Both adj. and adv. M. E. oonli, earlier oonliche, onliche. 'Onliche liue' = solitary life; Ancren Riwle, p. 152, last line but one. Onliche, adv., Will. of Palerne, 3155.—A.S. ánlic, adj., unique, lit. one-like; Grein, i. 33. - A. S. án, one; and lic.

See One and Like.

ONOMATOPCEIA, name-making, the formation of a word with resemblance in sound to that of the thing signified. (Gk.) Esp. used of words such as click, hiss, and the like, directly imitative of sounds. In modern use; yet the Gk. word is a real one.—Gk. ονοματοποιία, the making of a name; we also find ονοματοποίησιs.— Gk. δνοματο-, crude form of δνομα, a name; and ποιεῖν, to make. See Name and Poem. Der. onomato-poetic. Also (from Gk.

ONSET, an assault, attack. (E.) In King John, ii. 326. A good word; but not in early use. Due to the phrase to set on, i.e. to attack. 'Percy! and set on!' 1 Hen. IV, v. 2. 97. See On and Set. ONSLAUGHT, an attack. (E.) In Butler, Hudibras, pt. i.

c. 3. ll. 422, 424. The M.E. form would be onslaht; but I do not know that it occurs. Compounded of M.E. on, on; and slaht, slaght, slaught, a stroke, blow, also slaughter, as in Gower, i. 348, l. 16. -A.S. on, on; and sleaht, a stroke, blow, found in the compounds morfor-sleaht, wel-sleaht, Grein, ii. 264, 647, and derived from slean, to strike. See On and Slaughter.

ONWARD, ONWARDS, forward. (E.) Not an old word. I haue driuen hym onwarde one steppe down; Sir T. More, Works, p. 400 d. It does not seem to appear much earlier. Compounded of on and -ward, in imitation of Toward, q.v. So also onwards, Shak.

Sonn. 126, in imitation of towards.

ONYX, a kind of agate. (L., -Gk.) In Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xxxvii. c. 6. - Lat. onyx. - Gk. ovyξ, a claw, a nail, a finger-nail, a veined gem, onyx, from the resemblance to the colour of the fingernail. The stem is 6-vvx-, with prosthetic o; allied to Skt. nakha, a nail, Russ. nogote, a nail, and E. nail; see Nail.

OOLITE, a kind of limestone. (F., -Gk.) Modern and geological. A coined word, but coined in France; an Englishman would have said oolith. - F. oolithe, with the pronounced as E. t; Littré. - Gk. &6, crude form of &6, an egg, cognate with Lat.

OOZE, moisture, soft mud, gentle flow. (E.) This word has lost an initial w; it should rather be woze. For the loss of w, cf. prov. E. 'coman for worken, Shropshire 'cod for wood. M. E. wose, P. Plowman, C. xiii. 299; and Prompt. Parv. p. 532.—A. S. wise; the sepia or cuttle-fish was called wisescite—ooze-shooter, from the sepia which it discharges; see Wright's Voc. i. 56, col. I. We also find A. S. wos, juice; as in ofetes wos, juice of fruit; Wright's Voc. i. 27, col. 2, 1, 8. + Icel. vás, wetness. + M. H. G. wase, O. H. G. waso, turf, sod; wasal, rain. β. Perhaps related to Icel. úr, drizzling rain, ver, sea, A.S. war, sea, Skt. vari, water, fluidity. Der. ooze, verb, Timon, i. 1. 21; ooz-y.

OPACITY, opaqueness; see Opaque.

of opacus, shady. Root unknown. Der. opaque-ness; also opac-i-ty, & Buffon's Nat. Hist., London, 1792, i. 214. 'Orig. opassom, in the Minsheu, from F. opacité, 'opacity' (Cot.), from Lat. acc. opacitatem. language of the Indians of Virginia; 'Webster. OPE, to open. (E.) A short form for open, verb; K. John, ii. 536. So also ope is used as a short form for open, adj., as in 'the gates are ope, Cor. i. 4. 43. Seldom used except in poetry. See Open.

OPEN, unclosed, free of access, clear. (E.) The verb is formed from the adj., as is shewn by the old forms. M. E. open, Chaucer, C.T. 8666. At a later period contracted to ope; see Ope. - A.S. open, open, Grein, ii. 355. 'Lit. 'that which is lifted up;' the metaphor being probably taken from the lifting of the curtain of a tent, or the lifting of a door-latch; cf. dup (= do up), to open, Hamlet, iv. 5. 53. -A.S. up, up; see Up. + Du. open; from op, up. + Icel. opinn, open, also face upwards; from upp, up. + Dan. aaben, from op, up; cf. the phr. luk Dören op, open the door, lit. 'lock the door up.' + Swed. öppen; from upp. + G. offen; from auf, O. H. G. úf. Der. open, verb, A. S. openian, causal verb from adj. open; so also Du. openen, from open; Icel. opna, from opinn; Dan. aaben, from aaben; Swed. öppna; G. Söffen.

öffnen. Also open-ly, open-ness, open-ing, open-handed, open-hearted.

OPERATE, to produce an effect. (L.) In Shak. Cymb. v. 5 197. [Really due to the sb. operation, in much earlier use; M. E. operacion, Chaucer, C. T. 6730, Gower, C. Skt. áp (orig. also ap), to attain, obtain. Der. operat-ion, as above; operat-ive, King Lear, iv. 4. 14, from F. operatif, operative' (Cot.); operat-ive-ly; operat-or, from Lat. operator; oper-ant, Hamlet, iii. 2. 184, from operant-, stem of pres. part. of operari; oper-ance, Two Noble Kinsmen, i. 3. 63. Also oper-ose, i. e. laborious, Blount's Gloss., from Lat. operosus; oper-ose-ly, oper-ose-ness; oper-osei-ty, Minsheu. From the same root we have co-operate, en-ure, in-ure, man-ure, man-œuvre, of-fice. There is perhaps an ultimate connection with ap.t., in-ep.t., op-tat-ive, op-tion.

OPHICLEIDE, a musical instrument. (F., - Gk.) Modern. -

F. ophicleide, 'an ophicleid, key-serpent;' Hamilton. An odd name; due to the old twining musical instrument called 'a serpent,' to which keys were added, thus turning it into a 'key-serpent.' - Gk. όφι-, crude form of όφιs, a serpent; and κλειδ-, stem of κλείε, a key. See Ophidian and Clavicle.

OPHIDIAN, relating to serpents. (Gk.) Modern; formed with E. suffix -an (=Lat. -anus) from Gk. δφιδι-*, an imaginary form wrongly supposed to be the crude form of opis, a serpent. The true crude form is όφι-, as seen in ophi-cleide and Ophi-uchus (Gk.

οριστικός serpent-holder, from έχειν, to hold), Milton, P. L. ii. 709.

OPHTHALMIA, inflammation of the eye. (Gk.) Spelt ophthalmie in Blount's Gloss., which is borrowed from F. ophthalmie (Cotgrave). - Gk. δφθαλμία, a disease of the eye. - Gk. δφθαλμός, the eye; apparently put for δπταλμός; cf. Doric ὁπτίλος, the eye, δπτεύειν, to see, ὁπτήρ, one who looks, a spy, eye-witness. See Optic. Der. ophthalmi-c.

OPINION, a notion, judgment, estimation. (F.,-L.) opinion, Chaucer, C. T. 183; Gower, C. A. i. 267. - F. opinion, opinion; Cot. - Lat. opinionem, acc. of opinio, a supposition. - Lat. opinari, to suppose; rarely opinare. - Lat. opinus, thinking, only in the comp. nec-opinus, in-opinus, unexpected; connected with apisci, to obtain, also to comprehend, understand, and with aptus, fitted, fit; see Apt. - AP, to attain to; cf. Skt. ap (orig. also ap), to attain, obtain, get; whence follow the ideas of comprehending, thinking, expecting. See Optative. Der. opinion-at-ive (Johnson), which has taken the place of the older opinative (Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674), coined from Lat. opinatus, pp. of opinari, to suppose; opinion-at-ive-ly, opinion-at-ive-ness. We also use the coined word opinion-at-ed, a clumsy formation. The verb opine is not much used, but is a perfectly correct word, from F. opiner, 'to opine' (Cot.), which from Lat. opinare, more commonly opinari, as above; it occurs in Pope, Moral Essays, iii. 9. The derivatives opin-able, opin-at-ive, opin-at-or (all in Blount) are obsolete.

Perhaps connected with E. sap, Curtius, ii. 63; but Fick (i. 490) takes a different factories. ferent view. If Curtius be correct, it is also cognate with Lat. sucus, juice; see Succulent. Der. opi-ate, Milton, P. L. xi. 133, spelt opiat in Cotgrave, from F. opiate, which from Low Lat. opiatus (Ducange), lit. 'provided with opium.'

"What hes on or over the open ground;"...hence may well also be derived the old use of oppida for the barriers of a race-course, which lie on [or] over the arena; Curtius, ii. 103, 303. The Skt. pada answers to E. foot. See Ob- and Foot.

ORATION, a speech. (F.,-L.) In Sir T. Mote, Works, p. 399 a.-F. oration, 'an oration, or harang;' Cot.-Lat. orationem, acc. of oratio, a speech.-Lat. oratus, pp. of orare, to speak, pray; see Oral.

ORATOR, a speaker. (F.,-L.) Formerly oratour, but now conformed to the Lat. spelling. M. E. oratour, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. 4. pr. 4, 1. 3705. – F. orateur, 'an orator;' Cot. – Lat. oratorem, acc. of orator, a speaker. - Lat. oratus, pp. of orare; see Oration. Der. oratori-c-al, oratori-c-al-ly; orator-y, M. E. oratorie, Chaucer, C. T. 1907, from F. oratoire, 'an oratory' (Cot.), from Lat. oratorium, a place of prayer, neut. of oratorius, belonging to prayer; orator-i-o, from Ital. oratorio, an oratory, also an oratorio, from the same Lat. oratorius.

ORB, a sphere, celestial body, eye. (F., -L.) In Shak. Merch. Ven. v. 50; and prob. earlier. -F. orbe, an orb; omitted in Cotgrave, but given in Sherwood's Index, and in use in F. in the 13th ORDINAL, shewing order or succession. (L.) In Phillips, ed.

P. L. iii. 718, from Lat. orbicularis, circular; orbic-ul-ar-ly; also orb-it, Phillips, ed. 1706, directly from Lat. orbita, a track, course, orbit, formed with suffix -ta from orbi-, crude form of orbis. Hence orbit-al.

ORCHARD, a garden of fruit-trees. (E.) M. E. orchard, Ancren Riwle, p. 378, l. 2 from bottom; orchard, Layamon, 12955. - A. S. orceard, usually spelt orcerd, Gen. ii. 8, 16; Wright, Popular Treatises on Science, p. 10, l. 3. The older form is ortgeard, Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Pastoral, c. 40; ed. Sweet, p. 292, l. 4. We also find wyrigeard, to translate Lat. promptuarium, Ps. cxliii. 16, ed. Spelman. Ortgeard and wyrtgeard are mere variants, both signifying Origent and wyrigent are mere variants, both signifying wortyard, i.e. yard of worts or vegetables; the form ort is due to a.
Teutonic type URTI, put for WARTI; and the form wyrt to a Teut.
WORTI, also put for WARTI; see Fick, iii. 35. 295. See Wort and Yard. + Icel, jurtagardr, a garden of herbs; from jurt, later urt, herbs, and gardr, a yard, garden; but perhaps jurt is only a borrowed word in Icelandic, from E. or G. + Dan urtgaard, herbarden; from urt and gaard. + Swed. örtegård; from ört and gård. + Goth. aurtigards, a garden, John, xviii. 1; cf. aurtja, a gardener, husbandman, Luke, xx. 10.

It is singular that Lat. hortus is related to the latter syllable yard; but of course not to the former.

ORCHESTRA, the part of a theatre for the musicians. (L., -Gk.) In Holland, tr. of Suetonius, p. 242 (R.)—Lat. orchestra.—Gk. δρχήστρα, an orchestra; which, in the Attic theatre, was a space on which the chorus danced.—Gk. δρχέσμαι, I dance. Root uncertain. Der. orchestr-al.

ORCHIS, a name for certain plants. (L., - Gk.) In Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xxvi. c. 10; and in Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, (1779), p. 233, l. 1. - Lat. orchis (Pliny). - Gk. όρχις, a testicle; hence applied to a plant with roots of testicular shape. Der. orchidac-e-ous, a coined word, as if from orchid-, stem of orchis (but the Lat. orchis makes gen. orchis, and Gk. δρχις makes gen. δρχίως); also orchid, similarly coined.

¶ A similar mis-coinage is seen in orchid, similarly coined. ¶ A similar mis-coinage is seen in ophidian, for which see under Ophicleide.

ORDAIN, to set in order, arrange, regulate. (F.,-L.) M. E ordeynen; P. Plowman, B. prol. 119; Rob. of Glouc. p. 236, l. 10.-O. F. ordener, later ordonner, as in Cotgrave. - Lat. ordinare, to set in order. - Lat. ordin-, stem of ordo, order; see Order. Der. ordinance, q. v.; ordin-ate, adj., M. E. ordinat, Chaucer, C. T. 9160, from Lat. pp. ordinatus; ordinate, sb. (in mathematics); ordinately; ordination, in Phillips, ed. 1706, formed, by analogy with F. words in -tion, from Lat. ordinatio, an ordinance, also ordination. And see ordin-al, ordin-ar-y, ord-nance.

ORDEAL, a severe trial, a judgment by test of fire, &c. (E.) It is most remarkable that this word (from complete ignorance of its etymology) is commonly pronounced orde-al in three syllables, though the -deal is absolutely the same word as when we speak of dealing cards, or of a deal board. M. E. ordal, Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 1048, ed. Tyrwhitt. (In order to correspond with the mod. form, it should rather have been ordeel.)—A. S. ordel, ordal; the spelling ordél is rare, but occurs in the Laws of Edward and Guthrum, sect. ix, in Thorpe's Ancient Laws, i. 172; this form answers to mod. E. ordeal. The usual spelling is ordal, as in the Laws of Ethelred, sect. i (in Thorpe, i. 281), and sect. iv (id. i. 294), and see numerous references in Thorpe's Index; this form answers to Chaucer's ordal, and the latter part of the word (dál) answers to mod. E. dole. The orig. sense is 'a dealing out,' separation, or discrimination; hence, a judgment, decision. + O. Fries. ordel. + O. Sax. urdéli, a judgment, decision. + Du. oordeel, judgment. + G. urtheil, O. H. G. urtéli, urteili, judgment.

B. The latter part of the word is the same as Deal (1) or Dole; as shewn by Du. deel, G. theil. the Du. oor., O. Sax. and G. ur., answering to the O.H. G. prep. ur., Goth. us, out, out of; perhaps related to Skt. ava, away, off, down. It is not preserved in any other mod. E. word (except Ort, q.v.), but was common in A. S., in such words as or-mate, immense, ormód, despondent, or-sorg, free from care, or-trýwe, wanting in trust, or-wena, wanting in hope, or-wige, unwarlike, &c.; see Grein, ii.

ORDER, arrangement, system. (F., -L.) M. E. ordre; occurring four times on p. 8 of the Ancren Riwle. - F. ordre, substituted for O. F. ordene, ordine by the not uncommon change of n to r; see Coffer. - Lat. ordinem, acc. of ordo, order, arrangement. posed to be connected with Lat. oriri, to arise, originate; though this is not very clear; see Origin. Der. order, verb, in Sir T. Wiat, Sat. ii. 1. 87; order-less, K. John, iii. 1. 253; order-ly, adj., Cymb. ii. 3. 52; order-ly, adv., Two Gent. i. 1. 130; order-liness, order-ing. Also dis-order, ordain, ordin-ance, ordin-ance, ordin-ate, ordin-at-ion, ordin-al, ordin-ar-y, in-ordin-ate, co-ordin-ate, sub-ordin-ate.

ORDINANCE, an order, regulation. (F., -L.) M. E. ordenance, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 83, last line. - O. F. ordenance, later ordonnance (Cotgrave). - Low Lat. ordinantia, a command. - Lat. ordinanti-, crude form of pres. part. of ordinare, to set in order; see Ordain. Doublet, ordnance.

ORDNANCE, artillery. (F., -L.) The same word as ordinance, which is the old spelling; see K. John, ii. 218; Hen. V, ii. 4. 126. It orig. meant merely the bore or size of the cannon, and was thence transferred to the cannon itself, exactly as in the case of Caliver, q. v. 'Engin de telle ordonnance, of such a bulk, size, or bore; Cotgrave.

CORDURE, excrement. (F., - L.) In Shak. Hen. V, ii. 4. 39.

M. E. ordure, Chaucer, Pers. Tale, De Superbia (Six-text, Group I, L 438). - F. ordure, 'ordure;' Cot. - O. F. ord (fem. orde), 'filthy, nasty, foule, . . . ugly, or loathsom to behold;' Cot. Cf. O. F. ordir, 'to foule, defile, soile;' id. So also Ital. ordo answers to O. Ital. horrido, mod. Ital. orrido, which Florio explains by 'horride, hideous, . euill fauoured, ... lothesome to behold.

ORE, one of the native minerals. (E.) M. E. or, Ancren Riwle, p. 284, note b; the dat. ore is in Chaucer, C. T. 6646. — A. S. or; 'hit is eac berende on wecga orum ares and isernes,' it is fertile in ores of lumps of brass and iron; Alfred, tr. of Beda, lib. i. c. 1. The word or seems to be merely another form of ar, brass, occurring in the above quotation; the dat. case are, meaning 'bronze,' occurs in Gregory's Pastoral, c. 37, ed. Sweet, p. 266. The change from A.S. a to long o is seen again in E. oar from A.S. ar, + Icel. eir, brass. + O.H.G. er, brass. + Goth. aiz, ais, brass, coin, money, Matt. vi. 8; cf. aizasmitha, a copper-smith, 2 Tim. iv. 14. + Lat. æs, ore, bronze. Cf. Skt. ayas, iron; Max Müller, Lect. ii. 256.

ORGAN, an instrument, esp. of music. (F., -L., -Gk.) In old books, the instrument of music is commonly called the organs or a pair of organs; the pl. organe or organ (answering to Lat. organa) occurs in P. Plowman, C. xxi. 7; Chaucer, C. T. 14857; the pl. organs is in Chaucer, C. T. 15603; see my note to P. Plowman, C. xxi. 7. = F. organe, 'an organ, or instrument wherewith anything may be made or done; Cot. - Lat. organum, an implement. - Gk. δργανον, an implement; allied to Gk. ξοργα, I did, accomplished, and to Gk. ξοργον, a work; see Work. And see Orgies. Der. organ-ic, organ-ic-al, organ-ic-al-ly, organ-ism, organ-ist, organ-ise, organ-is-ai-ion. The A. S. organan, sb. pl., used to translate Lat. organa in Ps. cxxxvi. 2 (ed. Spelman), can hardly be called an ORGIES, sacred rites accompanied with revelry, revelry, drunkenness. (F., -L.) In Milton, P. L. i. 415; Drayton, Polyolbion, s. 6 (R.) - F. orgies, 'the sacrifices of Bacchus;' Cot. - Lat. orgia, sb. pl., a nocturnal festival in honour of Bacchus, orgies. - Gk. ὅργια, sb. pl., orgies, rites; from sing ὅργιον, a sacred act; closely connected with ἔργον, work. See Organ and Work.

ORIEL, a recess (with a window) in a room. (F., -L.) generally be described as a recess within a building; Blount has oriol, the little waste room next the hall in some houses and monaoriot, the little waste room next the nail in some houses and monasteries, where particular persons dined, and this is clearly an authorised and correct explanation; 'Halliwell's Dict., which see. Spelt aryall in the Squire of Low Degree, l. 93; in Ritson's Metrical Romances, vol. iii. = O. F. oriol, a porch, alley, gallery, corridor; Roquefort. We find le oriol glossed by 'de la chambre,' i. e. the oriel of a chamber, in Wright's Vocab. i. 166, l. 9. The Low Lat. form is oriolum, explained as a small refectory or a portico in Matt. Paris, in Ducange; see the citations in Wedgwood and Halliwell. β. When we come to examine the matter more closely, there need be no doubt as to the etymology, though I am not aware that it has ever been pointed out. The passage from Walter de Biblesworth, in Wright's Vocab. i. 166 (as above), runs thus: 'Plus est delit en le oriol (glossed de la chambre) Escoter la note de l'oriol (glossed a wodewale); 'i.e. it is very delightful in the recess of a chamber to listen to the note of the oriole. Thus the 'oriel' and 'oriole' are olus, golden; and the Low Lat. oriolum (oriel) is plainly for Lat. oriole.

Y. This explains at once the varied use of the word; it meant any portico, recess, or small room, which was more private and better ornamented than the rest of the building. Hence its special application to the small apartment in which it was the privispecial application to the small apartment in which it was the privi-lege of sick monks to dine; 'ut non in infirmaria sed seorsim in oriolo monachi infirmi carnem comederent;' Matt. Paris, in Du-cange. And hence, again, its special application to a lady's closet, or as we should new say, a boudoir, as in the Squire of Low Degree and in the Erl of Tolouse, 1/307; Ritson, Met. Rom. vol. iii. Pliny speaks of 'laquaria, quæ nunc et in privatis domibus auro tegun-tur;' or, in Halland's translation, 'now a daies you shall not see any good house of a privat man, but it is laid thicke and covered over with gold; nay, the bravery of men hath not staid so, but they have proceeded to the arched and embowed rous [roofs] to the haue proceeded to the arched and embowed roufs [roofs], to the walls likewise of their houses, which we may see euerywhere as wel and thoroughly guilded as the siluer plate vpon their cupbourds; tr. of Pliny, b. xxxiii. c. 3. This shews that the custom of gilding certain apartments was derived from the Romans; it was probably common enough elsewhere in early times. There is a good article on the senses of the word Oriel in the Archæologia, vol. xxiii; but the etymology there proposed is ridiculous.

ORIENT, eastern. (F.,-L.) M. E. orient, in Chaucer, C. T. 14320. — F. orient. — Lat. orient-, stem of oriens, the rising sun, the east; properly pres. part. of oriri, to rise. See Origin. Der. orient-al, Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, pt. i. sect. 5, l. 4, from F.

ORIFICE, a small opening. (F., - L.) Spelt orifis in Spenser, F. Q. iv. 12. 22. - F. orifice, 'orifice;' Cot. - Lat. orificium, an opening, lit. 'the making of a mouth.' - Lat. ori-, crude form of os, a ORIFLAMME, the old standard of France. (F.,-L.) oryflambe, a speciall relyke that the Frenshe kynges vse to bere before them in all battayles; 'Fabyan's Chron. an. 1335, ed. Ellis, p. 467.—F. oriflambe, 'the great and holy standard of France;' Cot.—Low Lat. auriflamma, the standard of the monastery of St. Denis in France. The lit. sense is 'golden flame,' hence 'a golden banner;' so called because the banner was cut at the outermost edge into flame-shaped strips, and was carried on a gilt pole. Cf. Lat. flammula, a little flame, also a small banner used by cavalry. — Lat. auri-, for auro-, stem of aurum, gold; and flamma, a flame. See Aureate and Flame. A drawing, showing the shape of the oriflamme, is Flame. A drawing, given in Webster's Dictionar ORIGAN, ORIGANUM, wild marjoram. (F., -L., -Gk.) [An older name is organy, mentioned in Cotgrave; this is A. S. organe, for which see Cockayne's Leechdoms, iii. 340, borrowed directly from Lat. origanum.] In Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xx. c. 17; Spenser, F. Q. i. 2. 40. – F. origan, 'garden organy, wild marjerome;' Cot.—Lat. origanum (Pliny). – Gk. δρίγανον, δρίγανον, marjoram; lit. 'mountainpride.' = Gk. δρτ., for δρει., crude form of δροι, a mountain; and γάνοι, brightness, beauty, ornament, delight.

ORIOLE, the golden thrush. (F.,-L.) Called 'the golden oriole' in a translation of Buffon, London, 1792. The old names are golden thrush, witwall, wodewale, and heighaw. — O. F. oriol, 'a heighaw, or witwall; Cot. (And see quotation under Oriol.) — Lat. aureolus, golden; a dimin. form of aureus, golden.—Lat. aurum, gold; see Aureate. And see Oriel.

ORNAMENT, that which beautifies, adornment. (F., - L.) M. E. ornament; the pl. ornamentes occurs in Chaucer, C. T. 8134 (Six-text, E, 258); where it is remarkable that the Ellesmere and Camb. MSS. have aornementes, and the Hengwrt MS. has aournementes. [These forms answer to O. F. aornement, an ornament, from the verb aorner (= Lat. adornare), to adorn.] Also ornementes, pl., Allit. Gk. δρνιθο-, crude form of δρνιε, a bird; and -λογία, allied to λόγοε, a discourse; see Logie.

β. The Gk. δρνιε is interesting as being cognate with A. S. earn, an eagle, Matt. xxiv. 28. A shorter form appears in Goth. ara, G. aar, an eagle; cf. also Russ. ore?, an eagle. Named from its soaring; cf. Gk. öprvu, I stir up. -✓ AR, to arise; cf. Skt. ri, to rise; see Origin. Der. ornithologiplanets, &c. (Ireland.) 'Constructed at the expense of Charles Boyle, [second] earl of Orrery, about 1715;' Haydn, Dict. of Dates. Orrery is the name of a barony in the county of Cork, in Ireland; the chief town in it is Bannevant.

ORRIS, the name of a plant. (Ital., -L., -Gk.) 'The nature of the orris-root is almost singular; Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 863. Spelt orice in Cotgrave, who explains F. iris by 'the rainbow, also, a flowerdeluce; iris de Florence, the flowerdeluce of Florence, whose root yields our orice-powder.' The Spanish term for orris-root is raiz de iris florentina = root of the Florentine iris. In Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xxi. c. 7, we read: 'but as for the flour-de-lis [commonly called ireos, Holland's note], it is the root only therof that is comfortable for the odor.' It thus appears that orris, orice, and orrice, are English corruptions of the Ital. irios or ireos. = O. Ital. irios, 'a kinde of sweete white roote called oris-roote; Florio, ed. 1598; cf. mod. Parv. p. 371, which has: 'Ortus, releef of beestys mete,' i. e. orts, remnants of the food of animals. Not found in A. S., but it is at least O. Low G., being found in O. Du., Low G., and Friesic. The Friesic is ort (Outzen); the Low G. is ort, esp. used of what is left by cattle in eating; cf. low G. ortetre, refuse-straw: Remen Wörterbuch iii. 272. The Low G. ortstro, refuse-straw; Bremen Wörterbuch, iii. 272. The word is completely solved by the fuller form found in O. Du., viz. word is completely solved by the funer form found in O. Du., viz. oorsets, oorsets, a piece left uneaten at a meal, also nauses due to over-eating; Oudemans, v. 403.

β. This is a compound word, made up of O. Du. oor-, cognate with A.S. or-, O. H. G. ur- (mod. G. er-), Goth. us, prep. signifying 'out' or 'without;' and Du. eten, cognate with E. eat. Thus the sense is 'what is left in eating,' an out-morsel, if we may so express it. For the prefix, see further under Ordeal; and see Eat. Y. This solution, certainly the right one, is pointed out by Wedgwood, but with some hesitation. He adduces some parallel words, some of which are cognate, others mere chance resemblances. We may particularly note Swed. dial. or-ate, ur-ate, refuse fodder, orts, from ur-, or-, the prefix corresponding to Du. oor- above, and Swed. äta, to eat, also victuals, food (Rietz). Also Bavarian urässen, urezen, to eat wastefully, uräss, urez, refuse; where ur- is the O.H.G. form of the same prefix, and ässen = G. essen, to eat; see Schmeller, Bav. Wort. i. 134. With such The A.S. orettan, to spoil, is proproof we may rest content. bably not related. But Lowland Sc. worts, refuse fodder, is E. orts with a prefixed unoriginal w. ORTHODOX, of the right faith. (F.,-L.,-Gk.; or L.,-Gk.) Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, has orthodox and orthodoxal; so also in Cotgrave. - F. orthodoxe, orthodoxe, orthodoxall. - Late Lat. orthodoxus (White). - Gk. δρθόδοξος, of the right opinion. - Gk. δρθο-, crude form of δρθός, upright, right, true; and δόξα, opinion. β. For δρθός, there was a Doric form βορθός; Curtius, ii. 85. It answers to Skt. úrdhva, erect, upright, connected with wridh, to grow, augment, from WARDII, to raise; see Fick, i. 775. γ. Gk. δύξα is from δοκείν, to seem, allied to Lat. decet, it is fitting;

see Decorum. Der. orthodox-y, Gk. δρθοδοξία.

ORTHOEPY, correct pronunciation. (Gk.) The word occurs in Bp. Wilkins, Essay towards a Real Character, pt. iii. c. 1 (R.) This work appeared in 1668. Imitated from Gk. δρθοέπεια, correct pronunciation. - Gk. δρθό-, crude form of δρθόε, right, true; and έπ-os, a word. See Orthodox and Epic.

ORTHOGRAPHY, correct writing. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) In rather early use. Of this word the true ortographie; Remedy of Love (15th cent.), st. 41, l. 6; pr. in Chaucer's Works, ed. 1561, fol. 323, back. The word was at first spelt orto-, as in French, but afterwards corrected. - O. F. ortographie; Cot. only gives the verb ortographier, 'to ortographise, to write or use true ortography.' - Lat. orthographia (White). - Gk. δρθογραφία, a writing correctly. - Gk. δρθό-, crude form of δρθόε, right; and γράφειν, to write; see Orthodox and Graphic. Der. orthographi-c, orthographi-c-al, -al-ly; orthographi-c-al, -al-ly; graph-er, -ist.

ORTHOPTEROUS, lit. straight-winged; an order of insects.

(Gk.) Modern and scientific: coined from δρθδ, crude form of (Gk.) Modern and scientific: coined from δρθό, crude form or δρθόs, right, straight; and πτερ-όν, a wing. See Orthodox and Diptera. So also orthoptera.

ORTOLAN, the name of a bird. (F.,—Ital.,—L.) See Trench, Select Glossary; the word means 'haunting gardens,' and Trench cites ortolan in the early sense of 'gardener' from the State Papers, an. 1536, vol. vi. p. 534.—O. F. hortolan, 'a delicate bird,' &c.; Cot.

O. Ital. hortolano, 'a gardiner; also a daintie bird so called;'
Florio.—Lat. hortulanus, a gardener, belonging to a garden.—Lat. hortulus, a little garden, dimin. of hortus, a garden, cognate with E. garth; see Court, Garth, Yard.

The change from u to o is common in Italian. ORTS, the pl. of Ort, q. v.

OSCILLATE, to swing. (L.) In Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674.—
Lat. oscillatus, pp. of oscillare, to swing, sway.—Lat. oscillum, a swing.

B. Vanicek (with a reference to Corssen in Kuhn's Zeitschrift, xv. 156) identifies oscillum, a swing, with oscillum, a little mouth, a little cavity, a little image of the face, mask or head of Bacchus which was suspended on a tree (White); with the remark that it meant a puppet made to swing or dance. If so, oscillum is a dimin. of osculum, the mouth, itself a dimin. from os, the mouth; see dimin. of osculum, the mouth, itself a dimin. from os, the mouth; see Oral. Der. oscillat-ion, oscillat-or-y. And see osculate.

OSCULATE, to kiss. (L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674.—Lat. osculatus, pp. of osculari, to kiss.—Lat. osculum, a little mouth, pretty mouth; double dimin. (with suffix -cu-lu-) from os, the mouth; see Oral. Der. osculat-or-y, osculat-ion.

112. M. E. osyere; Prompt. Parv. p. 371.—F. osier, 'the ozier, red withy, water-willow tree;' Cot.

$\text{S}\text{ Origin somewhat uncertain}; \text{Littre} \text{cites the Berry forms oisi, oisil, oisis, ousier: Walloon, weisith.} with Lat. tris, which is the very word in Pliny, b. xxi. c. 7; and this is borrowed from Gk. 7µs, 'the plant iris, a kind of lily with an aromatic root;' Liddell and Scott. See Iris.

Usually in the pl. orts, Troil. v. 2. 158; Timon iv. 3. 400. M.E. Littré cites the Berry forms oisi, oisil, oisis, ousier; Walloon, woisir, Burgundian oseire. Passing over the Low Lat. oseria, oserius, ozilium, & OTHER, second, different, not the same. (E.) as merely F. words Latinised, he draws attention to Low Lat. osariæ, ausaria, osier-beds, forms found in the oth century. The most likely derivation is from Gk. oloos, an osier; but it remains to be shewn by what route the Gk. word came into French.

7. Yet we may be pretty sure as to the root; the Gk. oloos is allied to Lat. ui-tex, ui-men, and to E. wi-thy, all from WI, to bind, wind. So also the Berry oiii, Walloon woisir, point to the same root. See Withy.

OSMIUM, a metal. (Gk.) Discovered in 1803 (Haydn). The oxide has a disagreeable smell; hence the name coined from Cl.

oxide has a disagreeable smell; hence the name, coined from Gk. δσμή, a smell; earlier form δδμή. Connected with δζειν (= δδ-γειν), osmell, and with Lat. odor; see Odour.

OSPREY, the fish-hawk. (L.) In Shak. Cor. v. 7. 34; cf. Two Noble Kinsmen, i. 1. 138. In the old texts, it is spelt aspray in both passages. Spelt osprey, ospreie, orfraie in Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. x. c. 3; all these forms are various corruptions of ossifrage, also occurring in the same chapter. The name signifies 'bone-breaker;' from the bird's strength.

B. The form or fraise is from O. F. or fraye, the bird's strength. β . The form or fraise is from O. F. or fraye, the osprey; Cot. The forms osprey and ossifrage are directly from Lat. ossifragus, ossifraga, the sea-eagle, osprcy. - Lat. ossifragus, bone breaking. - Lat. ossi-, crude form of os, a bone; and frag-, base of frangere, to break, cognate with E. break. See Osseous and

OSSEOUS, bony. (I..) A late word; added by Todd to Johnson. – Lat. osseus, bony; by change of -us to -ous (common). – Lat. oss-, stem of os, a bone. β. Allied to Gk. ὀστέον, Skt. asthi, a bone. Pictet suggests AS, to throw; cf. Skt. as, to throw. He supposes that the bones were thrown away, after the animals were eaten; see Curtius, i. 258. Der. ossi-fy, to turn to bone, from ossi-, crude form of os, and F. -fier = Lat. ficare (for facere), to make; ossific-at-ion; ossu-ar-y, Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, c. v. § 4, from Lat. ossuarium, a receptacle for the bones of the dead. Also ossi-frage, OSSIFRAGE, an osprey; also, the bearded vulture. (L.) Levit. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12. - Lat. ossifraga, a bone-breaker; see OSTENSIBLE, that may be shewn, apparent. (L.) Todd's Johnson. Coined by adding the suffix -ble (F. -ble, Lat. -bilis) to ostensis, put for ostenso, crude form of ostensus, pp. of ostendere, to shew.

8. Ostendere is for ob-s-tendere, where the s appears to be a mere insertion for ease of pronunciation. - Lat. ob, near, before; and tendere, to stretch; hence the sense is 'to spread before' one, to shew. See Ob- and Tend. Der. ostensi-bl-y, ostensi-bili-ty; we also find ostens-ive = 'that serves to shew,' Phillips, ed. 1706, perhaps obsolete. And see ostent-at-ion.

OSTENTATION, shew, pomp. (F., -L.) 'Ostentacion and shew;' Sir T. More, Works, p. 1191 c. - F. ostentation, 'ostentation;' Cot. - Lat. ostentationem, acc. of ostentatio, display. - Lat. ostentatus, pp. of ostentare, intensive form of ostendere, to show; see Ostensible. Der. ostentati-ous, a late coinage; ostentati-ous-ly, -ness. We also find ostent, Merch. Ven. ii. 2. 205, from Lat. ostentus, ostiler, an innkeeper, Luke, x. 35.

OSTRACISE, to banish by a vote written on a potsherd. (Gk.) And all that worth from thence did ostracise; 'Marvel, Lachrym. Mus., A.D. 1650 (R.) [The sh. ostracisme is in Minsheu, ed. 1627, and the O. F. ostracisme is in Cotgrave.] - Gk. δστρακίζειν, to banish by potsherds, to ostracise. - Gk. ὅστρακον, burnt clay, a tile, potsherd, tablet for voting; also, a shell, which appears to be the orig. meaning. β. Closely allied to Gk. δστρεον, an oyster, and to Gk. δστέον, a bone. See Oyster and Osseous. Der. ostracis-m (= F. ostracisme), from Gk. όστρακισμός.

OSTRICH, a very large bird. (F., -L. and Gk.) M.E. oystryche, Squire of Low Degree, 1. 226; in Ritson, Met. Romances, vol. iii. Earliar ostrice, Ancren Riwle, p. 132, note e. Ostrice is a weakened form of ostruce. - O. F. ostrusce (12th cent.), ostruche, Palsgrave, ostruce. Cotgrave, mod. F. autruche; see Littré. Cf. Span. avestruz, Port. B. All from Lat. auis struthio, i. e. ostrichabestruz, an ostrich. bird. - Lat. auis, a bird; and struthio, an ostrich, borrowed from Gk. στρουθίων, an ostrich. γ. For the Lat. auis, see Aviary. The Gk. στρουθίων is an extention from στρουθόs, a bird. 'It is extremely probable that στρούθοι or στρουθόι is identical in its root with the synonymous Goth. sparwa, and the -00 may perhaps be regarded as a dimin. suffix;' Curtius, ii. 361. See Sparrow. ¶ The Lat. auis also occurs as a prefix in the singular word bustard (= auis sarda); see Bustard. N. B. We find also the spelling estridge, 1 Hen. IV, iv. 1. 98.

A. The word second is the only ordinal number of F. origin, till we come to millionth; it has taken the place of other, which formerly frequently had the sense of 'second.' B. We constantly meet with thet on, thet other = the one, the other (lit. that one, that other); these phrases are often spelt the ton, the tother, the t being attached to the wrong word; and this explains the common prov. E. the tother, often used as tother, without the. It must be remembered that thet or that was orig. merely the neut. of the def. article. 'And euer whyl that on hire sorwe tolde That other wepte' = and ever, whilst the one told on hire sorwe tolde Inal other wepte: and ever, whilst the one told her sorrow, the other wept; Chaucer, C. T. 10809. — A. S. over, other, second, Grein, ii. 305. The long o is due to loss of n, as in gos (goose) for gans, too (tooth) for tunth; hence over stands for ander. + Du. ander. + Icel. annarr (for antherr, by assimilation). + Dan. anden, neut. andet, pl. andre. + Swed. andra, next, second, other. + G. ander. + Goth. anther. + Lithuan. antras, other, second (Nesselmann). + Lat. alter (for anter; cf. Lat. alius with Skt. anya). + Skt. antara, other.

B. We also find Skt. anya, other; which at once shews the division of the word. [We must be careful by the once shews the division of the word. [We must be careful, by the way, to separate Skt. antara, other, from Skt. antara, interior, connected with antar (Lat. inter), within.] In Skt. an-tara, Goth. an-thar, E. o-ther, the suffix is the usual comparative suffix appearing in Gk. σοφώ-τερ-ος, wiser, &c.; seen also in E. whe ther, either, hither, &c.; the Aryan form being -TAR.

γ. The base an-is from the Aryan pronominal base ANA, appearing as a base of some of the cases of Skt. idam, this; found also in Lithuan. an-as, that one (Nesselmann, p. 5), and in Russ. on, he. Thus the orig. sense is 'more than that,' or 'beyond that,' used in pointing out something more remote than that which was first contemplated; hence its use in the sense of 'second.' Der. other-wise, M. E. other wise = in another way, Will. of Palerne, l. 396; an-other. Distinct from M. E. other = or, which is a form of either, as shewn under Or.

OTTER, the water-weasel. (E.) M. E. oter (with one t); Old Eng. Miscellany, ed. Morris, p. 70, l. 358. – A. S. otor, as a gloss to Lat. lutria in Ælfric's Gloss., Nomina Ferarum; Wright, i. 222; spelt oter, id. i. 78. Hence the adj. yteren, by vowel-change; Sweet's A. S. Reader. + Du. otter. + Icel. otr. + Dan. odder. + Swed. utter. + R. otter. + Russ. wildra. + Lithuan. udra. + Gk. υδρα. a water-snake, hydra.

β. The common Tcutonic type is UTRA, answering to Aryan UDRA, standing for orig. WADRA; it is closely related to water; cf. Gk. võpa, water-snake, with võpa, water. The sense is 'water-animal.' Scc Water, Wet. Doublet, hydra.

OTTO, a bad spelling of ATTAR, q. v. (Arab.)

OTTOMAN, a low stuffed seat. (F., - Turk.) - F. ottomane, 'an ottoman, sofa;' Hamilton. - F. Ottoman, Turkish, Turk. So named from Others of the foundary of the Ottoman or Turkish from Othman or Osman, the founder of the Ottoman or Turkish empire in A.D. 1299

OUCH, NOUCH, the socket of a precious stone, an ornament. (F., -O. H. G.) The orig. sense is 'socket of a gem,' but it is commonly used for gem or ornament. The true form is nouch, but the initial n is often dropped; see remarks upon the letter N. Spelt ouches in Exod. xxviii, xxix; and in Shak. 2 Hen. IV, ii. 4. 53; owches in Sir T. More, Works, p. 337 d. 'As a precious stone in a riche ouche;' Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, b. iii. c. 28. M. E. nouche, Chaucer, C. T. 8258 (after a word ending with a consonant); but an ouch (for a nouch) in C. T. 6325. 'Nowche, monile;' Prompt. Parv. p. 359, and see Way's note; he cites: 'Fermaglio, the hangeyng ouche, or flowre that women use to tye at the chaine or lace that they weare about their neckes, W. Thomas, Ital. Grammar, 1548. So that one sense of the word is exactly mod. E. 'locket.' 'A golden lase or nouche;' Wyclif, I Macc. x. 89; where the A. V. has 'a buckle of gold.' — O. F. nouche, nosche, nusche, a buckle, clasp, bracelet, given by Burguy, s. v. nosche. [It is, indeed, obvious that the Low Lat. nouchia, which occurs in the Inventory of jewels of Blanche of Spain (cited in Way's note) is nothing but the F. nouche Latinised.] The more correct Low Lat. form is nusca (Ducange). -M.H.G. nusche, nuske, O.H.G. nusca, nuscha, a buckle, clasp, or brooch for a cloak.

OUGHT (1), past tense of Owe, q. v. (E.)
OUGHT (2), another spelling of Aught, q. v. (E.) Spelt ougt in Wyclif, Luke, ix. 36.

OUNCE (1), the twelfth part of a pound. (F., -L.) M. E. unce, Chaucer, C. T. 16224, 16589, 16631. - O. F. unce (12th cent.), mod. F. once (Littre). - Lat. uncia, (1) an ounce, (2) an inch. β. The orig. sense is 'a small weight;' allied to Gk. δγκος, bulk, mass, weight. Doublet, inch.

OUNCE (2), ONCE, a kind of lynx. (F., - Pers.?) In Milton, P. L. iv. 344; and in Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xxviii. c. 8, last section.

F. once, an ounce. Cf. Port. onca, Span. onza, Ital. lonza, an ounce.

B. It is a question whether the Ital. shews the true form, or not; it is more probable that lonza stands for l'onza in Ital, than OUTCRY, a crying out, clamour. (Hybrid; E. and F., - L.) that l has been dropped in the other languages. I believe this point admits of direct proof; for though lonza is an old word in Ital. (occurring in Dante, Inf. i. 32), it is certain that onza was also in use, a fact which the authorities have overlooked. Yet Florio, ed. 1598, records: 'Onza, an ounce weight, also a beast called an ounce or cat of mountaine.' y. A derivation from Lat. lynx is (I think) out of the question; because we find Ital. lince, a lynx. It is most likely that all the forms are nasalised forms of the Pers, name for the animal. Cf. Pers. yúz, 'a panther, a pard, a lynx, those esp. used in hunting deer' [i. e. the ounce]; Rich. Dict. p. 1712.

OUR, possessive pronoun of the 1st pers. plural. (E.) M. E. oure, older form ure; Havelok, l. 13. — A. S. úre, gen. pl. of 1st personal pronoun; orig. meaning 'of us.' This gen. pl. was used as a possessive pronoun, and regularly declined, with gen. úres, dat. úrum, &c.: see Grein. ji. 622. It then completely employed the older &c.; see Grein, ii. 633. It then completely supplanted the older A. S. possess. pron. user, user (Grein, ii. 633), cognate with G. unser and Goth. unsar. β . Yet ure is itself a contracted form for usere (contracted to user, urre, ure), which again stands for unsara, the Gothic form of the gen. pl. of the 1st pers. pronoun. Here -ara is the gen. pl. suffix, and a shorter form appears in Goth. uns, equivalent to E. us.

y. Briefly, our is the gen. pl. corresponding to the acc. pl. us; see Us.

Der. our-s, M. E. oures, Chaucer, C. T. 13203, due to A. S. úres, gen. sing. of úre, when declined as above; also our-selves, or (in regal style) our-self; see Self. also our-selves, or (in regal style) our-self; see Self. As to the dispute as to whether we should write ours or our's, it cannot matter; we write day's for A.S. dæges (gen. sing.), but days for A. S. dagas (nom. pl.), thus marking the omission, strangely enough, only where the weaker vowel is omitted. The apostrophe is merely conventional, and better omitted.

OURANG-OUTANG; see Orang-Outang. (Malay.)
OUSEL, a kind of thrush. (E.) M. E. osel, Wright's Vocab. i.
164, l. 3; osul, Trevisa, tr. of Higden, i. 237. — A. S. osle, Wright's Vocab. i. 281, col. i, l. 17. Here, as in A. S. ober, other = Goth. anthar, the long o stands for an or am; thus o'sle = o'sele = ansele or amsele.+G. amsel, O. H. G. amsala, a blackbird, ousel; we also find M. H. G. amelsá, O. H. G. amaslá. β. The orig. form is AMSALA;

OUST, to eject, expel. (F., - L.) The word has come to us through Law French. Ousted, from the Fr. oster, to remove, or put out, as ousted of the possession (Pecks Case, Mich. 9 Car. 1. 3 Part Crokes Rep. fol. 349), that is, removed, or put out of possession; Blount's Nomolexicon, ed. 1691. — O. F. oster, 'to remove, withdraw,' Cot.; mod. F. ôter. Cf. Prov. ostar, hostar (Bartsch). B. Of disputed origin; it has been proposed to derive it from Lat. obstare, to withstand, hinder, but this does not well suit the sense. The most likely solution is that of Diez, who derives it from haustare *, a supposed derivative of haurire, to draw water; we at any rate have the word exhaust in English, formed from Lat. exhaurire, which was used in the precise sense required, viz. 'to take away, remove' (White). See Exhaust. Der. oust-er.

OUT, without, abroad, completely. (E.) M. E. oute, older form ute, adv., out. 'That hii ne solde oute wende' = that they should not go out; Rob. of Glouc. p. 170, l. 16. - A. S. úte, útan, adv., out, without; Grein, i. 634. Formed with adv. suffix -e (or -an) from A. S. út, adv. 'Fleogan of húse út' = to fly out of the house;' 'út of earce '= out of the ark; Grein, ii. 633. (This shews the origin of the phrase out of = out from.) + Du. uit. + Icel. út. + Dan. ud. + Swed. ut.+G. aus, O.H.G. úz.+Goth. ut; whence uta, adv. (= A.S. úte); utana, adv. and prep. (= A. S. útan). +Skt. ud, up, out. It appears also in Gk. ὕστεροε = ὕδ-τεροε, corresponding to E. utter, outer. All from an Aryan type UD, up, out. Der. with-out, there-out, out-er, ut-ter, out-m-ost, ut-m-ost (double superlatives); see Utter, Utmost, Uttermost. Also as a prefix in numerous compounds, for which see below. (But not in outrage.)

OVAL, of the shape of an egg. (F.,-L.) Spelt ovall in Minsheu, ed. 1627. - O. F. oval, 'ovall, shaped like an egg;' Cot. Formed with suffix -al (= Lat. -alis) from Lat. ou-um, an egg; there was prob. a late Latin oualis. adj., but it is not recorded.

8. Ouum is prob. a late Latin oualis, adj., but it is not recorded. cognate with Gk. ωόν, an egg; and both answer to a common base AWIA, from AWI, a bird, appearing in Lat. auis; see Aviary. The common Teutonic type is AGGWIA; the introduction of gg before w, in other cases chiefly confined to single dialects, appears in this word to be universally Teutonic; Fick, iii. 13. From the Teut. type ou-ar-y, Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. iii. c. 28, § 5, from Low Lat. ouaria, the part of the body where eggs are formed in birds (Ducange); ou-ate, i. e. egg-shaped, a coined word, with suffix answeringth of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later or of the later o ing to Lat. -atus, the pp. suffix of the 1st conjugation; and see ovi-form.

OVATION, a lesser Roman triumph. (F., -L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. - F. ovation, 'a small triumph granted to a commander;' - Lat. ouationem, acc. of ouatio, lit. shouting, exultation. - Lat. ouatus, pp. of ouare, to shout. + Gk. abev, to shout, call aloud.

ouatus, pp. of ouare, to shout. + GK. aveu, to shout, call aloud. B. The verbs are of imitative origin, to denote the sound made by violent expulsion of breath. Cf. Skt. vú, to blow; and E. wind.

OVEN, a furnace, cavity for baking bread, &c. (E.) M. E. ouen (with u for v), Wyclif, Luke, xii. 28. - A. S. ofen, ofn. Grein, ii. 310. + Du. oven. + Icel. ofn. later omn; of which an earlier form ogn is found. + Swed. ugn. + G. ofen. + Goth. auhns.

B. It would appear that the common Teut. base is UHNA, for which some dialects substituted UFNA, putting the labial for the guttural sound, just as in the mod. pronunciation of E. laugh, cough; see Fick, iii. 32. Cf.

Gk. invos, an oven. Root unknown.

OVER, above, across, along the surface of. (E.) M. E. ouer (with u for v), Chaucer, C. T. 3920. – A. S ofer (Grein). + Du. over. + Iccl. yfir; also ofr, adv., exceedingly. + Dan. over. + Swed. öfver. + G. wher, O.H.G. ubar. + Goth. ufar. + Gk. bnép. + Lat. super. + Skt. upari, above.

B. The prefixed s in Lat. super has not yet been satisfactorily explained; see remarks in Curtius, i. 360; yet it clearly belongs to the set. The common Teut. type is UFAR, answering to Aryan UPARI, evidently the locative case of the Aryan adj. UPARA, upper, appearing in Skt. upara (Vedic, given under upari in Benfey), Lat. superus, A. S. ufera (Grein, ii. 614). y. It is obvious that UPARA is a comparative form; the superlative takes a double shape, (1) with suffix -MA, as in Lat. summus (from s-upama), highest, A.S. ufema, highest (only found with an additional suffix -est in ufemyst, written for ufemest, in Gen. xl. 17); and (2) with suffix -TA, as in Gk. braros, highest, and in E. oft; see Sum and 8. The positive form is UPA; this appears in Skt. upa, near, on, under, Gk. bnó, under, Lat. sub, under, Goth. uf, under, M. H. G. obe, ob, O. H. G. oba, opa, upon, over. A closely related adverbial form occurs in Goth. ufan, above, G. oben, and E. -ove in ab-ove. The orig. sense was prob. 'near,' with esp. reference to things lying above one another. The Goth. form uf appears to be further related to E. up, and G. auf, upon; so that there are two parallel Teutonic types, viz. UF (Goth. uf, G. oben, E. ab-ove) and the control of the sense of nearness; if we draw two parallel ways, as in Lat. sub, under, and super, above; perhaps we may explain this from the sense of nearness; if we draw two parallel horizontal lines, near together, we say that the under one is close up to the upper one; and a ball thrown up to the ceiling is always Todd's Johnson. See Lap.

$. We may further note M. E. over, adj., with the sense of 'upper,' Chaucer, C. T. 133; and M. E. over, adj., with the sense of 'uppermost,' id. 292. The exact formation of the word is uncertain; Diez cites Prov. obrir, ubrir, O. Ital. oprire (Florio), to open, which he distinguishes from Span. barir, mod. Ital. y. As to ourir. aprire, derived directly from Lat. aperire, to open.

open, words of three syllables, occurring in the Livre des Rois. These forms arose from Prov. adubrir (Raynouard, Lexique Roman, ii. 104), in which the prefixed a- (= Lat. ad) does not alter the sense, but is added as in ablasmar, afranher; whilst dubrir is from the Lat. de-operire, to open wide, lit. 'uncover,' used by Celsus (White). He supports this by instancing mod. Prov. durbir, Piedmontese durvi, Walloon drovi, Lorraine deurvi, all corresponding to the same Lat. deoperire. 8. On the other hand, Littre supposes an early confusion between Lat. aperire, to open, and operire, to cover; and looks upon owir as a corruption of avrir (= aperire); whence dubrir might be explained as being formed with de used intensively, so that de-aperire would be to 'open completely' rather than to 'uncover.' See the whole discussion in Littre. e. Even if we can settle the question as to whether the word depends on Lat. aperire or operire, difficulties remain in these words also. Perhaps aperire = ab-perire, to uncover, and operire = ob-perire, to cover up; and -perire may be related to parare, to get ready, prepare; see Farade. Der. overt-ly; overt-ure, meaning 'an open, unprotected place.' Spenser, Shep. Kal. July, 28, from O. OWE, to possess; hence, to possess another's property, to be in debt, be obliged. (E.) M. E. azen, awen, ozen, owen, orig. 'to possess;' hence, to be obliged to do, to be in debt. 'The dette thet tu owest me' = the debt that thou owest me, Ancren Riwle, p. 126, l. 13. 'How myche owist thou?' Wyclif, Luke, xvi. 5. For this important verb, see Mätzner's O. Eng. Dict. p. 49, s. v. a3/n; or Stratmann, p. 23. The sense 'to possess' is very common in Shake-speare; see Schmidt. — A. S. ágan, to have, possess, Grein, i. 19. The change from a to o is perfectly regular, as in ban, bone, stan, stone; the g passes into w, as usual. + Icel. eiga, to possess, have, be bound, own. + Dan. eig, to own, possess. + Swed. äga, to own, possess, have a right to, be able to. + O. H. G. eigan, to possess. + Goth. aigan, to possess.

B. Further related to Skt. ig, to possess. to be able; whence iga, a proprietor, owner; the form of the root Gk. bypos, moist, and in Lat. ümidus (= ug-midus), moist, as well as being IK; Fick, i. 28.

¶ It may be noted that the Goth. aigan in Icel. vökr, moist, prov. E. wokey, moist (Halliwell); see Curtius, has the old past tense aih, used as a present tense; so also A.S. ah. Hence the base of the Teutonic words is AIH, strengthened from IH, answering to $\sqrt{1}$ K. There is, therefore, no connection with the Gk. $\ell\chi\epsilon\nu$, which has, moreover, lost an initial s, and answers to Skt. sah; see Scheme.

OUGHT. The pres. tense of A. S. ágan is áh, really an old past tense; the past tense is ahte (= Goth. aihta), really a secondary past tense or pluperfect; this became M. E. ahle, agte, aughte, oughte, properly dissyllabic, as in 'oughtë be,' Chaucer, C. T. 16808, where Tyrwhitt has the inferior reading 'ought to be.' The pp. of A. S. ágan was ágen, for which see Own (1). Der. ow-ing, esp. in phr.

owing to, i. e. due to, because of. Also own (1), own (2).

OWL, a nocturnal bird. (E.) M. E. oule, Chaucer, Parl. of Foules, 343; pl. oules, id. 590. – A. S. úle, Levit. xi. 16. + Du. uil. + Icel. ugla. + Dan. ugle. + Swed. ugla. + G. eule, O. H. G. hiuwelá, úwela. β. Allied to Lat. ulula, an owl, Skt. ulúka, an owl. All from ✓UL, to hoot, howl, screech, a root of imitative origin; cf. Gk. ελάω, I howl, ελολύζειν, to howl, ελελεῖ, interjection; Lat. ululare, to howl, wlucus, a screech-owl.

y. With a prefixed h, added for emphasis, we get G. heulen, whence O.F. huller, E. howl; see Howl. Somewhat similar is G. uhu, an owl, M. H. G. húwe, O. H. G. húwe; cf. E. hoot. Der. owl-et, dimin. form, also spelt howlet, Macb. iv. 1. 17; owl-ish; and see hurly-burly.

OWN (1), possessed by any one, proper, peculiar, belonging to oneself. (E.) M. E. azen. awen (North. E. awin), owen; later, contracted to own by omission of e. 'Right at min owen cost, and be your gyde;' Chaucer, C. T. 806. 'Thar awyn fre' = their own free property; Barbour, Bruce, iii. 752. - A. S. agen, own, Grein, i. 20; orig. the pp. of the anomalous strong verb agan, to owe, i.e. to possess; see Owe.+lccl. eigin, one's own; orig. the old pp. of eiga, to possess.+ Dan. and Swed. egen, one's own.+Goth. aigin, property, possessions; a neut. sb. formed from the adj. which was orig. the old possessions; a ficult so, to med norm the adj, which was ong, the ord pp. of aigan, to possess. Thus the orig, sense is 'possessed' or 'held.' Der. own, verb, to possess; see own (2).

OWN (2), to possess. (E.) M.E. anien, ahnien, ohnien, ahnen, ohnen; see Layamon, 11864, 25359; Ormulum, 5649.—A.S. ágnian, to appropriate, claim as one's own; Grein, i. 22. Formed with causal suffix -ian from agn, contracted form of agen, one's own; see Own (1). + Icel. eigna, to claim as one's own; from eigin, own.+ Goth. ga-aiginon, to make a gain of, lit. make one's own, 2 Cor. ii. 11; from aigin, one's own property.

It is thus evident that the verb is a derivative from the adjective.

Der. own-er, M. E. ozenere, Ayenbite of Inwyt, ed. Morris, p. 37, last line but one; owner-ship.

OWN (3), to grant, admit. (E.) This word is, in its origin, totally distinct from the preceding, though the words have been confused almost inextricably. 'You will not own it,' i.e. admit it, Winter's Tale, iii. 2. 60. The verb should rather be to oun, but the influence of the commoner own has swept away all distinction. M. E. unnen, to grant, admit, be pleased with. '3if pu hit wel unnest' = if you are well pleased with it; Ancren Riwle, p. 282, l. 23. 'Ge nowen nout unnen jet eni vuel word kome of ou' = ye ought not to permit that any evil word should come from you; id. p. 380, 1.5. 'Godd haue' burh his grace se much luue unned' = God hath, through his grace, granted so much love; Hali Meidenhad, ed. Cockayne, p. 13, l. 27. See note on unnan in Seinte Marharete, ed. Cockayne, p. 111. [A. The pres. tense singular, 1st and 3rd person, had the form an, on; as 'ich on wel that ye witen' = I fully own that ye know; St. Catharine, 1761; '3if god hit an' = if God will grant it, Layamon, 14851; 'he on' = he grants, allows, O. Eng. Miscellany, ed. Morris, p. 116, ll. 239, 241. See further as to this singular word in Stratmann, s, v. an, unnen. - A. S. unnan, to grant; old past tense used as present, ic an, Grein, ii. 625. + Icel. unna, pres. tense ek ann, to grant, allow, bestow (cognate with E. own, as noted in Icel. Dict.) + O. Sax. gi-unnan, to grant, + G. gönnen, to grant, M. H. G. gunnen, O. H. G. gi-unnan. See Fick, i. 17. be remarked that the true old sense was 'to grant as a favour;' hence the sense 'to grant as an admission,' to allow, admit. In the constant presence of the common verb to own, both the history and the true sense of the word have suffered.

OX, a ruminant quadruped. (E.) M. E. ox, pl. oxen, Chaucer, C. T. 889; oxis, Wyclif, Luke, xvii. 7. — A. S. oxa, pl. oxan, Grein, ii. 360. + Du. os. + Icel. uxi, also oxi; pl. yxn, öxn. + Dan. oxe, pl. oxer. + Swed. oxe. + G. ochse, ochs, pl. ochsen; O.H.G. ohso. + Goth. auksa, auksus, + W. ych, pl. ychen. + Skt. ukshan, an ox, bull; also, 'a Vedic epithet of the Maruts who, by bringing rain, i.e. by sprinkling, impregnate the carth like bulls; Benfey. The Maruts are storms; see Max Müller, Lectures, ii. 416.

B. The etymology of Skt. ukshan is known, viz. from uksh, to sprinkle. Further, uksh stands for waksh, and is an extension of the root WAG, to wet, appearing in Spectator, no. 104.

i. 229; Fick, i. 764; Benfey, p. 108.

v. Hence ox is ultimately co-radicate with humid; see Humid.

Der. ox-eye, a plant, ox-eyed,

OXALIS, wood-sorrel. (L., -Gk.) In Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xx. c. 21. - Lat. oxalis (Pliny). - Gk. ofalis, (1) a sour wine, (2) sorrel. So named from its sourness. - Gk. of vs, sharp, keen, cutting, acid. — AKS, an extended form of AK, to pierce; see Axe, Acid. Der. oxali-e; cf. ox-ide, oxy-gen, oxy-mel, oxy-tone.

OXIDE, a compound of oxygen with a non-acid base. (Gk.) A coined word; from ox-, short for oxy-, part of the word oxy-gen; and -ide, which appears to be due to Gk. -eions, like, and more commonly appears as -id, as in ellipso-id, sphero-id, ovo-id, and the like. See Oxygen. Der. oxid-ise, oxid-is-er, oxid-is-able, oxid-at-ion; all coined words.

OXLIP, the greater cowslip. (E.) In Mids. Nt. Dr. ii. 1. 250; Wint. Ta. iv. 4. 125. - A.S. oxanslyppe; see Cockayne's Leechdoms, iii. 340.—A. S. oxan, gen. case of oxa, an ox; and slyppe, a slop, i.e. a piece of dung. [This word fully confirms the etymology of couslip already given; see Cowslip.] ¶ It should therefore be spelt ox-slip. Cf. M. E. cousloppe, cowslowpe, Wright's Voc. i. 162, 226. OXYGEN, a gas often found in acid compounds. (Gk.) The sense is 'generator of acids;' and it is a coined word. The discovery of oxygen dates from 1744 (Haydn). - Gk. ôfb- (written oxyin Roman characters), crude form of δεύε, sharp, keen, acid; and γεν-, to produce, base of γί-γν-ομαι (= γι-γεν-ομαι), I am produced or born. See Oxalis and Generate. Der. oxygen-ate, oxygen-ise, oxygen-ous; and see ox-ide.

Wright's Vocab. i. 65. The diphthong shews the mod. E. form to Wright's Vocab. i. 65. The diphthong shews the mod. E. form to be from the French. M. E. oistre, Chaucer, C. T. 182. - O. F. oistre, in the 13th cent. (Littré); whence mod. F. huître. - Lat. ostrea, more Gk. δστέον, a bone, shell; akin to Lat. os (gen. ossis), a bone. See Osseous, Ostracise. rarely ostreum. - Gk. ὅστρεον, an oyster; so called from its shell. -

PACHA, another spelling of Pasha, q. v. PACHYDERMATOUS, thick-skinned. (Gk.) Modern and scientific. = Gk. παχύ-, crude form of παχύs, thick; and δερματ-, stem of δερμα, a skin; with suffix -ous (= Lat. -osus). β. The Gk. παχύε is lit. Der. pachyderm, an abbreviation for pachydermatous animal.

Der. pachyderm, an abbreviation for pachydermatous animal.

PACIFY, to appease, make peaceful. (F.,=L.) Spelt pacifie, Sir T. More, Works, p. 871b.=F. pacifier, 'to pacifie;' Cot.=Lat. pacificare, pacificari, to make peace.=Lat. paci, crude form of pax, peace; and -ficare, for facere, to make; see Peace and Fact.

Der. pacifi-er, spelt pacyfyer, Sir T. L. xi. 860, from F. pacifications' (Cot.), which from Lat. adj. pacificus, peacemaking: pacific-al, pacific-al-ly.

PACK, a bundle, burden, set of cards or hounds, &c. (C.) M.E. pakke, P. Plowman, B. xiii. 201; pl. packes, Ancren Riwle, p. 166, last line. Cf. Icel. pakki, a pack, bundle; Dan. pakke; Swed. packa; Du. pak; G. pack.

B. But it does not appear to be a true Teutonic word; few Teutonic words begin with p. It is rather a survival of an O. Celtic pak, still preserved in Gael. pac, a pack, a mob (cf. E. pack of rascals), pac, verb, to pack up; Irish pac, pacadh, a pack, pacaigim, I pack up; Bret. pak, a pack; cf. W. baich, a burden.

y. And these words, in accordance with Grimm's law, may fairly be considered as allied to Lat. pangere, to fasten, Skt. paq, to bind, Skt. paqa, a tie, band. — PAK, to fasten; see Pact. Thus the original sense is 'that which is tied up.' Der. pack, verb, M. E. pakken, P. Plowman, B. xv. 184; pack-er, pack-horse, 2 Hen. IV, ii. 4. 177; pack-ing; pack-man; pack-needle or pack-ing-needle, M.E. pakkenedle or paknedle, P. Plowman, B. v. 212; pack-saddle, Cor. ii. 1. 99; packthread, Romeo, v. 1. 47. Also pack-age, q.v., pack-et, q.v. Quite distinct from bag.

PACKAGE, a packet, small bundle. (C.; with F. suffix.) A late and clumsy word; added by Todd to Johnson; formed by adding F. suffix -age (= Lat. -aticum) to E. pack; see Pack. Doublet, PACKET, a small pack, package. (F., -I.ow G., -C.) In Hamlet, v. 2. 15. -O. F. pacquet, paquet, 'a packet, bundle;' Cot. Formed with dimin. suffix -et from Low Lat. paccus, a bundle, used A. D. 1506; Ducange. - Low G. pakk, a pack (Bremen Wörterbuch); O. Du. pack, 'a pack' (Hexham); Icel. pakki. Of Celtic origin; see It does not seem to be an old word in G., so that the Low Lat. word is prob. from Low G. or Dutch. Der. packet-boat, a boat for carrying mail-bags, Evelyn's Diary, Oct. 10, 1641; now often shortened to packet. Doublet, package.

PACT, a contract. (L.) In Bacon, Life of Hen. VII, ed. Lumby, p. 7, l. 19; and p. 27, l. 30.—Lat. pactum, an agreement.—Lat. pactus, pp. of paciscere, to stipulate, agree; inceptive form of O. Lat. pacere, to agree, come to an agreement about anything. — PAK, to bind; whence also Skt. pac, to bind, Gk. πηγνυμ, I fasten; as well as E. fadge; see Fadge. Der. pact-ion, Fox's Martyrs, p. 272 (R.). from F. paction (Cot.) = Lat. pactionem, acc. of pactio, an agreement. Also com-pact, im-pact, im-pinge. From the same root we have fang, fee; also pack, peace, paci-fy, pachy-dermatous, perhaps pag-an (with paynim), perhaps page (1), page (2), pale (1), palette, pallet (2), pay, pro-pag-ate, peasant, pec-uliar, pec-uniary.

PAD (1), a soft cushion, &c. (Scand.? or C.?)

'He was kept in the bands, having under him but onely a pad of straw;'

Martyrs, p. 854 (R.) Spelt padde, Gascoigne, Fruits of War, st. 177. A stuffed saddle was called a pad; hence: 'Padde, saddle,' in Levins, ed. 1570. It also occurs in the sense of 'bundle;' see Halliwell. It is merely another form of pod, the orig. sense being 'bag.' Pod is the better spelling, as the o represents an older u. See Pod. Der.

pad, verb; padd-ing.

PAD (2), a thief on the high road. (Du.) We now speak of a foot-pad. The old word is a padder, Massinger, A New Way, ii. 1, l. 15 from end; Butler, Hudibras, pt. iii. c. 1, l. 5 from end. This means one who goes upon the pad or foot-path. A pad is also a 'roadster,' a horse for riding on roads; Gay's Fables, no. 46; also (more correctly) called a pad-nag, i.e. 'road-horse' (R.) = Du. pad, a path; O. Du. padt (Hexham); cf. Low G. pad. Cognate with E. path; see Path. See Many cant words are of Du. origin; see Beaum. and Fletcher, Beggar's Bush. Der. pad, v., to tramp along.

PADDILE (1), to finger; to dabble in water. (E.)

name and fletcher, Beggar's Bush. Der. pad, v., to tramp along.

Paon, the physician of the gods, who cure ll. v. 401, 899; cf. Od. iv. 232; also Apo pius; a deliverer, saviour; (2) a choral stands for pattle, of which it is a weakened form, and is the frequentative of pat. Thus the sense is 'to pat often,' to keep pan, to praise, honour. Der. peon-y, q. v.

handling; see Pat, verb. So also prov. G. padden, paddeln, to walk with short steps, i.e. to patter about, go with pattering steps; see Patter.

2. The sense 'to dabble in water' is in Palsgrave, who has: 'I paddyl in the myre;' and is perhaps due to O. F. patouiller, 'to slabber, to paddle or dable in with the feet, to stirre up and down and trouble;' Cot. This appears to be a derivative from F. patte, the foot; and patte appears to be a word of onomatopoetic origin, connected with G. patschen, to tap, pat, splash, dabble, walk awkwardly, which is also allied to E. pat.

3. Or again, it is shewn (s. v. Pat) that pat may stand for plat, so that paddle may be for pladdle, a form which may be compared with Low G. pladdern, to paddle, in the Bremen Wörterbuch. Either way, the ultimate origin is much the same. Der. paddle, sb., in the sense of broadbladed oar, but there is probably some confusion with the word below; paddl-er, Beaum. and Fletcher, Wit at Several Weapons, i. 1. 20; paddle-wheel. Doublet, patter.

PADDLE (2), a little spade, esp. one to clean a plough with. (E.) In Deut. xxiii. 13 (A. V.) It has lost an initial s, and stands for spaddle, the dimin. of spade. 'Others destroy moles with a spaddle,' Mortimer's Husbandry (R.); and see spud and spittle-staff in Halli-well. Cf. also Irish and Gael. spadal, a plough-staff, paddle; words prob. borrowed from the O. English. prob. borrowed from the O. English. bladed oar, see Paddle (1).

PADDOCK (1), a toad. (Scand.) In Hamlet, iii. 4. 190; Macb. i. 1. 9. M. E. paddok. King Alisaunder, 6126. Dimin. with suffix -0k or -ock (as in hill-ock, bull-ock), from M. E. padde, a toad, frog; in Wyclif, Exod. viii. 9 (later version), one MS. has the pl. paddis for paddokis, which is the common reading.—lcel. padda, a toad. + Swed. padda, a toad, frog. + Dan. padde. + Du. padde, pad. β . As in many E, words beginning with p, an initial s has probably The form padd-a denotes an agent; cf. A.S. hunt-a, been lost. The form padd-a denotes an agent; cf. A.S. hunt-a, a hunter. The prob. sense is 'jerker,' i.e. the animal which moves by jerks; from Aryan & SPAD, to vibrate, jerk, &c.; cf. Gk. σφοδρόε, vehement, active, σφενδόνη, a sling, Skt. spand, to vibrate, throb. In accordance with this supposition, we actually find Skt. sparça-spanda, a frog. ¶ The supposed A.S. pada (in Bosworth) is due to a mistake; the true E. words are toad and frog. Der. paddock-stool, a toad-stool.

PADDOCK (2), a small enclosure. (E.) ' Delectable countryseats and villas environed with parks, paddocks, plantations, &c.; Evelyn (Todd; no reference). Here park and paddock are conjoined; and it is tolerably certain that paddock is a corruption of parrock, another form of park. 'Parrocke, a lytell parke,' Palsgrave; cited in Way's note to Prompt. Parv. p. 384. He adds that 'a fenced enclosure of nine acres at Hawsted (Suffolk), in which deer were kept in pens for the course, was termed the Parrock; 'Cullum's Hawsted, p. 210. See also parrock in Jamieson, and parrick in Halliwell. [The unusual change from r to d may have been due to some confusion with paddock, a toad, once a familiar word; cf. poddish for porridge.]—A. S. pearrue, pearroe, a small enclosure. On visum lytlum pearroee' = in this little enclosure; Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, c. xviii. § 2, b. ii. prosa 7. Formed, with dimin. suffix -oc (=mod. E. -ock, as in padd-ock (1), hill-ock, bull-ock), from sparran, to shut, enclose; so that an initial s has been lost. We find 'gesparrado dure'=thy door being shut, Matt. vi. 6 (Lindisfarne MS.) β. This loss of s is certified by the occurrence of M.E. parren (for sparren), to enclose, confine, bar in; Havelok, 2439; Ywain and Gawain, 3227, ed. Ritson; and see the curious quotation in Halliwell, s. v. parred, where the words parred and speride (sparred) are used convertibly. Cf. G. sperren, to shut. v. The verb sparran is, literally, to fasten with a spar or bar, and is formed from the sb. spar; see Spar (1). Doublet, park, q.v.

A padlock is a loose hanging lock with a staple, suitable for hampers, baskets, &c., when the case to which it is affixed is not made of a solid substance. It occurs in Pope's Dunciad, iv. 162. Todd quotes from Milton's Colasterion (1645): 'Let not such an unmerciful and more than legal yoke be padlocked upon the neck of any Christian.' Of uncertain origin; but perhaps formed by adding lock to prov. E. pad, a pannier (Halliwell), given as a Norfolk word. This word is more commonly written ped, M. E. pedde. Pedde, idem quod panere; Prompt. Parv. Of unknown origin; see further under Pedlar.

PÆAN, a hymn in honour of Apollo. (L., – Gk.) 'I have ever hung Elaborate pæans on thy golden shrine;' Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, A. v. sc. 2; near the end. - Lat. paan, (1) a name of Apollo, (2) a religious hymn, esp. to Apollo. – Gk. Παιάν, Παιών, (1) Pæan, Pæon, the physician of the gods, who cures Hades and Ares, Homer, Il. v. 401, 899; cf. Od. iv. 232; also Apollo; also his son Æscula-pius; a deliverer, saviour; (2) a choral song, hymn, chant, song of β. Perhaps 'praise' may be the old sense; cf. Skt.

PÆDOBAPTISM; the same as Pedobaptism, q. v. PAGAN, a countryman, hence, a heathen. (L.) In Shak. Rich. II, iv. 95. [The M. E. form is paien or payen. Chaucer, C. T. 4954, 4962, from O. F. païen (Burguy); which from Lat. paganus.] = Lat. paganus, (1) a villager, countryman, (2) a pagan, because the rustic people were supposed to be unconverted at a time when townsmen were converts. The same idea appears in E. heathen, q. v. — Lat. paganus, adj., rustic, belonging to a village. — Lat. pāgus, a district, canton.

$\beta$. The etymology is supposed to be from Lat. pangere (pt. t. pāgi), to fasten, fix, set, as being marked out by fixed limits; see Pact.

Der. pagan-ish, pagan-ism, pagan-ise;

3. Orig. 'a leaf;' and so called because the leaves were once made of strips of papyrus fastened together. - Lat. pangere (base pag-), to fasten; see Pact. We also find M. E. pagent (with added t), Romance of Partenay, prol. 79. The three forms page, pagine, pagent, from Lat. pagina, answer to the three forms marge, margin, margent, from Lat. mar-ginem. Der, pagin-at-ion, a modern coined word.

PAGEANT, an exhibition, spectacle, show. (Low Lat., - L.)

A. The history of this curious word is completely known, by which means the etymology has been solved. It orig. meant 'a moveable scaffold,' such as was used in the representation of the old mysteries. A picture of such a scaffold will be found in Chambers, Book of Days, i. 634. The Chester plays 'were always acted in the open air, and consisted of 24 parts, each part or pageant being taken by one of the guilds of the city. . Twenty-four large scaffolds or stages were made, &c.; Chambers, as above; see the whole passage. Phillips, ed. 1706, well defines pageant as 'a triumphal chariot or arch, or other pompous device usually carried about in publick B. M. E. pagent. The entry 'pagent, pagina,' occurs in Prompt. Parv. p. 377; where there is nothing to shew whether a pageant is meant or a page of a book, the words being ultimately the same; see Page (2). But Way's excellent note on this entry is full of information, and should be consulted. He says: 'the primary signification of pageant appears to have been a stage or scaffold, which was called pagina, it may be supposed, from its construction, being a machine compaginata, framed and compacted together. The curious extracts from the Coventry records given by Mr. Sharp, in his Dissertation on the Pageants or Mysteries performed there, afford definite information on this subject. The term is variously written, and occasionally pagyn, pagen, approaching closely the Lat. pagina. The various plays or pageants composing the Chester mysteries. are entitled Pagina prima, Pagina secunda, and so forth; see Chester Plays, ed. Wright. A curious contemporary account has been preserved of the construction of the pageants [scaffolds] at Chester during the xvith century, "which pagiants were a high scafold with 2 rownes, a higher and a lower, upon 4 wheeles;" Sharp, Cov. Myst. p. 17. The term denoting the stage whereon the play was exhibited subsequently denoted also the play itself; but the primary sense . . is observed by several writers, as by Higins, in his version of Junius's Nomenclator, 1585: "Pegma, lignea machina in altum educta, tabulatis etiam in sublime crescentibus compaginata, de loco in locum portatilis, aut quæ vehi potest, ut in pompis fieri solet: Eschaffaut, a pageant, or scaffold." Palsgrave has: 'Pagiant in a playe, mystère;' and Cotgrave explains O. F. pegmate as 'a stage or frame whereon pageants be set or carried.' See further illustrations in Wedgwood. C. Thus we know that, just as M. E. pagent is used as a variant of pagine, in the sense of page of a book, so the M. E. pagent (or pagiant, &c.)

Ppagen or pagin, which is nothing but an Anglicised form of Low Lat. pagina in the sense of scaffold or stage. For examples of excrescent t, cf. ancient, margent, tyrant, pheasant. D. Though this sense of pagina is not given by Ducange, it was certainly in use, as shewn above, and a very clear instance is cited by Wedgwood from Munimenta Gild-hallise Londoniensis, ed. Riley, iii. 459, where we find: 'parabatur machina satis pulcra . . . in eadem pagina erigebantur duo animalia vocata antelops; 'shewing that machina and pagina were synonymous.

El. The true sense of pagina I take to have been simply 'stage' or 'platform;' since we find one sense of Lat. pagina to be a slab of marble or plank of wood (White). Cf. Lat. paginatus, planked, built, constructed (White); which is rather a derivative from pagina than the original of it, as seems to have been Way's F. Hence the derivation is (not from paginatus, but) supposition. from Lat. pangere (base pag-), to fasten, fix; see Pact. nally, we may note that another word for the old stage was pegma (stem pegmat-, whence O. F. pegmate in Cotgrave); this is the corresponding and cognate Greek name, from Gk. πηγμα (stem πηγματ-), a platform, stage, derived from the base of Gk. πήγνυμι, I fix, cognate with Lat. pangere. Indeed it is very probable that Low Lat. pagina, a stage, is a translation of Gk, πημα, but it is not merely borrowed from it, being an independent formation from the same base and root. Der. pageant, verb, to play, Shak. Troil. i. 3. 151; pageant-r-y, Pericles, v. 2. 6.

PAGODA, an Indian idol's temple. (Port., = Pers.) Spelt pagotha in Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1665, pp. 69, 393; pagod in Skinner, ed. 1671. = Port. pagoda, now generally pagode; but both forms are given in the Eng.-Port.part of Vieyra's Dict. Corrupted from Pers. but-kadah, an idol-temple; Rich. Dict. p. 241, col. 2; spelt but-kedah in Palmer, Pers. Dict. col. 70. - Pers. but, an idol, image, God, id. p. 241, col. 1; and kadah, a habitation, id. p. 1175. β. The singular perversion of the sounds may fairly be explained by supposing that the Portuguese connected it mentally with pagão, pagan (= Lat. paganus); for which see Vieyra, in the Eng.-Port. division. It may be added that the initial Persian letter is sometimes rendered by a coin Dwis Supplement to Little

M. E. paile, payle. 'Payle, or mylk-stoppe [milk-stoup]; 'Prompt.

Parv. — O. F. paele, so spelt in the 13th century (Littré, Burguy).

Both aenum and patella are glossed by O. F. paele; Wright's Vocab.

i. 97, l. 2. Later paelle, 'a footlesse posnet [little pot] or skellet, having brimmes like a bason; a little pan;' Cot. Cf. mod. F. poèle, a frving-pan. — Lat. patella. a small pan or dish, a vessel used in a frying-pan. - Lat. patella, a small pan or dish, a vessel used in cooking; dimin. of patera, a flat dish, saucer, which answers to Gk. πατάνη, a flat dish. See Paten. β. There is a difficulty here in the fact that the sense does not quite correspond. We may perhaps explain this by supposing that the O. F. pale as used in England took up the meaning of the older corresponding word of Celtic origin, viz. Irish padhal, a pail, ewer, Gael. padhal, an ewer. These words, like W. padell, a pan, are either cognate with or borrowed from the Lat. patella.

¶ We may note that prov. E. peel, a fireshovel, is not the same word, though Cotgrave seems so to regard it; it is from O. F. pelle, Lat. pala, a shovel; see Peel (3). pail-ful. I now think that pail has no connection with bale (3), PAIN, bodily suffering, anguish. (F., -L.) M. E. peine, peyne, King Alisaunder, 4522. - F. peine, 'a paine, penalty;' Cot. - Lat. pæna, punishment, penalty, pain. + Gk. ποινή, penalty. β. Some suppose the Lat. word was borrowed from the Gk. The root is not surely known; see Curtius, i. 349; Fick, i. 147. Der. pain, verb, M. E. peinen, Chaucer, C. T. 1748; pain-ed; pain-ful (with E. suffix -ful = full), formerly used with the sense of 'industrious,' see exx. in Trench, Select Glossary; pain-ful-ly, pain-ful-ness, pain-less, pain-lessness; also pains-taking, adj., i. e. taking pains or trouble, Beaum. and Fletcher, Span. Curate, iv. 5 (Diego); pains-taking, sb. And

PAINT, to colour, describe, depict. (F.,-L.) M. E. peinten, Chaucer, C. T. 11946, 11949, 11951; but the word must have been in use in very early times, as we find the derived words peintunge, painting, and peinture, a picture, in the Ancren Riwle, p. 302, l. 16, p. 242, l. 14. - O. F. peint, paint (mod. F. peint), pp. of peindre, paindre (mod. F. peindre), to paint. - Lat. pingere, to paint. Allied to Skt. pińj, to dye, colour; pińjara, yellow, tawny. β. The form of the root is PIG, to colour; perhaps allied to \(\sqrt{PIK}, to adorn, form, whence Skt. pig, to adorn, form, pegas, an ornament, and Gk. ποικίλοε, variegated. See Fick, i. 145. Der. paint, sb. (a late word), Dryden, to Sir Robert Howard, l. 8; paint-er, Romeo, i. 2. 41; paint-ing, in early use, M. E. peintunge, as above. And see pict-ure, de-pict, pig-ment, pi-mento, or-pi-ment, or-pine.

was formed, by the addition of an excrescent t after n, from an older & Painter, a rope employed to fasten a boat; Hawkesworth's Voy-sges, 1773, vol. i. p. xxix. Corrupted (by assimilation to the ordinary sb. painter) from M. E. panter, a noose, esp. for catching birds; See Palace. Der. palatimate, from F. palatinat, 'a palatinaty, the see Chaucer, Legend of Good Women, 131; Prompt. Parv. p. 381; spelt paunter, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 344.—O. F. pantiere, a kind of proper for birds. Postprict to the palace or court.

BATANARIA. of snare for birds, Roquefort; panthiere, 'a great swoop-net;' Cot. Cf. Ital. pantiera, 'a kinde of tramell or fowling net,' Florio; panthera, 'a net or haie to catch conies with, also a kind of fowling-net; id. - Lat. panther, a hunting-net for catching wild beasts; cf. panthera, an entire capture. — Gk. πάνθηροι, catching all; cf. πανθήρα, the whole booty (a very late word). — Gk. πῶν, neut. of πῶι, every; and $\theta_{\eta\rho}$, a wild beast; see Pan- and Deer. The Irish painteir, Gael. painntear, a gin, snare, are forms of the same word; but may have been borrowed from French, as the M. E. word occurs as early as the reign of Edw. II. It is remarkable that, in America, a panther is also called a painter; see Cooper, The Pioneers, cap. xxviii PAIR, two equal or like things, a couple. (F., -L.) M. E. peire, peyre, applied to any number of like or equal things, and not limited, as now, to two only. Thus 'a peire of bedes' = a set of beads, Chaucer, C. T. 159. 'A pair of cards' = a pack of cards; Ben Jonson, Masque of Christmas (Carol). 'A pair of organs' = a set of organ-pipes, i.e. an organ; see my note to P. Plowman, C. xxi. 7.

'A pair of stairs' = a flight of stairs. Yet we also find 'a peyre hose' = a pair of hose; Rob. of Glouc. p. 390, l. 4. - F. paire, 'a paire, or couple of; Cot. = F. pair, 'like, alike, equall, matching, even, meet;' Cot. = Lat. parem, acc. of par, alike. See Par, Peer.

Der. pair, verb, Wint. Ta. iv. 4. 154. Also um-pire, q. v. PALACE, a royal house. (F., -L.) M. E. palais, King Hom, ed. Lumby, 1256; paleis, Floriz and Blanchessur, 87. – F. palais, 'a palace;' Cot. – Lat. palatium, formerly a building on the Palatine. hill at Rome. 'On this hill, the Collis Palatinus, stood... the houses of Cicero and Catiline. Augustus built his mansion on the same hill, and his example was followed by Tiberius and Nero. Under Nero, all private houses had to be pulled down on the Collis Palatinus, in order to make room for the emperor's residence . . called the Palatium; and it became the type of all the palaces of the kings and emperors of Europe; Max Müller, Lectures on Language, ii. 276.

B. The Collis Palatinus is supposed to have been so called from Pales, a pastoral deity; see Max Müller, as above. Pales was a goddess who protected flocks; and the name means 'protector; cf. Skt. pála, one who guards or protects. - PA, to protect, feed; whence Skt. pá, to protect, cherish; Lat. pater, E. father, &c. Der. palati-al (Todd), formed with suffix -al from See Father. Lat. palati-um; also palat-ine, q. v.; palat-in, q. v. PALADIN, a warrior, a knight of Charlemagne's household.

PALANQUIN, PALANKEEN, a light litter in which travellers are carried on men's shoulders. (Hind., -Skt.) 'A pallamheen or litter; 'Sir T. Herbert, Travels, 1665, p. 72. Spelt palankee in Terry's Voyage to East India, 1655, p. 155 (Todd); palanquin in Skinner, ed. 1671. The spelling palanquin is French; in Portuguese Skinner, ed. 1671. The spelling palanquin is French; in Portuguese it is palanquim.—Hind. palang, a bed, bedstead; Forbes, Hindustani Dict., 1857, p. 202. Cf. Pers. palank, palang, a bedstead; Rich. Dict. p. 335. (Littré cites Siamese banlangko, Pali pallangka; Col. Yule, as cited in Wedgwood, gives the Pali form as palanki, a litter or couch carried on poles. Mahn cites Javanese pilangki, older form palangkan; as well as Hindi palki, which is evidently a contracted form.)

7. All from Skt. paryanka, (Prakrit pallanka), a couch-bed, a bed; the change from r to l being very common.—

Skt. pari about round (Gk. neol); and anka, a hook, the flank, &c. Skt. pari, about, round (Gk. περί); and anka, a hook, the flank, &c. Apparently from being wrapped round one. The Skt. anka is allied to Lat. uncus, a hook, A.S. angel, a hook. See Peri- and Anglo (2). PALATE, the roof of the mouth, taste, relish. (F., -L.) Cor. ii. 1. 61. M. E. palet (a better form would have been palat), Wyclif, Lament. iv. 4: Prompt. Parv. p. 378.—O. F. palat, a form found in the 14th century; see Littré.—Lat. palatum, the palate. ¶ The mod. F. palais answers to a Low Lat. Root uncertain. palatium, which seems to have been used by mistake for palatum. See remarks in Max Müller, Lect. on Lang. ii. 276. Der. palat-al, PALATINE, orig. pertaining to a palace. (F., -L.) Chiefly in the phr. 'count palatine,' where the adj. follows the sb., as in French; see Merch. Ven. i. 2. 49. -F. palatin, 'a generall and common appellation, or title, for such as have any special office. or function in a soveraign princes palace; 'Cot. He adds: 'Compte palatin, a count palatine, is not the title of a particular office, but an hereditary addition of dignity and honour, gotten by service done in a domesticall charge.'-Lat. palatinus, (1) the name of a hill in by Dryden; see Todd (who gives no reference).-F. palette, 'a.

PALE (1), a stake, narrow piece of wood for enclosing ground, an enclosure, limit, district. (F., -L.) M. E. paal, Wyclif, Ezek. xv. 3 (earlier version); the later version has stake; Vulgate, paxillus. xv. 3 (earlier version), the latest version has a pale, stake, or pole; Dat. pale, Wyclif, Luke, xix. 43.—F. pal, 'a pale, stake, or pole; Cot.—Lat. pālus, a stake. The long a is due to loss of g; the base is bag. as seen in pangere, to fasten; see Pact. A. S. pal or pal is uncertain; we find 'Palus, pal,' in Wright's Voc. A. S. pat or pat is uncertain; we find Patus, pai; in Wright's Voc. i. 84; it answers rather to pole, q. v. The G. pfahl is merely borrowed from Latin. PALÆOGRAPHY, the study of ancient modes of writing.

(Gk.) Modern; coined from Gk. παλαίο-, crude form of παλαίοε, old; and γράφ-ειν, to write. Παλαίοε is from πάλαι, adv., long ago. PALÆOLOGY, archæology. (Gk.) Modern. From Gk. παλαίο-, crude form of παλαίοε, old; and -λογία, from λόγοε, a discourse, which from Aéyew, to speak. See Palmography and Logic. 1)er. palæolog-ist.
PALÆONTOLOGY, the science of fossils, &c. (Gk.) Modern.

Palmography, Sooth, and Logic. Der. palæontolog-ist.
PALESTRA, a wrestling-school. (L., - Gk.) Modern; yet the adj. palestr-al actually occurs in Chaucer, Troilus, v. 304.-Lat. palæstra. - Gk. παλαίστρα, a wrestling school. - Gk. παλαίειν, to wrestle. - Gk. πάλλη, wrestling. Connected with Gk. πάλλειν, to quiver, brandish, swing. &c.; and with σπαίρειν, to quiver. -✓ SPAR, to struggle; preserved in E. spar, to box; see Spar (3). Der palestr-al, as above.

PALETOT, a loose garment. (F., - Du.)

Modern. Borrowed from mod. F. paletot, formerly palletoc, for which see below. However, the word is by no means new to English; the M. E. paltok is not an uncommon word; see numerous references in my note to P. Plowman, B. xviii. 25, where the word occurs; and see Prompt. Parv., and Way's note. This form was borrowed from O. F. palletoc, a long and thick pelt, or cassock, a garment like a short cloak with sleeves, or such a one as the most of our modern pages are attired in; Cot. Borrowed, as Littre points out, from O. Dutch, but rather from the form paltroc (with loss of r) than from the fuller form paltsrock. -O. Du. paltroe, for which Oudemans gives a quotation. The same word as O. Du. palsrock, which Oudemans explains by a holidaydress, and cites the expression 'fluweelen palsrock,' i. e. velvet dress, as in use A.D. 1521. Hexham gives: 'een palts-rock, a coate or a β. Littré (if I understand him rightly) takes it to mean a pilgrim's coat, and connects pals- with O. Du. pals-stock, contracted form of palster-stock, a pilgrim's staff (Hexham). This is certainly wrong; a very slight examination will shew that the coat was worn by soldiers, knights, and kings, and was made of silk or velvet. Way says that 'Sir Roger de Norwico bequeaths, in 1370, unum paltoke de ueluete, cum armis meis;' &c. Hexham evidently connects paltsrock with palts, 'a pretour,' i. e. a prætor. It is clear that the first syllable is O. Du. pals, later written palts with intrusive t answering to G. pfalz; and this pals occurs in pals-grave, 'a count palatine (Hexham), G. pfalzgraf, E. palsgrave or palgrave. Y. The G. pfalz is a contraction of M. H. G. phalinze or phalanze, O. H. G. phalanza, palinza, a palace; a word due to Lat. palatium, a palace. Hence O. Du. pals = E. palace; and the sense is 'palace-coat,' i. e. court-dress.

5. The O. Du. roc = G. rock, O. H. G. hrock, a coat, from which some derive E. frock. See Palace and Frock. Not connected with toque, a cap; for the paltok was not hooded; though the borrowed Breton word paltok was used of a hooded lingell, tenon, slice, or flat tool wherewith chirurgians lay salve on #palled in place of olde appalled; Six-text, B. 1292. It is clear that plaisters; also, the saucer or porringer, whereinto they receive blood out of an opened vein; also, a battledoor; Cot. Thus it orig. plaisters; also, the saucer of portinger, whereinto they receive blood out of an opened vein; also, a battledoor; Cot. Thus it origineant a flat blade for spreading things, then a flat open saucer, then a slab for colours.—Ital. paletta, 'a lingell, slice [such] as apothecaries vse; Florio. Dimin. of pala, 'a spade; 'id.—Lat. pāla, a spade, shovel, flat-bladed 'peel' for putting bread into an oven; see Peel (3). The base $p\bar{a} = pag$, seen in pangere, to fasten, also to set, plant; whence $p\bar{a}la$ —the instrument used for planting. See Paot. Doublet, pallet (2).

PALETTE, a small slab on which a painter mixes colours. (F.,-Ital.,-L.) 'Pallet, a thin oval piece of wood, used by painters to hold their colours;' Kersey, ed. 1715. The word is used

In early use. M.E. palefrai, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, i. 5, 1. 20; later palfrei, Chaucer, C. T. 2497. -O. F. palefrei (13th century, Littré), palefroy, 'a palfrey,' Cot.; mod. F. palefroi. Spelt palefreid in the 11th century; Littré. -Low Lat. paraveredus, a post-horse, lit. 'an extra post-horse' (White). Brachet gives quotation for the later forms accommodus transferdus and radafredus (10th cenfor the later forms paravredus, parafredus, and palafredus (10th century); and O. F. palefreid = Low Lat. acc. palafredum; every step being traced with certainty. β. The Low Lat. paraveredus is a hybrid formation from Gk. παρά, beside (hence extra); and late Lat. weredus, a post-horse, courier's horse (White). γ. White gives the etymology of ueredus from Lat. uehere, to carry, draw; and rheda, a four-wheeled carriage; if so, it means 'the drawer of a four-wheeled carriage.' δ. For παρά, see Para-; for uehere, see Vehicle. Rheda is said to be a Gaulish word; cf. W. rhedu, to The Low Lat. paraueredus is run, to race, rhe, fleet, swift. also the original of G. pferd, Du. paard, a palfrey, horse.

PALIMPSEST, a manuscript which has been twice written on, the first writing being partly erased. (Gk.) Modern in E., though found in Greek. – Gk. παλίμψηστον, a palimpsest (manuscript); neut. of παλίμψηστος, lit. scraped again. – Gk. πάλιμ-, for πάλιν, again, before the following ψ ; and $\psi_{\eta\sigma\tau\delta s}$, rubbed, scraped, verbal adj. from $\psi_{\delta\epsilon\nu}$, to rub, lonic $\psi_{\epsilon\epsilon\nu}$.

PALINDROME, a word or sentence that reads the same backwards as forwards. (Gk.) Examples are Hannah, madam, Eve; Todd quotes subi dura a rudibus from Peacham, Experience in these Times (1638). 'Curious palindromes;' Ben Jonson, An Execration upon Vulcan, Underwoods, lxi. 1. 34. – Gk. παλίνδρομος, running back again. - Gk. παλίν, back, again; and δρόμος, a running, from δραμείν, to run; see Dromedary.

PALINODE, a recantation, in song. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) 'You, two and two, singing a palinode;' Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, last speech of Crites. -F. palinodie, 'a palinody, recantation, contrary song, unsaying of what hath been said; 'Cot.-Lat. palinodia. -Gk. παλινφδία, a recantation, strictly of an ode. - Gk. πάλιν, back, again; and obh, a song; see Ode.

PALISADE, a fence made of pales or stakes. (F., -L.) Shak. has the pl. palisadoes, I Hen. IV, ii. 3. 55; this is (I suppose) a Span. form, though the mod. Span. word is palizada. Dryden has palisades, tr. of Virgil, b. vii. l. 214.—F. palisade, 'a palisade;' Cot.—F. palisser, 'to inclose with pales,' id.; with suffix -ade = Lat. -ata.—F. palis, a 'pale, stake, pole,' id.; extended from pal, a pale. See further under Pale (1). Der. palisade, verb.

PALL (1), a cloak, mantle, archbishop's scarf, shroud. (L.) M. E. pal, Layamon, 897, 1296; pl. pælles, id. 2368. - A. S. pæll, purple cloth; we find pællas and sidan = purple cloths and silks, as a gloss to Lat. purpuram et sericum in Ælfric's Colloquy (the Merchant); see Thorpe, Analecta, p. 27.—Lat. palla, a mantle, loose dress, under garment, curtain; cf. pallium, a coverlet, pall, curtain, toga. β. Origin uncertain; perhaps for panula, panula, dimin. form from panus, pannus, cloth. We can hardly connect it with pellis, skin. Der. pall-i-ate, q. v.

PALL (2), to become vapid, lose taste or spirit. (C.) M. E. pallen. 'Pallyn, as ale and drynke, Emorior;' Prompt. Parv. Way, in the note on the passage, quotes from Lydgate's Order of Fools: 'Who forsakith wyne, and drynkithe ale pallid. Such foltisshe foolis, the pallid of the pallid of the pallid of the pallid. God lete hem never the [prosper]; Harl. MS. 2251, fol. 303. He also cites from Palsgrave: 'I palle, as drinke or bloode dothe, by longe standyng in a thynge, ie appallys. This drink wyll pall (s'appallyra) if it stande vncouered all nyght. I palle, I fade of freshenesse in colour or beautye, ie flaitris.' B. The word presents great difficulty; I incline to the belief that Palsgrave has here made an error in using the O. F. verb appallir as the equivalent of E. pall. This verb, like mod. F. pâlir, seems to be only used with respect to loss of colour or light. See apalir, palie, in Roquefort, paslir, pallir in Cotgrave, and palir in Littré. Palsgrave may have been thinking of M.E. appallen, which was a strange hybrid word, made by prefixing the F. a- (=Lat. ad) to the word pall which we are now discussing. This confusion appears in Chaucer, C. T. 13033, where we find: 'But it were for an olde appalled wight' = except it were for an old enfeebled creature; where 3 MSS, have the reading olde many feete; see Halliwell. It makes no ultimate difference.

the sense here implies loss of energy or vital power, and involves E. pall, not F. pâlir. Gower speaks of a drink 'bitter as the galle, Which maketh a mannes herte palle,' i. e. lose energy; C. A. iii. 13. Careful consideration of the use of the word shows that it is of Celtic origin, but has been confused with F. pâlir and E. pale.—W. pallu, to fail, to cease, to neglect; cf. pall, loss of energy, miss, failure; pallder, fallibility, palliant, failure, neglect. Allied to Corn. paich, weak, sickly, amending poorly. Y. As no W. word begins with sp, we may readily admit a loss of initial s, and connect pall with Irish spaillead. a check abuse and initial s, and connect pall palch, weak, sickly, amending poorly. with Irish spaillead, a check, abuse, spailleadh, a fall, Gk. σφάλλειν, to make to totter, σφάλλεσθαι, to stumble, stagger, fall, fail. The s is also lost in Lat. fallere (whence E. fail), and in E. fall. 8. In s is also lost in Lat. Jatiere (whence E. Jail), and in E. Jail.

fact pall is a mere doublet of fail or fall; all being from SPAL, to fall, totter; cf. Skt. sphal, sphul, to tremble, sphulaya, to crush (lit. to fell). The Skt. phalgu, pithless, sapless, weak, is a related word, from the same root. Der. ap-pal, q. v.

PALLET (1), a kind of mattress or couch, properly one of straw. (F., -L.) M. E. paillet, Chaucer, Troil. iii. 229. - F. paillet, a heap of straw, given by Littre as a provincial word. Cotgrave only gives pailler, 'a reek or stack of straw, also, bed-straw.' Dimin. of F. paille, 'straw;' Cot. - Lat. palea, straw, chaff; lit. anything shaken or scattered about. Allied to Gk. πάλη, fine meal, dust, Skt. palála, PALLET (2), an instrument used by potters, also by gilders; also, a palette. (F., -Ital., -L.) See definitions in Webster; it is, properly, a flat-bladed instrument for spreading plasters, gilding, &c., and for moulding; and is only another spelling of Palette, q, v. PALLIASSE, a straw mattress. (F.,-L.) Not in Todd's Johnson. The introduction of i is due to an attempt to represent the 'll mouillés' of the F. paillasse, which see in Littré. The form in Cotgrave is paillace, 'a straw-bed.' The suffix -ace, -asse (= Lat. -aceus) is a diminutive one; Brachet, Etym. Dict. Introd. § 272; and paill-ace is from paille, straw. See Pallet (1).

PALM, the inner part of the hand; the name of a tree. (1. F.,= L.; 2. L.) 1. The sense of 'flat hand' is the more original, the tree being named from its flat spreading leaves, which bear some resemblance to the hand spread out. Yet it is remarkable that the word was first known in England in the sense of palm-tree. To take the orig. sense first, we find M. E. paume, the palm of the hand, P. Plowman, B. xvii. 141, 147, 150, 153.—F. paume, 'the palme of the hand;' Cot.—Lat. palma, the palm of the hand. + Gk. παλάμη. + A. S. folm; Grein, i. 311. Root uncertain; see Fick, i. 571. Allied to A. S. folm is E. fumble; see Fumble. 2. We find A. S. palm, a palm-tree; borrowed directly from Latin. 'Palma, palm-twig, vel palm; Wright's Vocab. i. 32, col. 2. ¶ We may note that the Lat. spelling has prevailed over the French, as in psalm, &c. Der. (from the former sense) palm-ate, from Lat. palmatus; palm-ist-r-y, used by Sir T. Browne in his Vulg. Errors, b. v. c. 24, pt. 1, and coined by adding the suffixes -ist- (of Gk. origin), and -r-y (= F. -er-ie, Lat. -ar-iu-); also (from the latter sense) palm-er, M. E. palmere, Chaucer, C. T. 13, King Horn, ed. Lumby, 1027, i. e. one who bears a palm-branch in token of having been to the Holy Land; palm-er-worm, Joel, i. 4, ii. 25, a caterpillar supposed to be so called from its wandering about like a pilgrim, and also simply called palmer (see Eastwood and Wright's Bible Wordbook); Palm-sunday, M. E. palme-suneday, O. Eng. Miscellany, ed. Morris, p. 39, l. 65; palm-y. Hamlet, i. 1. 113.

The palmer or palmer-worm may be named from prov. 8. An initial s has been lost, as shewn by the related Gk. ψηλαφάω, I feel, from the base SPAL: see Curting ii from the base SPAL; see Curtius, ii. 403. Moreover, the orig, sense of palpare was 'to quiver,' as shewn by the derivatives palp-ebra, that of palpare was 'to quiver,' as snown by the derivatives palp-ebra, that which quivers, the eye-lid, and palpitare, to quiver often, to throb. By comparing Skt. sphal, sphar, to quiver, tremble, palpitate, we derive all from ASPAR, to quiver. Fick, i. 831. Der. palpabl-y, palpable-ness, palpability. And see palpitate.

PALTER, to dodge, shift, shuffle, equivocate. (Scand.?) See Macb. v. 8. 20; Jul. Cæs. ii. 1. 126. Cotgrave, s. v. harceler, has: 'to haggle bucke, hedge or paulter long in the buying of a com-

'to haggle, hucke, hedge, or paulter long in the buying of a commoditie.' It also means 'to babble,' as in: 'One whyle his tonge it ran and paltered of a cat, Another whyle he stammered styll upon a rat; Gammer Gurton, ii. 2. If we take the sense to be 'to haggle,' we may esp. refer it to the haggling over worthless trash, or 'paltrie,' as it is called in Lowland Scotch. This seems to be the most likely solution, as most of the dictionaries connect it with paltry, which is shewn below to be due to a Scand. word palter, signifying 'rags, refuse,' &c.; see Paltry. More literally, it meant 'to deal in rags.' This seems to be confirmed by comparing it with Dan. pialtebod. a rag-shop, old clothes' shop; pialtehandel, dealing in rags: pialtekræmmer, a rag-dealer, rag-man; &c. β . If this in rags; pialtekræmmer, a rag-dealer, rag-man; &c. be the right solution, the verb appears to have been coined in England from the old sb. palter, rags, which must have been in use here, though only the derived adj. paltr-y has been recorded. In other words, though we cannot well derive the verb to palter from the adj. paltry, nor vice versâ paltry from to palter, we may reser them both alike to a common source.

PALTRY, mean, vile, worthless. (Scand.) In Shak. Merry Wives, ii. 1. 164; Marlowe, Edw. II, ii. 6. 57. Jamieson gives paltrie, peltrie, vile trash; Halliwell has paltring, a worthless trifle; Forby explains Norfolk paltry by 'rubbish, refuse, trash;' and Brockett gives palterly as the North. Eng. form of the adj. paltry. The word, being used in the North and Norfolk, is, presumably, of Scand, origin; and such is the case. The word stands for palter-y (North. E. palter-ly), formed with the adj. suffix -y (or -ly) from an old pl. palt-er (formed like M. E. child-er = children, breth-er = brethren), which is still preserved in Swed. and Danish. This account is verified by the G. forms; see below. The sense of palter is 'rags,' and that of paltr-y is 'ragged,' hence, vile, worthless, or, as a sb., trash or refuse.—Swed. paltor, rags, pl. of palta, a rag; Ihre gives O. Swed. paltor, old rags, with a reference to Jerem. xxxviii. 11. + Dan. pialter, rags, pl. of pialt, a rag, tatter; hence the adj. pialtet, ragged, tattered. + Low G. palte, pulte, a rag, a piece of cloth torn or cut off; whence the adj. paltrig, pultrig, ragged, torn; Bremen Wörterb. iii. 287. + Prov. G. palter (pl. paltern), a rag; whence palterig, paltry (Flügel). Cf. also O. Du. palt, a piece, fragment, as, palt brods, a piece of bread (Oudemans, Kilian); Fries. palt, a rag (Outzen). B. The origin is by no means clear; Ihre connects Swed. paltor with O. Swed. palt, a kind of garment. See Rietz, s. v. palt. Perhaps allied to Lithuan. spalai (pl. of spalas), bits of broken flax, or trash in general. Der. paltri-ly, paltri-ness; and see palter. or, as a sb., trash or refuse. - Swed. paltor, rags, pl. of palta, a rag;

PAMPAS, plains in South America. (Peruvian.)

PAMPER, to feed luxuriously, glut. (O. Low G.) In Much Ado, iv. 1. 61. 'Pampired with ease;' Court of Love, l. 177 (late 15th century or early 16th; first printed 1561). 'Oure pamperde paunchys,' Skelton, ed. Dyce, i. 19, l. 25. But the word was known and Court of the contract Prima, I. 5; pr. in Appendix to Chaucer's tr. of Boethius, ed. Morris, p. 180. Wedgwood quotes the following from Reliquize Antiquæ, i. Thus the devil fareth with men and wommen; First, he stirith hem to pappe and pampe her fleisch, desyrynge delicous metis and drynkis. Not found in A. S., and prob. imported from the Netherlands. The form pamper is a frequentative from an older verb from δαίμων, a demon; see Pan- and Demon. to Chaucer. Low G. pampen, more commonly slampampen, to live luxuriously; Brem. Wörterb. iv. 800.—Low G. pampe, thick pap, pap made of meal; also called pampelbry, i. e. pap-broth; and, in some dialects, pappe; id. iii. 287. It is therefore a nasalised form of Pap, q. v. So also vulgar G. pampen, pampeln, to cram, pamper, from pampe, pap, thick broth; Bavarian pampfen, to stuff, sick anpampfen, voll-pampfen, to cram oneself with pap or broth (Schmeller, i. 394).

The etymology is quite clear; the suggested connection with O. F. pamprer, to cover with vine-leaves (Cot.) is purely imaginary. O. F. pamprer, to cover with vine-leaves (Cot.), is purely imaginary. The use of the prefix for- in Chaucer is almost enough in itself to stamp the word as being of Teutonic origin. Der. pamper-er.

PAMPHLET, a small book, of a few sheets stitched together. (F.?) Spelt pamflet, Testament of Love, pt. iii, near the end, ed. 1561, fol. 317 b, col. 1; pamphlet in Shak. 1 Hen. VI, iii. 1. 2. [The mod. F. pamphie is borrowed from English (Littré).] Of unknown origin, but presumably French, as it occurs in the Test. of Love. Three theories concerning it may be mentioned. 1. From O.F. panne, the palm of the hand, and fueillet, 'a leafe of a book' (Cot.); as though it were a leaf of paper held in the hand. Suggested by Pegge; see Todd's Johnson. 2. 'From Span. papelete [Neuman only gives papelete], a written slip of paper, a written newspaper; by the insertion of the nasal, as in Du. pampier, paper;' Wedgwood. But we did not borrow Span, words in the 14th century. 3. Rather, as I think, from Lat. Pamphila, a female historian of the or the knave of clubs (Littré), due to the Gk. name Pamphilus. PAN, a broad shallow vessel for domestic use. (L.) 'Pannes and pottes;' Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, b. i. c. 1. M. E. panne, Chaucer, C. T. 7196.—A. S. panne, a pan; 'sern panne'=an iron pan; fyr-panne=a fire-pan; Alfric's Vocab. Nomina Vasorum, in Wright's Voc. i. 25, col. 2. And see Alfred, tr. of Gregory's Pastoral, c. xxi, ed. Swect, p. 162, last line. Cf. Icel. panna, Swed. panna, Dan. pande (for panne), Du. pan, G. pfanne; also Low Lat. panna.

B. Certainly not a Teutonic word, but borrowed by the English from the Britons: of Irish panna, M. car (given in Spurrell) English from the Britons; cf. Irish panna, W. pan (given in Spurrell in the Eng.-W. division). As a Celtic word, it was rather borrowed from the Romans than an independent word; panna is an easy change from Lat. patina, a shallow bowl, pan, bason, just as Lat. penna stands for pet-na. See Paten; and compare Pen. Low Lat. panna was similarly formed; and the Lithuan. pana, a pan, was prob. borrowed from Latin. We may also note Irish padhal, a pail, W. padell, a pan, as corresponding to Lat. patella, the dimin. of patina; see Pail. Der. brain-pan, with which cf. M. E. panne in the transferred sense of skull, Chaucer, C. T. 1167; knee-pan; pancake, As You Like It, i. 2. 67, and in Palsgrave.

PANG, a violent pain, a throe. (C.) In the Court of Love, l. 1150, we find: 'The prange of love so straineth them to crie; altered, in modern editions, to 'The pange of love.' In Prompt. Parv. p. 403, we find: 'Throwe, womann's pronge, sekeness, Erumpna;' i.e. a throe, a woman's pang. It is clear that the word has lost an r; for the etymology, see Prong. B. In Skelton, Philip Sparowe, l. 44, the word occurs as a verb: 'What heuyness did me pange;' it is also a sb., id. l. 62. Cf. also: 'For there be in us certayne affectionate pangues of nature;' Udall, Luke, c. 4 (R.) Both sb. and vb. are common in Shakespeare. The loss of r is due, I think, to confusion with prov. F. poigne, a common term for 'a grip,' or the strength exerted by the wrist. 'La poigne de cet homme-là, c'est un étau' = that man's grip is like a vice. In the 15th century, we find: 'Car tourmenté sont de la poigne De tous les maux qu'en enfer sont '= for they are tormented with the grip of all the evils that are in hell; La Passion de Nostre Seigneur. See Littré, whence the Parv. p. 493, we find: 'Throwe, womannys pronge, sekeness, Erumpna; in hell; La Passion de Nostre Seigneur. See Littré, whence the whole of the above is cited. Cf. also O.F. empoigner, to seise, gripe, catch, lay hands on, lay hold of; Cot.

7. The prov. F. poigne catch, lay hands on, lay hold of; Cot. γ . The prov. F. poigne is closely related to O. F. poin, poing, mod. F. poing, the fist; from Lat. pugnum, acc. of pugnus, the fist; see Pugnacious. 8. It is extremely likely that the E. word has also been influenced by O. F. poign., the base of several parts of F. poindre, to prick; cf. O. F. poinct, a stitch in the side (Cot.); and sec Poignant.

The word cannot be derived from A.S. pongan (Lat. pungere), to prick; nor can it have any connection whatever with Du. pijnigen, to torture; words which have been needlessly adduced, and explain nothing.

PANIC, extreme fright. (Gk.) When we speak of a panic, it is an abbreviation of the phrase 'a panic fear,' given in Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674. Camden has 'a panicall feare;' Remaines, chap. on Poems (R.) - Gk. το Πανικόν, used with or without δείμα (= fear), Panic fear, i. e. fear supposed to be inspired by the god Pan. = Gk. unless this rests on historical proof, it is very improbable, and one Πανικόs, of or belonging to Pan. = Gk. Gk. δπ-λον is connected with έπω, I am busy about (whence έπομαι, I follow); and έπομαι corresponds to Lat. sequor, I follow. — « SAK, to follow. See Pan- and Sequence. Der. panopli-ed.

A. D. 1788 (Haydn). Coined to mean 'a view all round.' - Gk. πâν, neut. of παε, all; and δραμα, a view, from δράω, I see, which from WAR, to protect, observe. See Pan- and Wary. Der.

PANSY, heart's-ease, a species of violet. (F., -L.) In Hamlet, iv. 5. 176. - F. pensée, 'a thought; .. also, the flower paunsie; 'Cot. Thus, it is the flower of thought or remembrance; cf. forget-me-not. The F. pensée is the fem. of pensée, pp. of penser, to think, — Lat. pensare, to weigh, ponder, consider; frequentative form of pendère, to weigh (pp. pensus). See Pensive, Pension, Poise.

PANT, to breathe hard. (E.?) In Shak. Tw. Nt. iii. 4. 323. 'To pant and quake;' Spenser, F. Q. i. 7. 20. M. E. panten; Prompt.

Parv. p. 381. And see Skelton, Phyllyp Sparowe, l. 132. Of uncertain origin; it is obviously connected with F. panteler, to pant, O. F. pantiser, 'to breath very fast, to blow thick and short;' Cot. Also with O. F. pantois, 'short-winded, oft-breathing, out of breath;' pantois, sh., 'short wind, pursinesse, a frequent breathing, or a difficult fetching of wind by the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leading to the shortness of leadi fetching of wind by the shortness of breath; in hawks, we call it the pantais; 'Cot. In Sherwood's index to Cotgrave we find: 'The pantasse or pantois in hawkes, le pantais.' This use of the term in β. It is difficult to tell whether hawking appears to be the oldest. the F. word is from the E., or vice versa; but as the E. word occurs in the shorter form panten both in the Prompt. Parv. and, according to Stratmann, in the Towneley Mysteries (Surtees Soc.), p. 217, we may perhaps consider the word as E. It is obviously equivalent to Devonshire pank, to pant; see the Exmoor Scolding, l. 48 (E.D.S.); and cf. Low G. pinkepank, the bang-bang of hammers, pinkepanken, to hammer; Bremen Wörterbuch; words of imitative origin. And we may also note the curious Swed. dial. pank, exhausted, tired out, pankna, to be exhausted (Rietz); though there is no sure connecting link with this word.

7. Wedgwood suggests that it may be a nasalised form of the verb to pat, and cites from Skinner the remarkable Lincolnshire expression 'my heart went pintledy-pantledy,' where we now usually say pit-a-pat.

8. Diez derives the F. word from the W. pantu, which he supposes to mean 'to press;' this does not seem right, as such is hardly the meaning; I find W. pantu, 'to sink seem right, as such is narthly the meaning; I find w. panth, 'to sink in, to form a hollow, to indent, to dimple; pant, a depression, hollow; pantog, having a hollow or concavity;' Spurrell.

PANTALOON (1), a ridiculous character in a pantomime, buffoon. (F.,-Ital.,-Gk.) In Shak. As You Like It, ii. 7. 158; Tam. of Shrew, iii. 1. 37.-F. pantalon, (1) a name given to the Venetians, (2) a pantalon; see Littré.-Ital. pantalone, a pantaloon, buffoon. 'The pantalone is the pantaloon of Ital. comedy, a covetous and amorous old dotard who is made the butt of the piece;' Wedgraped The name, according to Littre was espanylied to Venetians. wood. The name, according to Littré, was esp. applied to Venetians; and Mahn (in Webster) says that St. Pantaleone was 'the patron saint of Venice, and hence a baptismal name very frequent among the Venetians, and applied to them by the other Italians as a nickname.' Lord Byron speaks of the Venetian name Pantaleone as being 'her very by-word;' Childe Harold, c. iv. st. 14.

8. St. Pantaleone's day is July 27; he was martyred A.D. 303; Chambers, Book of Days, ii. 127. The name is also written Pantaleon (as in Chambers), which is perhaps better. It is certainly Gk., and is given by Mahn as Πανταλέων, i. e. all-lion. 'a Greek personal name;' this is from παντα-, prefix, wholly, and λέων, a lion.

γ. Littré says it stands for Pantelemone, which he explains as παντ-ελεήμων = all-pitiful; supposed to be applied to Venice; see note 9 to c. iv of Childe Harold. Der. pantaloons.

PANTALOONS, a kind of trousers. (F., - Ital., - Gk.) as the French, we conquered once Now give us laws for pantaloons; Butler, Hudibras, pt. i. c. 3, l. 923; on which Bell's note says:
'The pantaloon belongs to the Restoration. It was loose in the upper part, and puffed, and covered the legs, the lower part terminating in stockings. In an inventory of the time of Charles II. pantaloons are mentioned, and a yard and a half of lutestring allowed for them.' See also Blount's Gloss. ed. 1674.—F. pantalon, a garment so called because worn by the Venetians, who were themselves called Pantaloons (Littré). See Pantaloon.
PANTHEISM, the doctrine that the universe is God. (Gk.)

In Waterland, Works, vol. viii. p. 81 (R.) Todd only gives paniheist. Coined from Pan- and Theism. And see Pantheon. Der. so also pan-theist, from pan- and theist; hence pantheist-ic, pantheist-ic-al.

PANTHEON, a temple dedicated to all the gods. (L., -Gk.) One temple of pantheon, that is to say, all goddes; Udall, on the Revelation, c. 16; and in Shak. Titus, i. 242.—Lat. panthēon.—Gk. πάνθειον, put for πανθείον lερόν, a temple consecrated to all gods.— Gk. πάνθειον, neut. of πάνθειος, common to all gods. - Gk. πᾶν, neut. of mas, all; and belos, divine, from belos, god. See Pan-, and Theism

PANTHER, a fierce carnivorous quadruped. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) M. E. pantere, King Alisaunder, 6820; panter, O. Eng. Miscellany, ed. Morris, p. 23. [Cf. A. S. pandher (sic); Grein, ii. 361.] = O. F. panthere, 'a panther;' Cot. – Lat. panthēra; also panther. – Gk. πάν- $\theta\eta\rho$, a panther. Origin unknown. ¶ A supposed derivation from $\pi \hat{a} \nu$, all, and $\theta \hat{\eta} \rho$, a beast, gave rise to numerous fables; see Philip de Thaun, Bestiaire, l. 224, in Wright's Pop. Treatises on

PANTOMIME, one who expresses his meaning by action; a dumb show. (F., -L., -Gk.) 'Pantomime, an actor of many parts in one play,'&c.; Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674. [Such is the proper sense of the word, though now used for the play itself.] - F. pantomime, 'an actor of many parts in one play,'&c.; Cot. - Lat. pantomimus. - Gk. παντόμιμος, all imitating, a pantomimic actor. - Gk. παντο, crude form of πas, all; and μιμος, an imitator, from μιμέσμαι, I imitate. See Pan- and Mimic. Der. pantomim-ic, pantomim-ist.

PANTRY, a room for provisions. (F., -L.) M. E. pantrye, pantrie; Prompt. Parv. -O. F. paneterie, 'a pantry;' Cot. -Low Lat. panetre; Frompt. Farv. 30. PAP (1), food for infants. (E.) 'An Englishe infant, which liuethe with pappe; 'Hall's Chron. Hen. VI, an. 3. The M. E. pappe is only found in the sense of 'breast;' we have, however, 'papmete for chylder,' Prompt. Parv. p. 382. To be considered as an E. word, and perhaps of great antiquity, though seldom written down. Of onomatopoetic origin, due to a repetition of the syllable pa, Words formed of the simplest articulations, ma and pa, are used to designate the objects in which the infant takes the earliest interest, the mother and father, the mother's breast, the act of taking or sucking food; 'Wedgwood. + Du. pap, 'pap sod with milke or flower;' Hexham. + G. pappe, pap, paste. + Lat. papa, pappa, the word with which infants call for food. Cf. Dan. pap, Swed. papp, pasteboard; also Span. papa, Ital. pappa, pap, from Lat. pappa. This is one of those words of expressive origin which are not affected by Grimm's law. See Pap (2), Papa.

PAP (2), a teat, breast. (Scand.) M. E. pappe, Havelok, 2132;

Ormulum, 6441.—O. Swed. papp, the breast; which, as Ihre notes, was afterwards changed to patt. Still preserved in Swed. patt, the breast. So also Dan. patte, suck, give patte, to give suck. The Swedish dialects retain the old form pappe, papp (Rietz). So also N. Friesic pap, pape, papke (Outzen); Lithuan. papas, the pap. β. Doubtless ultimately the same word as the preceding; and due to the infant's cry for food. Such words do not suffer mutation according to Grimm's law.

PAPA, a child's word for father. (F.,-L.) Seldom written down; the earliest quotation for it seems to be one from Swift, in Todd's Johnson (without a reference, but it occurs in his Directions for Servants, 1745, p. 13): 'where there are little masters and misses in a house, bribe them, that they may not tell tales to papa and mamma.' Whilst admitting that the word might easily have been coined from the repetition of the syllable pa by infants, and probably was so in the first instance, we have no proof that the word is truly of native origin; the native word from this source took rather the ordinary, and indeed ridiculous, viz. Ital. pianta-leone = the planter of form of pap; see Pap (1) and Pap (2). In the sense of father, we the lion, i.e. the planter of the standard bearing the lion of St. Mark, may rather look upon it as merely borrowed. = F. papa, papa; in Molière, Malade Imaginaire, i. 5 (Littré). = Lat. papa, form Gk. Roman cognomen. Cf. Lat. pappas, a tutor, borrowed from Gk. πάππα, papa. Nausicaa addresses her father as πάππα φίλε=dear papa; Homer, Od. vi. 57.

¶ It is probable that the 🇳 PA, to papa; Homer, Od. vi. 57. ¶ It is probable that the 4 PA, to nourish, whence Lat. pa-ter, and E. fa-ther, owes its origin to the same infantive sound. See Pope.

Same infantive sound. See Pope.

PAPAL, belonging to the pope. (F.,=L.,=Gk.) M.E. papal, papall, Gower, C.A. i. 257.=F. papal, 'papall;' Cot.=Low. Lat. papalis, belonging to the pope.=Lat. papa, a bishop, spiritual father. See Pope. Der. pap-ac-y, M. E. papacie, Gower, C. A. i. 256, from Low Lat. papatia, papal dignity, formed from papati-, crude form of papas, pappas, borrowed from Gk. πάππας, papa, father. Also pap-ist, All's Well, i. 3. 56, from F. pape, pope; the word pap-ism occurs in Bale's Apology p. 82 (R.). papaitie, applicational paperism occurs in

The last sense was the earliest in French (Littré). —Span. parada, a halt, stop, pause.—Span. parar, to stop, halt; a particular restriction of the sense 'to get ready' or 'prepare.'—Lat. parare, to prepare, get ready.

β. The sense of 'display' in F. was easily communicated to Span. parada, because F. parer (=Span. parad) meant 'to deck, trimme, adorn, dress,' as well as 'to ward or defend a blow' (which comes near the Spanish use); see Cottons See Parare grave. See Pare.

A glaring instance of bad spelling, as it certainly should be parallelepiped (with e, not o). Moreover, Webster marks the accent on the i, which is, translationally in the surface of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control etymologically, the weakest syllable in the word. - Lat. parallelepipedum, used by Boethius (White). - Gk. παραλληλεπίπεδον, a body with parallel surfaces. - Gk. παράλληλ, for παράλληλο-, crude form of παράλληλοs, parallel; and ἐπίπεδον, a plane surface. The form ἐπίπεδον is neut. of ἐπίπεδος, on the ground, flat, level, plane; from ἐπί, upon, and πέδον, the ground. The Gk. πέδον is from the same root as πούs (gen. ποδ-ύs), the foot, and E. foot. PARAMOUNT, chief, of the highest importance. (F.,-L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. He also gives paravail, the term used in contrast with it. A lord paramount is supreme, esp. as compared with his tenant parawait, i. e. his inferior. 'Let him [the pope] no longer count himselfe lord paramount ouer the princes of the world, no longer hold kings as his seruants parauaile;' Hooker, A Discourse of Justification (R.) Neither words are properly adjectives, but adverbial phrases; they correspond respectively to O. F. par amont, at the top (lit by that which is upware) and can me! (lit by that the top (lit. by that which is upwards), and par aval (lit. by that which is downwards). Both are Norman F. phrases used in the old law; see Blount's Law Lexicon. 'In one particular instance the wife may acquire a property in some of her husband's goods; which shall remain to her after his death, and not go to his executors. These are called her paraphernalia, which is a term borrowed from the civil law; it is derived from the Greek language, signifying over and above her dower; Blackstone's Commentaries, b. ii. c. 29 (R.) Formed from Lat. paraphern-a, the property of a bride over and above her dower, by adding -alia, the neut. pl. form of the common suffix -alis. - Gk. παράφερνα, that which a bride brings beyond her dower. – Gk. παρά, beyond, beside; and φερνή, a dowry, lit. that which is brought by the wife, from φέρειν, to bring, cognate with E. bear. for O. Span. perico, perillo, a little whelp (Minsheu). See Parrot.

See Parry and Solar. We find also Span. parasol, Ital. parasole. ¶ Of similar formation is F. para-pluie, a guard against rain, an umbrella, from pluie, rain, Lat. pluuia.

PARBOIL, to boil thoroughly. (F., L.) It now means 'to boil in part,' or insufficiently, from a notion that it is made up of part and boil. Formerly, it meant 'to boil thoroughly,' as in Ben Jonson, Every Man, iv. 1. 16 (ed. Wheatley); on which see Wheatley's note. 'To parboyle, præcoquere;' Levins. 'My liver's parboil'd,' i. e. burnt up; Webster, White Devil, near the end. M. E. parboilen; 'Parboylyd, parbullitus; Parboylyn mete, semibullio, parbullio.' Here the use of semibullio shews that the word was misunderstood at an early time. - O. F. parbouillir, to cook thoroughly (Roquefort); Cotgrave has: 'pourbouillir, to parboile throughly.'

- Low Lat. parbullire (as in the Prompt. Parv.); Lat. perbullire, to boil thoroughly. See Per- and Boil. For a somewhat similar change in sense, see Purblind.

PARCH, to scorch. (Unknown.) M.E. parchen, paarchen. 'Paarche pecyn or benys [= to parch peas or beans], frigo, ustillo; Prompt. Parv. Of unknown origin; but possibly from a Celtic source; cf. Irish barg, burning, red hot; O. Gael, barg, red hot. These words Arish parg, purning, red not; O. Gael. barg, red hot. These words seem to be related to Skt. bhraji, to boil, fry, from & BHARG, to fry, to parch. See Fry. B. Koch (Engl. Gramm. vol. iii. pt. 2. p. 193, suggests that parch is M. E. perchen, to pierce, an occasional form of percen, to pierce (F. percer); see Pierce. 'A knyghte... perchede the syde of Jesu;' Religious Pieces, ed. Perry (E. E. T. perchede the syde of Jesu;' Religious Pieces, ed. Perry (E. E. T. PARDON, to forgive. (F., - L.) Common in Shakespeare. Rich. quotes 'nor pardoned a riche man' from the Golden Boke,

c. 47. But the verb hardly appears in M.E., being formed (in English) from the M.E. sb. pardoun, pardun, pardon, a common word, occurring in Chaucer, C. T. 12860. And see Chaucer's description of the Pardonere, 1. 689. - F. pardon, sb., due to pardonner, vb., to pardon. - Low Lat. perdonare, to remit a debt (used A.D. 819), to grant, indulge, pardon. - Lat. per, thoroughly; and donare, to give, from donum, a gift. PARENT, a father or mother. (F., - L.) In the Geneva Bible, 1561, Ephes. vi. 1 (R.) - F. parent, 'a cousin, kinsman, allie;' Cot. Lat. parentem, acc. of parens, a parent, lit. one who produces, formed from parere, to produce, of which the usual pres. part. is pariens. — ΛPAR, to fill; whence also Skt.prí, to fill, pri, to bring over, protect, Gk. πόρειν* (aor. έ-πορ-ον), to give, offer, allot. See Fick, i. The same root appears in the latter syllable of E. hei-fer; see Heifer. PARGET, to plaister a wall. (L.?) Perhaps obsolete; once rather common. In Levins, Baret, Palsgrave, &c. M. E. pargeten. 'Pargetyn walles, Gipso, linio (sic); Parget, or playster for wallys, Gipsum, litura;' Prompt. Parv., and see Way's note. It is frequently spelt perget. 3. The word has lost an initial s, as it is also found in the fuller form. Spargettyn or pargette wallys, sparchyn or pargetyn, Gipso, limo; Prompt. Parv. p. 467. This suggests a deriva-tion from Low Lat. spargitare, to sprinkle frequently, a frequentative form of spargere, to sprinkle; see Sparse. See examples in Halliwell and Prompt. Parv. of M. E. sparklen, to sprinkle. Cf. 'Sparkling, claying between the spars to cover the thatch of cottages; Norfolk;' Halliwell. 'Spark, to splash with dirt; North;' id.

parietalis, belonging to a wall. - Lat. pariet-, stem of paries, a wall. B. Paries is supposed to mean that which goes round; from par-, equivalent to Gk. mepi, Skt. pari, round about; and -i, base of ire, to go. Cf. Skt. paryanta, a boundary, which (however) is from pari, around, and ania, a limit = E. end. Der. pellitory (1), q. v. PARISH, a district under one pastor, an ecclesiastical district.

See Para- and Vicinage. Der. parish-ion-er, formed by adding -er to M. E. parisshen, P. Plowman, B. xi. 67; this M. E. parisshen = O. F. paroissien = Low Lat. parochianus, with the same sense as (and a mere variant of) Lat. parochialis; sce Parochial. Also paroch-i-al. (67 It follows that parishioner should rather have been spelt parishianer or parishener; also that the suffix -er is quite unnecessary. Indeed Paroissien survives as a proper name; I find it in the Clergy List, 1873.

PARK, an enclosed ground. (E.) In early use; in Layamon,
1. 1432 (later text). Park = O. F. parc, is a F. spelling, and is found in F. as early as in the 12th century; but the word is E., being a contraction of M. E. parrok, from A.S. pearroc, a word which is now also spelt paddock. See further under Paddock (2). We find also Irish and Gaelic pairc, W. park and parwg (the latter preserving the full suffix), Bret. park; Du. perk, Swed. and Dan. park, G. pferch (an enclosure, sheepfold); also F. parc, Ital. parco, Span. parque. I suppose it to be of Teutonic origin, in which case the Celtic words are borrowed ones. Der. park-ed, I Hen. VI, ii. 4. 45; park-er, i. e. park-keeper (Levins); park-keeper; im-park.

2. Shak. also has the vb. parle, to speak, Lucrece, l. 100, whence the sb. parle, a parley, Haml. This is also from F. parler. - Low Lat. parabolare, to discourse, talk. - Low Lat. parabola, a talk; Lat. parabola, a parable. -Gk. παραβολή, a parable; see Parable. F. perroquet, 'a parrat,' Cot.; also spelt parroquet.

β. The F. Perrot or Pierrot is still a name for a sparrow; much as Philip was the M. E. name for the same bird. The F. perroquet was probably an imitation of, rather than directly borrowed from, the Span. perichito, which may likewise be explained as a derivative of Span. perico, meaning both 'a parrot and 'little Peter,' dimin. of Pedro, Peter.

Y. The mod. Ital. and 'little Peter,' dimin. of Pedro, Peter. γ . The mod. Ital. parrocchetto is also spelt perucchetto, as if it were a dimin. of parruca, a wig (1); but we find in Florio the O. Ital. forms parochetto, parochito, to kind of parrock and the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of the party of th 'a kind of parrats, called a parakito;' which seems to be nothing but δ. The Port. form is also the Span. word adapted to Italian. periquito, and we should expect the names to be borrowed from Spanish and Portuguese in particular, on account of their sea-voyages. The Ital. word would be borrowed from the Spanish name, and the F. perrot is a sort of translation of the same. If this be right, we may refer all the names to Lat. Petrus, Peter. - Gk. πέτρου, a stone, rock; as a proper name, Peter; a word of uncertain origin.

PARRY, to turn aside, ward off. (F.,-L.) A late word.

*Parrying, in fencing, the action of saving a man's self, or staving of the strokes offered by another; Bailey's Dict., vol. ii. ed. 1731.—
F. paré, used as equivalent to Ital. parata, a defence, guard; properly pp. of parer, 'to deck, trick, trimme, . . also to ward or defend a blow;' Cot.-Lat parare, to prepare, deck. See Pare. Der.

para-a-chute, q. v., para-pet, q. v., para-sol, q. v., ram-part, q. v.

PARSE, to tell the parts of speech. (L.) 'Let the childe, by and by, both construe and parse it ouer againe;' Ascham, Schoolmaster, b. i. ed. Arber, p. 26. An old school term; to parse is to declare 'quee pars orationis' = what part of speech, a word is. It is merely the Lat. pars used familiarly. See Part. Der. pars-ing PARSEE, an adherent of the old Persian religion, in India. (Pers.) Spelt Persee, Sir T. Herbert's Travels, ed. 1665, p. 55. -Pers. parsi, a Persian; from Pars, Persia; Palmer's Pers. Dict. col. 106.

PARSIMONY, frugality. (F., -L.) Spelt parsimonie in Minsheu, ed. 1627.—F. parsimonie, not in Cotgrave, but cited by Minsheu.

—Lat. parsimonia, better parcimonia, parsimony.—Lat. parci = parco-, crude form of parcus, sparing; with suffix -monia, formed by joining the Aryan suffixes -man and -ya (Schleicher, Compend. § 219). Cf.

Lat. parcere, to spare.

β. An initial s has been lost; the word parcus is allied to Gk. onapvos, scarce, rare, and to E. spare; see reference; contr. from Lat. petroselinum, rock-parsley. - Gk. πετροσέλινον, rock-parsley. - Gk. πέτρο-, crude form of πέτροs, a rock; and σέλινον, a kind of parsley, whence E. Celery. The roots of these words are unknown.

PARSNEP, PARSNIP, an edible plant with a carrot-like root. (F., -L.) Formerly parsnep; the pl. parsneppes occurs in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 9. (Palsgrave rightly drops the r, and spells it pasneppe). Corrupted from O. F. pastenaque, 'a parsenip;' Cot. (For the change from qu to p, compare Lat, quinque with Gk. πέμπε (five). The r is due to the sound of the F. a; the te was dropped, and the latter a was weakened, first to e, and then to i.] Cotgrave also gives pastenade and pastenaille with the same sense.—Lat. pastinaca, a parsnip.

β. Pastinaca prob. means that which is dug up, hence a parsnip, also a carrot; the root being the edible part.—Lat. pastinare, to dig up.—Lat. pastinum, a kind of two-pronged dibble for breaking the ground. Prob. from a base PAS, weakened to PIS in pinsere, to beat, crush, bruise; cf. Skt. pish, pinash, pimsh, to grind, pound, bruise. ¶ The corruption of the final syllable may have been influenced by the word turnep or turnip, in which the latter syllable is correct.

PARSON, the incumbent of a parish. (F., -L.) M. E. persone, Chaucer, C. T. 480. In the Ancren Riwle, p. 216, persone means person. It is certain that parson and person are the same word; for the Low Lat. persona is constantly used in the sense of 'parson.' See the Low Lat. persona in Ducange; it means dignity, rank, a choir-master, curate, parson, body, man, person. The sense of parson may easily have been due to the mere use of the word as a title of dignity; cf. 'Laicus quidam magnæ personæ' = a certain lay-man of great dignity; Ducange.

B. The quotation from Blackstone is better known than his authority for the statement. He says: 'A parson, persona ecclesiae, is one that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church. He is called parson, persona, because by his person the church, which is an invisible body, is represented; Comment. b. i. c. 11. This reason may well be doubted, but without affecting the etymology. See Person. Der. parson-age, a coined word with F. suffix, Bp. Taylor, vol. iii. ser. 7 (R.) Fr The proposed derivation from Lat. parochianus is impossible; this word is preserved in parishen, the old form of parishioner; see Parishioner.

And a parishioner is precisely what a parson is not. PART, a portion, piece. (F., -L.) M. E. part, sh., Floris and Blancheflur, ed. Lumby, 1. 522; hence parten, vb., id. 387. - F. part, 'a part;' Cot. - Lat. partem, acc. of pars, a part. form is par-ti-, formed with a suffix (Aryan ta) from the base par-, occuring in Lat. parere *, only found in a-per-ire, o-per-ire, re-per-ire, all nearly related to par-are, to get ready, furnish, provide; so that the orig, sense of part would be 'that which is provided,' a share. See Pare. Der. part, vb., M. E. parten, as above; part-ible, from Lat. partibilis; part-ly, Cor. i. 1. 40; part-ing; and see parti-al, partake, parti-cip-ate, parti-cip-le, parti-cle, part-isan, part-it-ion, partner, part-y; also a-part, com-part-ment, de-part, im-part, re-part-ee,

PARTAKE, to take part in or of, share. (Hybrid; F., - L., and Scand.) For part-take, and orig. used as part take, two separate words; indeed, we still use take part in much the same sense. 'The breed which we breken, wher it is not [is it not] the delynge, or part takynge, of the body of the lord?' Wyclif, 1 Cor. x. 16 (earlier version; later version omits part). In the Bible of 1551, we find: 'is not the breade whiche we breake, partakynge of the body of Christ?' in the same passage. See further in a note by Dr. Chance in N. and Q. 4th Series, viii. 481. Similarly, we find G. theilnehmen=theil nehmen, to take a part. Indeed, E. partake may have been suggested by the corresponding Scandinavian word (viz. Dan. deeltage, Swed. deltaga, to partake, participate) since take is a Scand. word. See Part and Take. Der. partaker, spelt partetaker in Coverdale's Bible (1538), Heb. xii. 8; partak-ing, spelt partetakyng, Palsgrave.

PARTERRE, a laid-out garden, a system of plots with walks, &c. (F., -L.) 'Thus . . . was the whole parterre environ'd;' Eveyn's Diary, 8 Oct., 1641. – F. parterre, 'a floor, even piece of ground, part of a garden which consists of beds, without any tree;' Cot. – F. par terre, along the ground. – Lat. per terram, along the ground;

see Per- and Terrace.

PARTIAL, relating to a part only. (F.,-L.) Frequently in the sense of taking one part in preference to others, hence, inclined in behalf of. 'That in thine own behalf maist partiall seeme;' Spenser, F. Q. vii. 6. 35.—F. partial, 'solitary, . . . also partiall, unequall, factious;' Cot.—Low Lat. partialis; formed with suffix -alis from Lat. parti-, crude form of pars, a part. See Part. Der. partial-ly; partial-i-ty, spelt parcyalyte, Skelton, Colin Clout, 1. 1195, from F. partialité, 'partiality,' Cot.

footnote. = F. persil, 'parseley;' Cot. Spelt persil in the 13th cent.; PARTICIPATE, to partake, have a share. (L.) In Shak. Tw. Wright's Vocab. i. 139, col. 2. = Low Lat. petrosilium, at the same | Nt. v. 245; properly a pp. or adj., as in Cor. i. 1. 106. = Lat. participation. Nt. v. 245; properly a pp. or adj., as in Cor. i. 1. 106.—Lat. participatus, pp. of participare, to have a share, give a share.—Lat. participstem of particeps, sharing in. - Lat. parti-, crude form of pars, a part; and capers, to take. See Part and Capacious. Der. participation, M. E. participacioum, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. iii, pr. 10, l. 2564, from F. participation, which from Lat. acc. participationm; also participant, from the stem of the pres. part.; also particip-le, q. v. PARTICIPLE, a part of speech. (F., -L.) So called because partaking of the nature both of an adjectival substantive and a verb. In Ben Jonson, Eng. Grammar, c. 9. The insertion of the l is curious, and due to a misapprehension of the sound of the F. word, the difference in F. between participe and participle being slight - F. participe, 'a participle, in grammer;' Cot. - Lat. participium, a participle. Lat. participi-, crude form of particeps, partaking; see Participate.

PARTICLE, a very small portion, atom. (F., -L.) In Shak. Jul. Cæs. ii. I. 139. An abbreviation for particule, due to loss of all stress in the last syllable. – F. particule, not in Cot., but in use in the 16th cent. (Littré). - Lat. particula, a small part; double dimin. (with suffixes -cu- and -la) from parti-, crude form of pars, a part. Der. particul-ar, M. E. particuler, Chaucer, C. T. 11434, from F. particulier, which from Lat. particularis, concerning a part; particular-ly; particular-ise, from F. particulariser, 'to particularize,' Cot.; particular-i-ty, from F. particularité, 'a particularity,' Cot. Doublet. barcel.

PARTISAN (1), an adherent of a party. (F., -Ital., -L.) 'These partizans of faction often try'd;' Daniel, Civil Wars, pt. ii. - F. partisan, 'a partner, partaker;' Cot. - Ital. partigiano, formerly also partegiano, 'a partner;' Florio. Cf. Ital. parteggiare, 'to share, take part with,' Florio; answering to F. partager, to take part in.

take part with, Florio; answering to F. partager, to take part in. The forms partigiano, parteggiare, answer to Low Lat. forms partitianus*, partaticare*, not found; the former being due to Lat. partitus, pp. of partiri, to part, divide, from partir, crude form of pars, a part. See Part, Partition. Der. partisan-ship.

PARTISAN (2), PARTIZAN, a kind of halberd. (F., — O. H. G.?) In Hamlet, i. 1. 140. — F. pertuisane, 'a partisan, or leading-staffe;' Cot.

B. But the spelling pertuisane is an accommodated form, to make it appear as it derived from F. pertuiser, to pierce (from pertuis a hole, which from Lat. pursuss. pp. of perpendent of the parties. pierce (from pertuis, a hole, which from Lat. pertusus, pp. of pertundere, to strike through). Cf. O. F. pourtisaine (15th cent.); Ital. partegiana, 'a partesan, a iauelin,' Florio; Swed. bardisan, a partisan; Low Lat. partesana (occurring A.D. 1488). Y. Etymology doubtful; but the word must almost certainly be extended from O. H. G. parta, M. H. G. barte, a battle-axe, which occurs in E. hal-berd. See further This etymology would be quite satisfactory under Halberd. if we could account for the suffix -esan or -isan; but this remains, at present, unexplained. Can we suppose that the weapon was jocosely termed 'a divider,' by intentional confusion with Low Lat. partizare, to divide, occurring as early as A.D. 1253? See Partisan (1).

PARTITION, a separate part, something that separates. (F, -L.) In Shak. meaning (1) division, Mid. Nt. Dr. iii. 2. 210; (2) a party-wall, id. v. 168. - F. partition, omitted by Cot., but occurring in the 14th cent. (Littré). - Lat. partitionem, acc. of partitio, a sharing, partition. - Lat. partiti-- partito-, crude form of pp. of partiri, to divide. - Lat. parti-, crude form of pars, a part. See Part. Der. partition, vb. So also partit-ive, from F. partitif (Littré), as if from

Lat. partitious *, not used; hence partit-ive-ly.

PARTNER, a sharer, associate, (F.,-L.) A curious corruption, due to the eye, i. e. to the misreading of MSS. and books. In many MSS. c and t are just alike, and the M. E. word which appears as partener or parcener is really to be read as parcener, with c, not t. For a similar instance of misreading, see Citizen. The spelling parcener occurs as late as in Cotgrave, as will appear; and even in Blackstone's Commentaries, b. ii. c. 12 (R., s. v. parcel). For the spelling partener, see Wyclif, I Cor. ix. 12; for the spelling parcener, id. Rev. xviii. 4.—O. F. parsonnier, 'a partener, or co-parcener;' Cot.—Low Lat. partitionarius *, not found; though we find partionarius sometimes used in the sense of 'common' or 'mutual,' which seems to be a contracted form of it. - Lat. partition-, stem of partitio; seems to be a contracted form of it.—Lat. partition., stem of paratio; see Partition. Thus partner = partitioner. Der. partner-ship.

PARTRIDGE, a well-known bird preserved for game. (F.,—L.,—Gk.) M. E. partricke, pertricke, Richard the Redeles. ed. Skeat, iii. 38.—F. perdrim, 'a partridge;' in which the second r is intrusive.—Lat. perdicem, acc. of perdim.—Gk. πέρδυξ, a partridge; perhaps named from its cry, as some connect it with Gk. πέρδυμα, Skt. pard.

PARTURIENT, about to produce young. (L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674.—Lat. parturient-, stem of pres. part. of parturier, to be ready to bring forth young.—Lat. partur-us, fut. part. of parëre, be ready to bring forth young.—Lat. parturies, fut. part. of parturies, to produce; see Parent. We also find F. parti, 'a match, bargain, party, side;' Cot. The former is the fem. of the latter. = Lat. partita, fem. of partitus, pp. of partiri, to divide. = Lat. partita, a share, lower passage. Lat. partita, a part. See Part. Cf. Ital. partita, a share, lowing g, the old spelling being passager, as in North's Plutarch, ed. part; Span. partida, a party of soldiers, crew, &c. PARVIS, a porch; also, a room over a church-porch for a school. (F.,-L.,-Gk.,-Pers.) See Halliwell, and Prompt. Parv. p. 385. M. E. paruis (= parvis), Chaucer, C. T. 312; see note in Tyrwhitt's Glossary.-O. F. parvis, 'the porch of a church; also (or more properly), the utter court of a palace or great house; 'Cot.-Low Lat. paravisus, a corruption of Low Lat. paradisus, used in the same sense, viz. a court or space before a church, a church-porch; also, paradise. It is thus the same word as Paradise, q. v. Diez cites Neapolitan paraviso as a variant of Ital. paradiso. According to Littre, when the old mystery-plays were exhibited in the church-yard, the porch represented paradise. The word had numerous meanings; it also meant an altar, or a berth in a ship; see Ducange.

PASCH, the Jewish passover; Easter. (L., -Gk., - Heb.) M. E. paske, P. Plowman, B. xvi. 130; Ormulum, 15850. - A. S. pascha; the gen. pasches is in the A. S. Chron. an. 1122. - Lat. pascha. - Gk. πάσχα, the passover, John, vi. 4. - Heb. pesach, a passing over, the passover; from Heb. root pasach, he passed over. See Exod. xii. 11, 27. Der. pasch-al, from F. paschal, 'paschall,' Cot., from Lat.

PASH, to dash, strike hard. (Scand.) 'As he was pashing it against a tree;' Ford, Lover's Melancholy, i. 1. And in Shak. Troil. ii. 3. 213, v. 5. 10. M. E. paschen, P. Plowman, B. xx. 99. - Swed. dial. paska, to dabble in water (Rietz); cf. Norweg. baska, to dabble in water, tumble, work hard, fight one's way on, baksa, to box (Aasen); Dan. baske, to slap, thwack, drub; baxes, to box, baxer, a boxer, pugilist.

\[\beta. \]

B. Thus pash is really one word with box, to fight; the former = paska, and the latter = baksa = baska = paska; see \[\beta \text{Sox}(3). \]

And see Plash.

PASHA, PACHA, PASHAW, BASHAW, a prince, lord. (Pers.) Spelt bashaw in Evelyn's Diary, Dec. 17, 1684; basha in Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1665, p. 139. – Pers. báshá, búdshúh, 'a governor of a province, counsellor of state, great lord, sometimes the grand vazīr; corruption of pidshāh, an emperor, sovereign, monarch, prince, great lord; Rich. Dict. pp. 234, 228, 315.—Pers. pid, protecting, guarding; and shāh, a king; id. pp. 315, 873. Of these, the former occurs in E. bezoar, the latter in E. shah and chess. Pid

PASQUIN, PASQUINADE, a lampoon, satire. (F..-Ital.)

Formerly also pasquil, from F. pasquille, 'a pasquill;' Cot.-F. pasquin, the name of an image or post in Rome, whereon libels and defamatory rimes are fastened, and fathered; also, a pasquill; Cot. [Hence pasquinade, which see in Littré.]—Ital. Pasquino, 'a statue in Rome on whom all libels are fathered;' Florio; whence pasquinata, a libel, the original of F. pasquinade. 'In the 16th century, at the stall of a cobbler named Pasquin [Pasquino], at Rome, a number of idle persons used to assemble to listen to his pleasant sallies, and to relate little anecdotes in their turn, and indulge themselves in raillery at the expense of the passers-by. After the cobbler's death the statue of a gladiator was found near his stall, to which the people gave his name, and on which the wits of the time, secretly at night, affixed their lampoons: 'Haydn, Dict. of Dates. 'The statue still stands at the corner of the Palazzo Braschi, near the Piazza Navona;' note in Gloss. to Bacon, Adv. of Learning, ed. Wright.

PASS, to walk onward, pace, move on. (F., -L.) In early use; Ancren Riwle, p. 330, l. 20; Layamon, 1341 (later text). - F. passer, to pass. - Low Lat. passare, to pass. β. Diez derives this verb from Lat. passare*, a frequentative form of pandere, to stretch; Littre shews that it may rather have been taken from passus, a step, a pace; and certainly the common use of the E. verb accords better with this view. Happily, it makes little ultimate difference, since passus is itself derived from the same verb, and meant, originally, 'a stretch,' hence the difference of space between the feet in walking. Either way, we are led to Lat. passus, pp. of panders, to stretch. See Pace. Der. pass, sb., Hamlet, ii. 2. 77; pass-book, pass-key, pass-word; pass-able, Cor. v. 2. 13; pass-abl-y, pass-able-ness; pass-age, q. v.; pass-er, passer-by; pass-ing, Two Gent. i. 2. 17; pass-ing, adv., L. L. iv. 3. 103; passing-bell, Shak Venus, 702; pass-over, Exod.

1631, p. 24 (life of Romulus), where we read that some 'hold a false opinion, that the vulturs are passagers, and come into these parts out of strange countries.' See F. passager in Cotgrave.

PASSERINE, relating to sparrows. (L.) Scientific. - Lat. passerinus, adj., formed from passeri-, crude form of passer, a sparrow.

Root uncertain.

PASSION, suffering, strong agitation of mind, rage. (F.,-L.) In early use. M.F. passion; spelt passiun, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, i. 119, l. 6 from bottom. - F. passion, 'passion, perturbation;' Cot. - Lat. passionem, acc. of passio, suffering, &c. - Lat. passus, pp. of pati, to suffer. Root uncertain; but clearly related to Gk. madeiv, to suffer; see Patient, Pathos. Der. passion-flower, passion-less, passion-week; passion-ate, Mids. Nt. Dr. iii. 2. 220, from Low Lat. passionatus, occurring A.D. 1409 (Ducange), with which cf. F. passioné (Cot.); passion-ate-ly, passion-ate-ness; com-passion. And see Passive.

PASSIVE, enduring, unresisting. (F., -L.) In Shak. Timon, iv. 3. 254. - F. passif, 'passive, suffering;' Cot. - Lat. passiuus, suffering. - Lat. passus, pp. of pati, to suffer. See Passion. Der. passive-ly, -ness; passiv-i-ty, a coined word, in Bp. Taylor, vol. iii.

PASSPORT, a permission to travel. (F.,-L.) 'A travelling warrant is call'd Passeport, whereas the original is passe par tout; 'Howell, Familiar Letters, b. iv. let. 19. 'They gave us our passeport;' Hakluyt's Voyages, ed. 1598, vol. i. p. 71. Spelt passeporte, Gascoigne, Fruites of War, st. 116. [Howell's remark is wrong; a passport and a passe-partout are different things; one is 'leave to quit a town,' the other is 'permission to travel everywhere;' he probably means that the former word came to signify much the same as the latter. Dryden has: 'with this passe par tout I will instantly conduct her to my own chamber; 'Kind Keeper, Act v. sc. I.] = F. passe-port, 'a passe, or passe-port, or safe conduct;' Cot. = F. passer, to pass; and porte, a gate, from Lat. porta, a gate. Sce Pass and Port (3).

PASTE, dough prepared for pies, flour and water, &c. (F., -L., -Gk.) Paste for to make; P. Plowman, B. xiii. 250. -O. F. paste, 'paste, or dough;' Cot. Mod. F. pâte; Span. and Ital. pasta. -Late Lat. pasta, paste, used by Marcus Empiricus, about A. D. 400 (White). - Gk. παστή, a mess of food; strictly a fem. form from παστός, besprinkled, salted, adj., formed from πάσσειν, to strew, sprinkle, esp. to sprinkle salt. Thus the orig. sense was 'a salted mess of food.' Der. paste-board; past-y, M. E. pastee, Chaucer, C. T. 4344, from O. F. pasté (mod. F. páté), 'a pic, or pastie,' Cot.; past-r-y, used in Shak, in the sense of a room in which pasties were made, Romeo, iv. 4. 2 (cf. 'Pastrye, pistorium,' Levins), and formed accordingly on the model of pant-r-y and butt-er-y (i. e. bottl-er-y), but now applied to articles made of paste; pastry-cook; patt-y (as applied to oyster-patties), from mod. F. pâté.

PASTEL, a roll of coloured paste used like a crayon, a coloured crayon. (F., - Ital., - L.) An artist's term. - F. pastel, 'a pastel, crayon;' Hamilton. - Ital. pastello, 'a bit of pie, small cake, pastil' (i.e. pastel); Meadows. - Lat. pastillum, acc. of pastillus, a little loaf or roll. Dimin. of pastus, food. - Lat. pastus, pp. of pascere, to feed. Sometimes written pastil, but this makes it too like pastille. However, pastel and pastille are doublets: and neither are at all related to pasty or paste. Doublet, pastille.

PASTERN, the part of a horse's foot from the fetlock to the hoof. (F., -L.) Spelt pasterne in Levins, ed. 1570. Palsgrave has: 'Pastron of an horse, pasturon.' - (). F. pasturon, 'the pastern of a horse;' Cot. Mod. F. paturon. So called because when a horse was turned out to pasture, he was tethered to a peg by a cord passing round the pastern. It is, in short, the 'pasturing-joint.' The cord by which the horse was tied was called pasture in Old French. 'Le suppliant frappa icellui Godart deux ou trois coups par le costé d'unes cordes appelées pastures'=the petitioner beat this Godart twice or thrice on the side with cords called pastures; in a passage dated A.D. 1460, in Ducange, s.v. pasturale, and cited by Littré. - O. F. pasture, 'pasture, grasse, fodder;' Cot. See further under Pasture. Thus O. F. pasturon was formed from pasture, a tether, by adding the suffix -on, which gave various meanings to the sb.; see by adding the sums on, which gare various the pastern, from Brachet, Introd. § 231. So also Ital. pasturale, the pastern, from pastura, a pasture. pastura, a pasture. Ilence we may explain a passage in Beaum, and Fetcher, The Chances, i. 8. 16, which Rich notices, but could not understand, viz. 'She had better have worn pasterns.' It means tethers, or clogs tied to her foot; i.e. she had better have xii. 11, 27; pass-port, q. v.; past; pastime, q. v.

PASSAGE, a journey, course. (F., -L.) M. E. passage, King hollow of a beast's heel, the foot of a horse, that part under the

that this sense should have been retained in English, though unnoticed in Cotgrave's F. Dict.

PASTILLE, a small cone made of aromatic substances, to be burnt to purify the air of a room. (F., -L.) Modern. Borrowed from F. pastille. Cot. gives: 'Pastilles, little lumps or loaves of wood, &c.'-Lat. pastillum, acc. of pastillus, a little loaf or roll. Dimin. from pastus, food. See Pastel, which is a doublet. And see Pastor.

PASTIME, amusement. (Hybrid: F., -L.; and E.) In Shak. Temp. v. 38. Put for pass-time. Spelt both passe-tyme and pastyme in Sir T. Elyot, The Governor, b. i. c. 22. It is a sort of half translation of F. passe-temps, 'pastime;' Cot. We also find, in old authors, the form pastaunce or pastans, which is the F. passe-temps Anglicised. Gawain Douglas has pastans, Prol. to Eneid, bk. xii.

PASTOR, a shepherd. (L.) In Hamlet, i. 3. 47; spelt pastour in Skelton, ed. Dyce, i. 203, l. 23.—Lat. pastor, a shepherd, lit. feeder.—Lat. past-us, pp. of passere, to feed, an inceptive verb, pt. t. pasting PAS, to feed; whence also E. food; see Food. Der. pastor-al, in Sir P. Sidney, Apology for Poetrie, ed. Arber, p. 43, l. 16, from F. pastoral, 'pastorall, shepherdly,' Cot., from Lat. pastoralis; pastor-ship; pasture, Cursor Mundi, 18445, from O. F. pasture (mod. F. pâture), 'pasture' (Cot.), which from Lat. pastura, a feeding, properly fem. of fut. part. of pasci, to browze, from pascere, to feed; pastur-able, from O.F. pasturable, 'pasturable,' Cot.; pastur-age, from O.F. pasturage (mod. F. pâturage), 'pasturage,' Cot. And see pastern, pabulum.

PAT (1), to strike lightly, tap. (E.) 'It is childrens sport, to prove whether they can rubbe upon their brest with one hand, and pat upon their fore-head with another; Lord Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 62. Not in M. E. or A.S.; but closely allied to (perhaps a weakened form of) A. S. plættan, to strike. 'Hi plætton hyne' = they smote him with their hands, John, xix. 3. So also Swed. dial. pjätta, to pat, to strike lightly and often (Rietz), allied to Swed. plätta, to tap, plätt, a tap, pat. Cf. O. F. (Gascon) patact, 'a tack, clack, knock, flap;' Cot. Also Bavarian patzen, to pat, patzen, a pat on the hand; Schmeller. And see Patch (1). Der. pat, sb.; patt-er.

PAT (2), a small lump of butter. (C.) Of Celtic origin; cf. Irish pati, a hump, patteog, a small lump of butter; Gael. patt, a hump,

PAT (3), quite to the purpose. (E.) Orig. an adv., as in 'Pat he comes,' K. Lear, i. 2. 146; 'it will fall [happen] pat,' Mids. Nt. Dr. v. 188; 'now might I do it pat,' Haml. iii. 3. 73. This can hardly be other than the same word as pat, a tap; see Pat (1). But the sense is clearly due to an extraordinary confusion with Du. pas, pat, fit, convenient, in time, which is used in exactly the same way as E. pat; cf. komt het te pas, 'if it comes convenient,' i. e. pat, te pas dienen, 'to serve just at the time;' Hexham. So also G. pass, pat, fit, suitable; zu passe, apropos; passen, to fit, suit, to be just right. These do not appear to be true Teutonic words, but borrowed from F.; cf. 'se passer, whence il se passe à peu de chose, he is contented, he maketh shift, he doth well enough; 'Cot. The E. word seems to have been pitched upon to translate the Du. word, though it must be really of a different origin.

PATCH (1), a piece sewn on a garment, a plot of ground. (O. Low G.) M. E. pacche, patche, Wyclif, Mark, ii. 21; Prompt. Parv. p. 377. a. The letters tch really appear as cch in old MSS.; the spelling tch is of later date, and sometimes due to the editors. The letters cch answer to an older kk (or A. S. cc), as in M. E. strecchen, to stretch, from A.S. streccan. Hence pacche presupposes an older form pakke. B. The etymology is obscured by the loss of l; patch stands for platch, and pakke for plakke. We find: 'Platch, a large spot, a patch, or piece of cloth sewed on to a garment to repair it; Dialect of Banffshire, by W. Gregor. The loss of l was due to the difficulty of sounding it; for other instances, cf. E. pat with A. S. plattan, to pat, strike with the hands, and pate; see Pat (1), Pate.

y. The word plakke is O. Low German.—Low G. plakke, plakk (1), a spot; (2) a piece, both a piece torn away, and a patch put on; (3) a piece of land (cf. E. patch of ground). Hence the verb plakken, to patch, fasten. 'Frisch, from Alberi Lexicon, cites: ich plack, reconcinno, resarcino; ich setze einen placken an, assuo;' Bremen Wörterbuch. The orig. sense of plakken was 'to strike;' cf. O. Du. placken, (1) to strike, (2) to plaster, besmear with lime or chalk, (3) to spot, to stain; placke, mod. Du. plek, a spot (een meoi plek grondes, a fine spot [patch] of ground, Sewel); see Oudemans. So also Swed. dial. plagga, to strike, smite; plagg, an article of clothing. 8. With a change of kk to tt, we have Dan. plette, to strike, A.S. plattan, to a change of kk to tt, we have Dan. plette, to strike, A.S. plættan, to strike with the hands; and (most curious of all) Goth. plats, a patch, Mark, ii. 21, just where Wyclif has pacche. The A.S. plæca is really B. xiv. 300; pl. papes, Havelok, 268. — A.S. pæö, pæö, a path, fetlock to the hoof; also, a shackle for a horse.' It is remarkable the same as prov. E. plek, a patch of ground, which is related to plot. The phrase 'in the corners of the streets' (Lat. in angulis platearum) is glossed by 'huommum oæra plæcena vel woroum' in the Northumb. version of Matt. vi. 5. See Plot. e. The root is PLAG, to strike, whence Gk. πληγή, Lat. plaga, a stroke, and E. plague, also Lithuanian plak-ti, to strike, pleka, a stroke. By Grimm's law, p is G. f; and we also find a collateral form to Low G. plakks in G. fleck, a spot, place, piece, botch, patch, speck, stain; which is just the cognate High German word. Cf. also M. E. flaken, to palpitate (orig. to beat), and E. flap; see Flag (1) and Flap.

Tother illustrations might be added; thus O. Du. plack means 'a ferule, or small batle-dore, wherewith school-boys are strooke in the palmes of their handes' (Hexham); this (by loss of I) is allied to G. patsche, an instrument for striking; cf. prov. G. patschen, to patch (Flügel), O. Du. plagge, rags, plets, a patch (Hexham). Der. patch, Tw. Nt. i. 5. 52; patch-work.

PATCH (2), a paltry fellow. (O. Low G.) In Shak. Temp. iii. 2. 71, Com. Erraiii. 1. 32, Merch. Ven. ii. 5. 46; &c. 'In these passages, the word is by most commentators interpreted . . "a domestic supposed to be so called from his parti-coloured dress;' idt. 'Wolsey we find had two fools, both occasionally called Schmidt. patch, though they had other names; see Douce, Illustrations of Shak., i. 258; Nares. The supposition that patch is a nick-name from the dress is most probably right; if so, the derivation is from patch (1); see above. In Mids. Nt. Dr. iii. 2. 9, the word merely means clown, or an ill-dressed mechanic.

¶ It is independent of Ital. pazzo, a fool, madman, which is used in a much stronger sense. Der. patch-ock, a dimin. form (cf. bull-ock, hill-ock); 'as very patchokes [clowns] as the wild Irish,' Spenser, View of the State of Ireland, Globe ed. p. 636, col. 2; this is the word spelt pajock in Shak. Hamlet, iii. 2.

PATE, the head. (F.,-G.) In Spenser, Shep. Kal., June, 1. 16. M. E. pate; bi pate and bi polle, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 237, in a song of the time of Edw. II. The etymology is disguised by the loss of l; pate stands for plate, i. e. the crown of the head. - O. F. pate, not recorded in the special sense here required, but Cotgrave gives: 'Pate, a plate, or band of iron, &c. for the strengthening of a thing;' which establishes the loss of l = G. plate, a plate, bald pate, in vulgar language, the head (Flügel); M. H. G. plate, O. H. G. blattá, a plate, plate-armour, the shaven crown of the head. B. Cf. also Low Lat. platta, the clerical tonsure from ear to ear (Ducange); obviously due to G. platte. Cf. O. Du. platte kruyne, 'flat-crowned, or ball-pated,' Hexham; platte, the shaven crown, Kilian. \(\gamma\). Even or ball-pated,' Hexham; platte, the shaven crown, Kilian. γ . Even in Irish, we find plata, plate; plate, the forehead, plattin, a little pate, a skull, the crown of the head (with the usual change of a to ai); O'Reilly. These words were prob. borrowed from O. F. or M. E. We may note a similar change in sense in the word crown, meaning (1) the clerical tonsure, (2) the top of the head, esp. if bald. Plate

PATEN, the plate for the bread in the eucharist. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) Spelt patine in Cotgrave; Shak. has patines - plates of metal, Merch. Ven. v. 59. M. E. pateyn, a paten, Havelok, 187. — O. F. patene, 'the patine, or cover of a chalice;' Cot. — Low Lat. patena, the paten in the eucharist; Lat. patena, patina, a wide shallow bowl, basin, pan. See Pan. Rather a word borrowed from Gk. than true Latin. – Gk. πατανή, a kind of flat dish. So named from its flatness; from PAT, to spread out, whence Gk. πατάννυμ, I spread out; Lat. patere, to lie open, spread out, extend; see Patent. Doublet, PATENT, lit. open, hence conspicuous, public; gen. as sb., an official document conferring a privilege. (F., -L.) The use as an adj. is less common, but it occurs in Cotgrave. M. E. patente, sb., a patent, Chaucer, C. T. 12271. [The patent was so called because open to the inspection of all men.]—O. F. patent (fem. patente), 'patent, wide open, discovered;' Cot.—Lat. patent-, stem of pres. part. of patere, to lie open. - PAT, to spread out; whence also Gk. πεταννυμι, I spread out, unfold, unfurl, and E. fath-om. See Petal. patent, vb. (modern); patent-ee, where the suffix = F. -e = Lat. -atus.

PATERNAL, fatherly. (F., -L.) In Shak. King Lear, i. 1. 115.

- F. paternel, 'paternal;' Cot. - Low Lat. paternalis, extended from Lat. paternus, paternal, fatherly. Formed with suffix -no- (= Aryan -NA) from pater, a father. Pater is formed with suffix -ter (= Aryan TAR) from γ PA, to guard, feed, cherish; cf. Skt. på, to protect, cherish, and E. food.+Gk. πατήρ. + E. father; see Father. Der. paternal-ly; also patern-i-ty, from F. paternité, 'paternity, fatherhood,' Cot., from Lat. acc. paternitatem. Also pater-noster, Chaucer, C. T. 3485, so called from the first two words, pater noster, i. e. Our Father.

orien, it. 301. 7 104. μαι. τ ο. μα Skt. path, path, to go; Gk. mareiv, to tread. ¶ We should expect to find A.S. f for Skt. p; but there may have been a loss of initial s; Fick suggests that the root PAT may be extended from SPA, to stretch out, whence PAT has also the sense of 'spread,' as in

E. patent, paten. Der. path-less, path-way. And see post-oon, pont-iff. PATHOS, emotion, deep feeling. (Gk.) In South's Sermons, vol. iv. ser. I (R.); and in Phillips, ed. 1706. [But the adj. pathetical is in earlier use, occurring in Cotgrave, and is oddly used by Shak. As You Like It, iv. 1. 196, &c.] – Gk. πάθοι, suffering, deep feeling; from παθείν, used as 2 aor. infin. of πάσχειν, to suffer.

β. There are numerous related words, such as πόθος, a yearning, πένθος, grief, all from a base πα-, παν-; cf. πόνος, work, πονέω, I work, suffer. An initial s seems to be lost; all from \(\sigma \) SPA or SPAN, to draw or stretch out, as in G. spannen, to stretch out, E. span and spin. See Span. The notion of 'drawing out' leads to those of torture, suffering, labour, &c. See Curtius, i. 337. Der. pathet-ic, from O. F. pathetique, 'patheticall, passionate,' Cot., from Lat. patheticus (White) = Gk. παθητικόυ, extended from παθητόυ, subject to suffering, lit. one who has suffered; pathet-ic-al, pathet-ic-al-y, fathet-ic-al-mess. Also patho-logy, in Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674, from O. F. pathologie, 'that part of physics,' which intracts of the causes qualities and logie, 'that part of physick which intreats of the causes, qualities, and differences of diseases,' Cot., from Gk. παθολογεῖν, to treat of diseases, which from πάθο-, put for πάθος, and λέγειν, to speak. Hence patholog-ic, Gk. παθολογικό, patholog-ic-al, patholog-ist. And see patient.

M. E. pacient, patient, Chaucer, C. T. 486. - O. F. patient, 'patient'. - Lat. patient-, stem of pres. part. of pati, to suffer. β. Root uncertain; but clearly related to Gk. $\pi a\theta \epsilon \hat{\imath} \nu$, to suffer, 2 aor. infin. of $\pi a\sigma \chi \epsilon \iota \nu$, to suffer. The θ is secondary, and we may fairly assume that the shorter root πa - (pa-) was in Greek expanded by θ , in Latin by t; 'Curtius, ii. 17. Probably the orig. root was SPA, to draw out; see Pathos. Der. patient-ly; patience, M. E. pacience, Ancren Riwle, p. 180, from F. patience, Lat. patientia. And see passion.

PATOIS, a vulgar dialect. esp. of French. (F., -L.) Borrowed from F. patois, 'gibridge, clownish language, rusticall speech;' Cot. Patois stands for an older form patrois; see Diez and Littré. - Low Lat. patriensis, one who is indigenous to a country, a native; so that patois is the 'speech of the natives.' — Lat. patria, one's native country. See Patriot, Paternal, Father.

(F.,-L.) From F. patristique, which see in Littré. Coined from Lat. patr-, stem of pl. patres, i. e. the fathers of the Christian church; from the sing. pater, a father. See Father. ¶ Not a well-made word, the suffix -ist- being Greek rather than Latin.

A frequentative of pat, with the usual suffix -er; the doubt t being put in to keep the vowel short. See Pat (1). A dialectal (Lonsdale) variant is pattle, to pat gently (Peacock). Cf. Swed. dial. padra, to patter as hail does against a window (Rietz). It is probable that M. E. pateren, in the sense 'to repeat prayers,' was coined from pater, the first word of the pater-noster. 'And patred in my paternoster; P. Plowman's Crede, ed. Skeat, l. 6; so also in the Rom. of the Rose, ll. 6794.

E. pauiment (with u for v. and trisyllabic), Rob. of Glouc. p. 476, l. 10, pauement, Chaucer, C.T. 7686, from F. pavement (Cot.), which from Lat. pauimentum, a hard floor, from pauire, to ram; also pav-i-or (where the -i- is an English insertion, as in law-y-er, bow-y-er, saw-y-er, intended to give the word insertion, as in tawy-er, coury-er, sawy-er, intended to give the word a causal force), from 0. F. paveur, 'a paver,' Cot., answering a Low Lat, form pautitor *, from pautitus, pp. of pautre.

PAVILION, a tent. (F, -L). The spelling with li is intended to represent the sound of the F. li. M. E. pauylon (with u=v), Rob. of Glouc. p. 272, l. 13.—F. pavillon, 'a pavillion, tent;' Cot. So called because spread out like the wings of a butterfly.— Lat. papilionem, acc. of papilio, (1) a butterfly, (2) a tent. B. Pa-pil-io is a reduplicated form from a base pal, meaning to vibrate, cf. palpebra, the eyelid (from its quivering), pal-p-it-are, to palpitate. Thus the lit. sense is 'the flutterer;' cf. G. schmetterling, a butterfly, with G. schmettern, to dash, lit. to strike often.

More, Works, p. 1179 c. Spelt pauys, Reliquiæ Antiquæ, ii. 22; paues, Skelton, ed. Dyce, i. 8, 1. 48. - F. pavois, 'a great shield,' Cot. Cf. Span. paves, O. Ital. pavese, pavesse (Florio), Low Lat. pavensis, a large shield, occurring A.D. 1299. Of uncertain origin; some suppose it to have been named from the city of Pavia, in the N. of Italy.

PAW, the foot of a beast of prey. (C.?) M.E. pawe, Sir Isumbras, l. 181, in the Thornton Romances, ed. Halliwell; powe, Rich. Cuer de Lion, l. 1082, in Weber's Met. Romances. 1. Perhaps of Celtic origin; cf. W. pawen, a paw, claw, hoof, Corn. paw, a foot (found in the 15th century), Bret. paô, pav, a paw, or jocularly, a large hand.

2. Otherwise, it is from O. F. poe, a paw (Burguy), a word of Low G. origin, from Low G. pote, a paw (Bremen Worterbuch), the same word as Du. poot, G. pfote. All these words seem to be related. Der. paw, verb, Job, xxxix. 21.

PAWL, a short bar, which acts as a catch to a windlass. (W.) A mechanical term; borrowed from W. pawl, a pole, a stake, bar. Cognate with Lat. palus, whence E. pale; see Pale (1), Pole. Der. paul-windlass (Halliwell).

PAWN (1), a pledge, something given as security for the repayment of money. (F., -L.) Spelt paune in Minsheu, cd. 1627; Levins (ed. 1570) has the verb to paune. - F. pan, 'a pane, piece, or panel of a wall; also a pawn, or gage, also the skirt of a gown, the pane of a hose, of a cloak, &c.; Cot.—Lat. pannum, acc. of pannus, a cloth, rag, piece. See Pane, which is a doublet.

β. The explanation of this peculiar use of the word lies in the fact that a piece of clothing is the readiest article to leave in pledge; hence the O. F. paner meant not only 'to take pledges,' but generally to take, seize (Burguy). So Span. paño, cloth, stuff, paños, clothes, is accompanied by the verb apanar, to seize, grasp, take, dress, patch; Diez. ¶ In our old pronunciation, the sounds of pane and pawn approached much closer to each other than at present. The Du. pand, a pledge, pawn, G. pfand, O. H. G. phant, Icel. pantr, is doubtless the same word, and very old in the Teutonic languages; but it was borrowed directly from Lat. pannum, the acc. case of pannus, the d or t being excrescent after n, as in many other instances. From the old Teutonic form pand seems to have been made the A.S. pending, a penny; see Penny. Der. pawn, vb., pawn-er, pawn-broker. Doublet, pane. PAWN (2), one of the least valuable pieces in chess. (F.,-L.)

M. E. paune, Chaucer, Book of the Duchess, 1. 661 (Moxon); but spelt poune, poun in the Tanner and Fairfax MSS. (Chaucer Soc.) -Speit poune, poun in the Tainer and Fairiax MSS. (Chaucer Soc.)—
O. F. paon, a pawn at chess (Roquefort); spelt poon in the 12th cent. (Littré); the dimin. paonnet occurs in the 13th cent. (id.). Roquefort also gives the form paonne.

β. The mod. F. name is pion, explained by Cotgrave as 'a pawn at chests,' of which an older form was peon (Burguy), spelt pehon in the 15th century; this is the same as Span. peon, a foot-soldier, a pawn, Port. piāo, one of the layers reached a pawn. Italian a chemical footsman. (Florich) and the chemical footsman. lower people, a pawn, Ital. pedone, 'a footeman' (Florio), pedona, 'a pawne at chesse,' id. These are all from Low Lat. pedonem, acc. of pedo, a foot-soldier; from ped-, stem of pes, a foot, cognate with E. Foot.

7. From the F. pied, O. F. piet, foot, was also formed O. F. pieton (mod. F. pieton), 'a footman, one that travels on foot, also, a pawn at chests; 'Cot. 8. Littré supposes the O. F. paon, poon, to be the same as F. paon, a peacock; but there is no reason whatever for the supposition. It is more likely that paon, poon, are mere variants of peon; the form occasions no difficulty, since the pesen, id. 198. A later spelling of the pl. is peason; see examples in also, to ram, tread down, tread the earth even and hard. + Gk. + Low Lat. fetonem = F. faon (Cot.) = E. faun. Indeed, in Migne's epitome of Ducange, we find pedones explained as equivalent to O. F. paons, paoniers, where paon means a foot-soldier; cf. paonnier, fantassin, qui va à pied, piéton; Roquefort.

8. As to the fact 8. As to the fact of the origin of the name there is no difficulty; the pawns were regarded as the foot-soldiers of the game, and I have seen a set in which each pawn was carved as a foot-soldier armed with a short glaive or halberd. Such was, I suppose, the arrangement from the very first; cf. Skt. chaturanga, adj., consisting of four parts, which, when joined with bala, an army, signifies a complete army, consisting of chariots, elephants, horse, and foot; also chaturanga, sb. a complete army, chess (Benfey). More strictly, chaturanga is the name of the orig. game out of which chess (the game of the kings) was developed. But even chaturanga had its foot-soldiers; there were four players. and each had a king and an army. The army consisted of an elephant (bishop), chariot (rook), horse (knight), and four foot-soldiers (pawns). There was then no queen. Der. pion-eer, q.v. soldiers (pawns). There was then no queen. Der. pion-eer, q.v. (And see Rook.)

Still common provincially; also called panywany, packwan, fanwan, finfan. M. E. panwan, Prompt. Parv.; see Way's note. He quotes: 'Le vendon, the fax-wax,' MS. Harl. 219, fol. 150. Again he says: 'Gautier de Biblesworth says, of a man's body, Et si ad le wenne (fex wex) au col derere,' i.e. and he has paxwax at the back of his neck. The orig. form is fax-wax or fex-wex, and it exactly corresponds to the equivalent G. haarwachs, lit. hair-growth; presumably because the hair grows down to the back of the neck, and there ceases. Compounded of M. E. fax, hair, as in Fair-fax = fair-hair; and wax, growth. - A. S. feax, fex, hair, Luke, vii. 38; and weaxan, to grow; see Pectinal and Wax (1).

PAY (1), to discharge a debt. (F., -L.) M. E. paien, Ancren Riwle, p. 108, l. 9; Layamon, 2340 (later text). It often has the sense of 'please' or 'content' in old authors. 'Be we paied with these thingis'=let us be contented with these things, Wyclif, I Tim. vi. 8. - O. F. paier (also paer), later payer, 'to pay, satisfie, content;' Cot. - Lat. pacare, to appease, pacify; Low Lat. pacare, to pay (A.D. 1338). - Lat. pac-, stem of pax, peace. See Peace. Der. pay, sb., 1338).—Lat. pac-, stem of pax, peace. See Feece. Der. pay, so., M. E. paie, satisfaction, P. Plowman, B. v. 556; pay-able, pay-er, pay-ee (=F. payé, pp.); pay-master; pay-ment, M. E. paiement, Chaucer, C. T. 5713, from O. F. paiement, later payement, 'a payment or paying,' Cot. PAY (2), to pitch the seam of a ship. (Span.?—L.) A nautical term, as noticed by Skinner, ed. 1671; and in the proverb: 'the devil to pay, and no pitch hot.' 'To pay a rope, een kabel teeren,' lit. to tar a cable; Sewel's Eng.-Du. Dict. 1754. Most likely caught up from Spanish, the present spelling merely representing the supposed from Spanish, the present spelling merely representing the supposed sound of the word.—Span. pega, a varnish of pitch, pegar, to join together, cement, unite; empegar, to pitch. The Span. pegar is from Lat. picare, to pitch.—Lat. picem, acc. of pix, pitch. See Wedgwood cites, from Bomhoff, Du. paaien, to careen a vessel, the usual sense of the Du. verb being 'to pay;' but the Du. word is merely borrowed, and possibly from English, just as Du. paaien (or paaijen), to pay money, is from F. payer. He next cites the O.F. empoier, to pitch, from poix, pitch, with the quotation: 'Et ne sont pas empoices, car ils n'ont pas de pois '= and they are not paid, for they have no pitch; Marco Polo, Pautier's edition, p. 535. This is an excellent illustration, but I think the Span. word comes nearer to E. than the O. F. does. The M. E. peys, pitch, K. Alisaunder, 1620, is, of course, from O. F. pois; but the verb to pay

PAYNIM, PAINIM, a pagan. (F., -L.) 'The paynim bold;' Spenser, F. Q. i. 4. 41; cf. Fairfax, tr. of Tasso, xviii. 80. M. E. paynim. 'The paynymys hii ouercome' = they overcame the pagans; Rob. of Glouc. p. 401. This E. use of the word is due to a singular mistake. A paynim is not a man, but a country; it is identical with paganism, which was formerly extended to mean the country of pagans, or heathen lands. It is correctly used in King Horn, ed. Lumby, l. 803, where we find 'a geaunt. fram paynyme' = a giant from heathen lands. — O. F. paienisme, spelt paianisme in Cotgrave, who explains it by paganisme. The sense is borrowed from that of O. F. paënie, paiënie, the country inhabited by pagans (Burguy).— Low Lat. paganismus, paganism; formed with suffix ismus (Gk. -ioµos) from Lat. pagan-us, a pagan. See Pagan. ¶ When a writer, wishing to use fine language, talks of a paynim, he had better

PEA, a common vegetable. (L.) We now say pea, with pl. peas. This is due to mistaking the s of the older form for a plural termination; just as when people say shay for chaise, Chinese for Chinese, &c. Other words in which the same mistake is made are cherry (F. cerise), sherry (formerly sherris). M. E. pese, pl. pesen and peses. 'A pese-lof' = a loaf made of peas, P. Plowman, B. vi. 181; pl. peses, id. 189; London Lyckpeny, st. 9.—A. S. pisa, pl. pisan, in a gloss (Bosworth). Not an E. word, but borrowed from Lat. pisum, a pea. [The vowelchange from i to e occurs again in the case of pear, q. v.] + Gk. misos, a pea. - PIS, to grind, pound, whence Lat. pinsere, to pound, Skt. pish, to grind, pound. 'Hehn is prob. right in adding the Church-Slavonic pes-uku, sabulum, calculus, and in conjecturing "globule" or "grain-fruit" to be the primary meaning, one which is easily derived from the root; Curtius, i. 343. Cf. Russ. pesok', Der. pea-pod, peas-cod (as above).

PEACE, quietness, freedom from war. (F.,-L.) M. E. pais, occurring as early as in the A. S. Chron. an. 1135. - O. F. pais, later paix, 'peace;' Cot. = Lat. pacem, acc. of pax, peace, orig. a compact made between two contending parties. = Lat. pac-, seen in pac-isci, to make a bargain, and in O. Lat. pac-re, to bind, to come to an agreement. - VPAK, to fasten; see Pact. Der. peace !, interj.; peace-able, Much Ado, iii. 3. 61; peace-abl-y, peace-able-ness; peace-ful, K. John, ii. 340, peace-ful-ly, peace-ful-ness, peace-maker, As You Like It, v. 4. 108; peace-offering, peace-officer. Also ap-pease, pay (1), paci-fy. PEACH (1), a delicious fruit. (F., -L., - Pers.) 'Of Peaches; Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 7. - M. E. peche, peshe, Prompt. Parv. p. 395; where it is also spelt peske, a form due to Low Lat. pesca. O. F. pesche, 'a peach;' Cot. Cf. Port. pêcego, Ital. persica, shorter form pesca, a peach. - Lat. Persicum, a peach, Pliny, xv. 11. 11; so called because growing on the Persicus or peach-tree; where Persicus stands for Persica arbor, the Persian tree. - Pers. Pars, Persia. See Parsee. Der. peach-coloured, peach-tree.

PEACH (2), to inform against. (F.,-L.) From M. E. apechen, by loss of a; see Impeach.

PEACOCK, a large gallinaceous bird with splendid plumage.

(Hybrid; L.,-Gk.,-Pers.,-Tamil; and E.) M. E. pecok, but also pacok and pocok. In P. Plowman, B. xii. 241, where the text has pekok, two other MSS. have pokok, pacok. In Chaucer, C.T. 104, the MSS. have pekok, pokok. We also find po used alone, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 159. The form pekok is due to pakok; and both pa-, po-, are from A. S. pawe, a peacock, which is not a true E. word, but borrowed from Lat. pawo. 'Pawo, Pawus, pawe;' Ælfric's Gloss., Nomina Avium, in Wright's Vocab. i. 28. Here pawe is meant to be the A.S. form, whilst pauo, pauus, are Lat. forms. From Lat. pauo come also Du. pauuw, G. pfau, F. paon, &c. β. The Lat. word is not a native one, but borrowed from Gk. raws, raws, where the aspirate is a relic of the digamma, from a form $\tau a F \hat{\omega} \epsilon$. See Liddell and Scott, and Curtius, ii. 101. The curious change from initial t to p indicates that both words are from a foreign source. –

Pers. túwns, túus, Arab. túwús, a peacock; Rich. Dict., p. 962. – O.

Tamil tókei, túgei, a peacock; Max Müller, Lect. i. 233.

7. The latter element of the word is E. cock, a native word of onomatopoetic ¶ The suggestion, s. v. Cock, that the word is French, is wrong; it occurs in A.S. much earlier than I thought, viz. in Ælfred, fr. of Gregory's Pastoral, ed. Sweet, p. 459. Der. pea-hen, similarly formed; M. E. pehen, pohen, P. Plowman, B. xii. 240.

PEA-JACKET, a coarse thick jacket often worn by seamen.

(Hybrid; Du. and F.) Prob. of modern introduction. The latter element is the ordinary word jacket. The former element is spelt so as to resemble pea, a vegetable, with which it has nothing to do. It is borrowed from Du. pij, pije, a coat of a coarse woollen stuff; the word jacket being a needless explanatory addition. 'Een pije, a pie gowne, or a rough gowne, as souldiers and seamen weare; Hexham, 1658. As the Du. pij is pronounced like E. pie, it should rather be called a pie-jacket, as the form pie-gowne suggests. The material of which the jacket is made is called pij-laken, where laken is cloth. β. The Du. pije is the same word as Low G. pije, a woollen jacket, called pigge, pyke in the Osnabrück dialect (Bremen Wörterbuch). Rietz gives the form pade, a coat, of which he considers the forms paje, paja, paj-rokk (rokk is a coat), pait, all found in various Swedish dialects, to be variants. If we are to connect all these, we may also compare Goth. paida, used to translate Gk. xirtur, a coat, Matt. v. 40; also M. H. G. pfeit, a shirt, and even perhaps Gk. Bairn, a shepherd's or peasant's coat of skins. It is remarkable that we even find W. pais, Com. peis, in the sense of coat. ¶ Cf. M. E. courtepy (short coat), Chaucer, C. T. 292. PEAK, a sharp point, top. (C.) M. E. pek; 'the hul of the pek' = the hill of the Peak, in Derbyshire; Rob. of Glouc. p. 7. In the A. S. Chron. an. 924, the same district is called Peac-lond = Peak-land. Though the hill is flat at the top, it presents a remarkably peacked appearance from many points of view. It is one of the peaked appearance from many points of view. It is one of the Celtic words so often met with in English place-names. - Irish peac, any sharp pointed thing, whence peacack, sharp-pointed, neat, showy.

Nares. Shak. has peas-cod = pea-pod, Mids. Nt. Dr. iii. 1. 191; and peak-ed, not quite the same word as M. E. piked (Prompt. Parv.) otherwise only the form pease. We also find pescodes in Lydgate, though used in the same sense; the M. E. form answers rather to mod. E. pike, sb., with the suffix -ed added. Also (probably) peak verb, to become thin, dwindle, Macb. i. 3. 23. Cf. peeked, thin, Dorsetshire (Halliwell).

PEAL, a loud sound, summons, chime of bells, sound of a rumpet. (F., -L.) 'A peale of gunnes, &c.;' Levins. The same trumpet. (F.,-L.) phrase occurs in a tract dated 1532, in An English Garner, ed. Arber, vol. ii. p. 36. 'Peele of belles;' Palsgrave. A shortened form of appeal, by loss of the first syllable, which in the O. F. apel was a sole vowel, and may have been mistaken for the E. indef. article, just as we now use vow where the M. E. form is commonly avow. We speak of a trumpet's peal; compare this with F. appel, a call with drum or trumpet (Hamilton). β. Besides the form apel, mod. F. appel, there was a later derived form appeau, now used in the sense of 'bird-call' (Hamilton). Cotgrave has: 'Appeau, as Appel, also a bird-call; Appeaux, chimes, or the chiming of bells.' This at once explains our common use of the phrase 'a peal of bells.' Note also M. E. apel, 'an old term in hunting music, consisting of three long moots;' Halliwell. This etymology is noticed by Minsheu, ed. 1627; he has: 'a peal of bells, from the F. appeller, i. e. vocare.' See Ap-Der. peal, verb.

It is best to collect the forms; we find Ital., Span., Prov. perla, Port. perola, sometimes perla; also A. S. pærl, in Ælfric's Glossary (Lye); O.H. G. perala, perla, berala, berla (according to Diez). All prob. from Low Lat. perula, found in Isidore of Seville, in the 7th century y. Diez explains perula to stand for pirula, a little (Brachet). pear, from pirum, a pear; the change of vowel is seen again in Ital. pera, a pear. See Pear. This is perhaps the best solution; for, though the change of sense is curious, it may easily have been suggested by the use of the Lat. bacca, which meant (1) a berry, (2) an olive-berry, (3) any round fruit growing on a tree, (4) a pearl (Horace, Epod. viii. 14). Diez also draws attention to Span. perilla, (1) a little pear, (2) a pear-shaped ornament. Perhaps we may add O. Ital. perolo, 'a little button or tassell of wooll on the top and middle of a knit cap;' Florio. And observe the sense of 'berry' which Cotgrave assigns to F. perle. appears to be that also due to Diez, viz. from Lat. pilula, a little ball, globule, pill, with change of the first l to r. Der. pearl-y, pearl-i-ness; pearl-ash, a purer carbonate of potash, named from its pearly colour;

PEASANT, a countryman. (F., -L.) The t is excrescent, as in ancien-t, tyran-t, but it occurs in O.F. In Gascoigne, Steele Glas, l. 647. -O.F. paisant, 'a peasant, boor;' Cot. Mod. PEAT, a vegetable substance like turf, found in boggy places, and used as fuel. (E.) 'There other with their spades the peats are squaring out;' Drayton, Polyolbion, s. 25. 'Turf and peat... are cheape fuels;' Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 774. The true form is beat, as in Devonshire; the change from b to p is very unusual, but we have it again in purse from F. bourse; see Purse. 'Beat, the roots and soil subjected to the operation of burning beat, which answers to the paring and burning, or more technically, sod-burning, of other districts;' ing and burning, or more technically, sod-burning, of other districts; Marshall's Rural Economy of West Devonshire, 1796 (E. D. S., Gloss, B. 6). Marshall also gives beating-axe as the name of the implement used for paring the sods, but wrongly connects it with the verb to beat, with which it has nothing to do. The operation was so common in Devonshire that 'to Devonshire ground' or 'to

Der. bétan pær-inne mycel fýr' = he then caused men to make up therein a great fire; Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, b. vi. c. xxxii. § 2. Formed (by usual vowel-change from o to e) from A.S. bot, advantage; see Boot (2). See further in Wedgwood, who cites from Boucher, s. v. beate-burning, a passage from Carew about 'turfes which they call beating,' i. e. fuel; also 'betting, pared sods,' from Lewis's Herefordshire Glossary, &c. And see beit in Jamieson.

PEBBLE, a small round stone. (E.) In Shak. Cor. v. 3. 58; a pebble-stone, Two Gent. ii. 3. 11. M. E. pobble, Allit. Poems, ed. pebble-stone, Two Gent. ii. 3. 11. M.E. pobble, Allit. Poems, ed. B. Prob. named from its roundness; cf. Lat. papula, a pustule, papilla, a little pustule, nipple of a teat. rose-bud; Gk. πομφός, a bubble, πέμφιξ, a bubble, a blister. - & PAP, to swell up; nasalised in Lithuan. pampti, to swell, puff up; cf. Skt. pupputa, a swelling at the palate. \P The difficulty in this etymology is in the preservation of the Aryan p in A. S.; but all Teutonic words beginning with p present unusual difficulties. The A.S. papol may have been borrowed from Lat. papula as far as its form is concerned, but the sense hints at its being a survival of something older. Der. pebbl-y, pebbl-ed.

PECCABLE, liable to sin. (L.) Rare; Rich. gives quotations for peccable and peccability from Cudworth, Intellectual System (first ed. 1678, also 1743, 1820, 1837, 1845), pp. 564, 565. Englished from Lat. peccabilis*, a coined word from peccare, to sin. Der.

peccability. See Peccant.

PECCADILLO, a slight offence, small sin. (Span., -L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - Span. pecadillo, a slight fault, dimin. of pecado, a sin. — Lat. peccatum, a sin; orig. neut. of peccatus, pp. of peccare, to sin. See Peccant.

PECCANT, sinning. (F., -L.) First used in the phrase 'peccant humours; Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ed. Wright, p. 37, l. 32, p. 43, l. 28. - F. peccant, 'sinning; l'humeur peccante, the corrupt humour in the body; Cot. = Lat. peccant., stem of pres. part. of peccare, to sin.

β. Etymology doubtful: Cicero (Parad. iii. 1. 20) says peccare est tanquam transilire lineas,' like our transgress or trespass. It has been suggested that it may stand for pedicare, from pedica, a clog, fetter, shackle, like our phrase 'to put one's foot in it.' If there be any truth in this, the etymology is from ped-, stem of pes, a foot;

pec Foot. Der, peccant-ly, peccanc-y; and see pecc-adello, PECCARY, a hog-like quadruped of S. America. (F., -S. American.) In a tr. of Buffon, Nat. 'It is not improbable that the pecari has been so called by Buffon from pachira, which is the name given to this quadruped in Oronoko; Clavigero's Hist. of Mexico, tr. by Cullen, 1787, ii. 319. It is also called, in different parts of America, saino, cojametl, and tatabro (id.).

PECK (1), to strike with something pointed, to snap up. (Scand., -C.) A mere variant of pick. In Chaucer, C. T. 14973 (Six-text, B. 4157) we have: 'Pikke hem right as they growe,' where most MSS. have Pekke or Pek. Pick is the older form; see Pick. similar vowel-change appears in Corn. peg, a prick, answering to W.

pig, a pike, point, also a nip. And some Swed dialects have pekka for pikka. Der. pecker, wood-pecker.

PECK (2), a dry measure, two gallons. (Scand., -C.) M. E. pekke, Chaucer, C. T. 4008. The word is somewhat obscure, but it is probably a mere derivative of peck, to snap up. As in the case of most measures, the quantity was once quite indefinite, and prov. E. peck merely means 'a quantity;' we still talk of 'a peck of troubles.' In particular, it was a quantity for eating; cf. prov. E. peck, meat, victuals, from the prov. E. verb peck, to eat. 'We must scrat before we peck,' i. e. scratch (work) before we eat; Halliwell. Hence slang E. peg away, i. e. peck away, eat quickly, or drive hard; pecker, appetite. β. We do indeed find Irish peac, Gael. peic, a peck; but there is a suspicion that these are rather borrowed from E. than the orig. Celtic words. Y. Similarly Scheler derives picotin, a peck, a measure, from the verb picoter, to peck as a bird does; and picoter is itself a mere extension from the Celtic root appearing also in E. peck

PECTINAL, comb-like, applied to fish with bones like the teeth of a comb. (L.) Sir T. Browne speaks of pectinals, i. e. pectinal fish; Vulg. Errors, b. iv. c. 1, last section. Coined from Lat. pectin-, stem of pecten, a comb. — Lat. pectere, to comb. + Gk. πεντείν, to comb; lengthened form from πένειν, to comb, to card wool, to shear.

β. From PAK, to pluck, pull hair, comb; preserved also in Lithuanian pesz-ti, to pluck, pull hair. From the same root is A. S. fæx, a head of hair, whence Fairfax, i. e. fair hair. And see Fight.

Perhaps allied to Skt. paksha, in the sense of flank or side. Der. pectoral-ly, ex-pector-ate.

PECULATE, to pilfer, steal. (Lat.) 'Peculator, that robs the prince or common treasure; Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - Lat. peculatus, pp. of peculari, to appropriate to one's own use. Formed as if from peculum *, with the same sense as peculium, private property, and allied to pecū-nia, property; see Peculiar, Pecuniary. Der. peculat-ion, peculat-or.

PECULIAR, appropriated, one's own, particular. (F., -L.) In Levins; and in Shak. Oth. i. 1. 60. - F. peculier, 'peculiar;' Cot. -Lat. peculiaris, relating to property, one's own. - Lat. peculium, property; allied to pecunia, property, money, from which it merely differs in the suffix. See Pecuniary. Der. peculiar-ly, peculiar-i-ty.

PECUNIARY, relating to property or money. (F., -L.) Spelt pecuniarie in Minsheu, cd. 1627. - F. pecuniaire, pecuniary; Cot. -Lat. pecuniarius, belonging to property. - Lat. pecunia, property. β. Formed with Aryan suffixes -na and -ya from pecu-, as appearing in pl. pecu-a, cattle of all kinds, sheep, money; the wealth of ancient times consisting in cattle. + Skt. paçu, cattle; lit. that which is fastened up, hence cattle possessed and controlled by men. -✓ PAK, to fasten; cf. Skt. pac, to fasten; and see Fee. pecuniari-ly.

PEDAGOGUE, a teacher, pedant. (F., -L., -Gk.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. - F. pedagogue, 'a schoolmaster, teacher, pedant;' Cot. - Lat. pædagogus, a preceptor. - Gk. παιδαγωγώs, at Athens, a slave who led a boy to school, hence, a tutor, instructor. - Gk. παιδ-, stem of παιε, a boy; and άγωγόε, leading, guiding, from άγειν, to β. The Gk. παι is for παfis, i. e. pau-is, from a probable ✓ PU, to beget, whence numerous derivatives, such as Lat. pu-er, a boy, Skt. pu-tra, a son, Gk. πω-λου, a foal, and E. Foal, q.v. The Gk. άγειν, to lead, is cognate with Lat. agere, whence E. Agent, q.v. Der. pedagog-ic; pedagog-y, O. F. pedagogie (Cot.).

PEDAL, belonging to the foot. (L.) 'Pedal, of a foot, measure or space; 'Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. 'Pedalls, or low keyes, of organs; 'Sherwood, index to Cotgrave. Now chiefly used as a sb., as the pedal of an organ, i.e. a key acted on by the foot. - Lat. pedalis, (1) belonging to a foot, (2) belonging to a foot-measure (whence the old use, as in Blount). — Lat. ped., stem of pes, a foot; cognate with E. Foot, q. v.

PEDANT, a schoolmaster, vain displayer of learning. (F.,-Ital., - Gk.?) In Shak, L. L. L. iii, 179. - F. pedant, 'a pedant, or ordinary schoolmaster;' Cot. Borrowed from Italian (Littré). -Ital. pedante, 'a pedante, or a schoolemaster, the same as pedagogo;' β. Pedante is a pres. participial form as if from a verb Florio. pedare*, which, as Diez suggests, is probably not the O. Ital. pedare, to foote it, to tracke, to trace, to tread or trample with one's feete (Florio), but an accommodation of the Gk. παιδεύειν, to instruct, from mail, stem of mais, a boy. See Pedagogue. Diez cites from Varchi (Ercol., p. 60, ed. 1570), a passage in Italian, to the effect that 'when I was young, those who had the care of children, teaching them and taking them about, were not called as at present pedanti nor by the Greek name pedagogi, but by the more horrible name of ripititori' [ushers]. γ . If this etymology be not approved, we may perhaps fall back upon the verb pedare in Florio, as if a pedant meant one who tramps about with children at his heels.' This is, of course, from Lat ped-, stem of pes, a foot, cognate with PEDDLE, to deal in small wares, (Scand.?) Bp. Hall contrasts 'pedling barbarismes' with 'classick tongues;' Satires, bk. ii [not iii]. sat. 3, l. 25. Here pedling means 'petty,' from the verb peddle or pedle, to deal in small wares; a verb merely coined from the collection of the children of dealer in small wares; which was in much earlier. the sb. pedlar, a dealer in small wares, which was in much earlier use. See Pedlar. Der. piddle, to trifle, q.v.

PEDESTAL, the foot or base of a pillar. (Span., - Ital., - L. and G.) Spelt predestall in Minsheu, ed. 1627.—Span, pedestal, 'the base or foot of a pillar,' Minsheu. Cf. O. F. pied-stal in Cotgrave. As the Span. for 'foot' is pie, it is not a Span. word, but borrowed wholly from Ital. piedestallo, 'a footstall or a treshall [threshold] of a doore; 'Florio.

B. A clumsy hybrid compound; from Ital. piede, 'a foote, a base, a footstall or foundation of anything' (Florio), which from Lat. pedem, acc. of pes, a foot; and Ital. stallo, a stable, a stall, from G. stall, a stable, stall, cognate with E. stall. See Foot and Stall.

George Footstall (G. fussgestell) is a better word.

PEDESTRIAN, going on foot; an expert walker. (L.) Properly an adj. Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, gives the form pedestrial.

Both pedestrian and pedestrial are coined words, from Lat. pedestria. crude form of pedester, one who goes on foot. Formed, it is supposed, Der. Hence also pectin-ate, pectin-at-ed; and see paxwax.

PECTORAL, belonging to the breast or chest. (F., - L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. - F. pectoral, 'pectoral; 'Cot. - Lat. pectoralis, of pes, a foot; and it-um, supine of ire, to go, from $\sqrt{1}$, to go. Cf. Pedicle is the better word, as used by Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 592. - O. F. pedicule, 'the staulk of a leafe, or of fruit;' Cot. - Lat. pediculum, acc. of pediculus, a little foot, foot-stalk, pedicle. Double dimin. from pedi-, crude form of pes, cognate with E. foot. See PEDIGREE, a register of descent, lineage, genealogy. (F.?) In Shak. Hen. V, ii. 4. 90. Spelt pedegree in Minsheu (1627); pedigrew in Levins (1570); petygrewe in Palsgrave (1530). In the Prompt. Parv., A.D. 1440, we find the spellings pedegru, pedegru, pedgru, pedgru, pedgrue, petygrue, and it is explained by 'lyne of kynrede and awncetrye, Stemma, in scalis. In the Appendix to Hearne's ed. of Rob. of Gloucester, p. 585, he cites from a MS. of Rob. of Glouc. in the Herald's Office, a piece which begins: 'A petegren, fro William Conquerour . . vn-to kyng Henry the vi.' The last circumstance mentioned belongs to A.D. 1431, so that the date is about the same as that of the Prompt. Parv. Wedgwood cites from the Rolls of Winchester College, temp. Henry IV, printed in Proceedings of the Archæological Institute, 1848, p. 64, a passage relating to the expenses 'Stephani Austinwell . ad loquendum . . de evidenciis scrutandis de pe de gre progenitorum hæredum de Husey.' This, being in a Latin document, is not much to be relied on for spelling, but it appears to be the earliest trace of the word at present known. Thus the word does not appear till the 15th century.

β. Etymology unknown; but we may feel sure it is French. The numerous guesses, par degrees (Mahn), pied and gré, père and degré, petendo gradus, &c., are all utterly unsatisfactory. The evidence certainly points to something different from F. gré and Lat. gradus, or we should not have the forms gru and grewe in the Prompt. Parv. γ. I merely add the guess that there may be a reference to F. grue, a crane. Danser la grue meant to hop or stand on one leg only (Cotgrave), in allusion to the crane's frequently resting on a single leg; and there is a proverbial phrase à pied de grue, 'in suspence, on doubtfull tearms, or not wel, or but halfe, setled, like a crane that stands but upon one leg;' Cot. Thus a pedigree would be so named, in derision, from its doubtfulness; or from the cranes' legs (single upright stalks) used in drawing out a predigree.

8. Wedgwood (in N. and Q. 6 S. i. 309) gives pied the sense of 'tree;' so that pied de gres is 'tree of degrees.' Cf. F. pied-bornier, 'a tree that serves to divide severall tenements;' Cot. PEDIMENT, an ornament finishing the front of a building. (L.)

'Fronton, in architecture, a member that serves to compose an ornament, raised over cross-works, doors, niches, &c., sometimes making a triangle, and sometimes part of a circle; it is otherwise called a pediment, and fastigium by Vitruvius; Phillips, ed. 1706. I cannot trace the history of the word, and the dictionaries make no attempt to explain it. Mahn, in Webster, derives it from pes, a foot; which is but a poor account. The form of the word is clearly Latin; but there is no such word as pedimentum. I can only suppose that the orig. word is pedamentum, a stake or prop, with which trees and vines are supported; formed with suffix -mentum from pedare, to prop, from ped-, stem of pes, a foot; see Foot. The spelling pediment for pedament would naturally be brought about by confusion with the common word impediment.

B. This etymology is, as to the form, probably right; as to the reason of the use of the word, I can only guess that pedamentum was used as an equivalent to pedatura. Pedatura not only means a prop or 'pedament,' but in Low Lat. had the sense of a certain space, containing a certain number of feet, in which anything could be put, a site or plot (Ducange). And a pediment does, in fact, enclose a space which was often ornamented with sculpture. More light is desired as to the word's history.

PEDLAR, PEDLER, PEDDLER, a hawker, one who travels about selling small wares. (Scand.?) The verb to peddle, to sell small wares, is later, and a mere derivative from the sb. We find pedler in Cotgrave, to explain F. mercerot, and pedlar in Sherwood's index. But the older form was peddar or pedder, appearing as late as in Levins, ed. 1570; although, on the other hand, pedlere occurs as early as in P. Plowman, B. v. 258. 'Peddare, calatharius [basket-maker], piscarius' [one who sells fish hawked about in baskets]; Prompt. Parv.; formed from pedde, explained by 'panere,' i. e. a pannier; id. See Way's excellent illustrative note. The Prompt. Parv. also gives: 'Pedlare, shapmann,' i.e. chapman. hawker. β . As Way remarks, in the Eastern counties, a pannier for carrying provisions to market, esp. fish, is called a ped; 'the market in Norwich, where wares brought in from the country are exposed for sale, being known as the ped-market; and a dealer who transports his com-es (stem com-it-), a companion, one who 'goes with' another. It to a dimin. form peddle, i. e. little 'ped,' which is not recorded. The Lat. pes is cognate with E. foot; see Foot. Der. pedestrian-ism.

PEDICEL, PEDICLE, the foot-stalk by which a leaf or fruit is joined on to a tree. (F., -L.) Pedicel is modern, from mod. F. And see Lowland Sc. peddir, a pediar (Jamieson). Y. Origin unknown; but presumably Scand., as peddir is found in Scotch, and Pedicel is the better word as used by Boco. Not this the sea. unknown; but presumably Scand., as peddir is found in Scotch, and ped or pad in Norfolk. Cf. 'A haske is a wicker pad, wherein they vse to cary fish;' Gloss by E. Kirke to Spenser, Shep. Kal. November, I. 16. Still, the word ped, or pad, a basket, is no longer to be traced in Scandinavian; and the word pad, in the sense of cushion, is almost as obscure. See Pad. Der. peddle, vb., q.v. PEDOBAPTISM, infant baptism. (Gk.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. A coined word, as if from Lat. pædobaptismus*, Latinised form of Gk. παιδοβαπτισμός; from παιδο-, crude form of παίε, a boy; and βαπτισμόε, baptism. See Pedagogue and Baptism. Der.

PEEL (1), to strip off the skin or bark. (F.,-L.) In Shak. Merch. Ven. i. 3. 85. [Two F. verbs are mixed up here, viz. F. peler and F. piller. It is true that peler and piller are now well distinguished in French, the former meaning 'to peel, strip,' and the latter 'to plunder,' a sense preserved in E. pillage. But in O. F. they were sometimes confused, and the same confusion appears in M. E. pilien, pillen, used in the sense of 'peel.' 'Rushes to pille' = to peel rushes, P. Plowman, C. x. 81; pilled = bald, Chaucer, C. T. 3993. A clear case is in Palsgrave, who has: 'I pyll rysshes, Ie pille des ionez.' For further remarks on pill, see Pillage.] We may consider peel, in the present place, as if due to peler only. - F. peler, 'to pill, pare, bark, unrind, unskin;' Cot. Cf. Span, pelar, Ital. pelare, to strip, peel, O. Ital. pellare, 'to vnskin,' Florio.—Lat. pellis, skin; see Fell (2). ¶ But some senses of F. peler are due to Lat. pilare, to deprive of hair, make bald.—Lat. pilus, hair. Dor. peel-ed;

PEEL (2), to pillage. (F.,-L.) 'Peeling their provinces,' i. e. robbing them; Milton, P.L. iv. 136. This is not the same word as the above, but another spelling of the old verb pill (F. piller), to rob. See Pillage, and see remarks under Peel (1).

PEEL (3), a fire-shovel. (F., -L.) Once a common word; see Halliwell. 'Pele for an ouyn, pelle a four;' Palsgrave. -F. pelle, older form pale, 'a fire-shovell,' Cot. -Lat. pāla, a spade, shovel, peel. Root uncertain; but prob. $p\bar{a} = pag$, to fasten, plant, as in Lat. pangere; whence pāla, the instrument used in planting. Der. palette. PEEP (1), to chirp, or cry like a chicken. (F., - L.) In Isaiah, viii. 19, x. 14; see Bible Wordbook. M. E. pipen, to peep, chirp, Owl and Nightingale, 503. Certainly a purely imitative word, but it seems nevertheless to have been borrowed from F. On the confusion between the sounds denoted by the E. ee in the 16th century, see remarks in Palsgrave, cited by Ellis, Early Eng. Pron. i. 77. Palsgrave says that the mod. bear and bier were both spelt beere in his time. Thus E. peep may answer either to O. F. pepier or to F. piper; the M.E. pipen, however, is solely the latter. O. F. pepier or to F. to peep, cheep, or pule, as a young bird in the neast, Cot.; piper, to whistle, or chirp, like a bird, id.; cf. pipée, the peeping or chirping of small birds, id.—I.at. pipare, pipire, to peep, chirp. Of imitative origin; due to repetition of the syllable PI. Cf. Gk. πιπίζειν, πιππίζειν, to chirp. See Pipe, Pule.

PEEP (2), to look out (or in) through a narrow aperture, to look silly. (F., = L.) 'Where dawning day doth never peepe;' Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 39. 'To peepe, inspicere;' Levins, ed. 1570. The etymology offers great difficulties; but nearly all writers think it must be connected with the word above, as no other solution seems possible, the word being unknown in M.E.; whereas M.E. pipen, to peep chirp. occurs in the Owl and Nightingale, 503.

B. The to peep, chirp, occurs in the Owl and Nightingale, 503.

B. The explanations hitherto offered are very forced; Richardson suggests that the verb was 'transferred from the sound which chickens make upon the first breaking of the shell to the look accompanying it!' Wedgwood says: 'When we endeavour to sound the highest notes in our voice we strain for a moment without effect until after an effort a thin, sharp sound makes its way through the constricted passages, affording a familiar image of a hidden force struggling through obstructions into life; as the sprouting of a bud through the bursting envelopes, or the light of day piercing through the shades of night. Hence may be explained Dan. at pippe frem (of a bud or seed), to shoot, or peep forth, and the O. E. [M. E.] day-pipe, rendered by Palsgrave la pipe du jour. We now call it the peep of day, with total unconsciousness of the original image. In the same way Du. kriecke, krieckeling, the day spring or creak of day, from kricken, F. cricquer, to creak. "I peke or prie, je pipe hors" [I peep out]; Palsgrave.'

y. It is far simpler to derive E. peep at once from O.F. priper, formerly used, as the above happy quotation shows, in the phrase piper kors, to peep out, to pry. How the F. piper came to be used in that sense will appear at once if we refer the verb. not wares in such a manner is termed a pedder.' Probably peddar is due to the bird, but to the fowler who lies in wait for him, which was, in

also to cousen, deceive, cheat, gull, overreach, beguile, esp. by false cards or dice; 'Cot. 'Pipée, the peeping or chirping of small birds, counterfeited by a bird-catcher; also, a counterfeit shew, false countenance,' &c.; id. 'Pipe, a bird-call, or little wooden pipe, wherewith fowlers do counterfeit the voices of the birds they would take; 'id. Now at p. 212 of Lacroix (Manners, Customs, and Dress during the Middle Ages) there is an excellent illustration of 'bird-piping, or the manner of catching birds by piping,' being a of 'bird-piping, or the manner or catching pirus by piping, being a fac-simile of a miniature in a MS. of the 14th century. The picture shews a man, nearly concealed within a bush, attracting wild birds by means of a pipe, He is piping and peeping out at once. I think we may therefore explain piper as meaning to act like a bird-catcher, to pipe, to peep, to beguile. The sense 'to beguile' is still common; see Littré. The above explanation shews why it is that to peep in the property to look out but to look out either to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out to look out plies not merely to look out, but to look out slily, to look out so as not to be seen, 'to look as through a crevice, or by stealth' (Schmidt, Shakespeare-Lexicon). 'Why pry'st thou through my window? leave thy peeping;' Lucrece, 1089. See further under Peep (1). Der. by-peep, Cymb. i. 6. 108; peep-bo. serves to be added that the use of the E. verb may have been further influenced by that of the old verb to peak, used in much the same sense. The quotation 'I peke or prie' has been given above, from Palsgrave. Cf. 'To peake into a place, inspicere;' Levins. This is the M. E. piken; 'Cam nere, and gan in at the curtein pike' = came near, and peeped in at the curtain, Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 60; appa-near, and peeped in at the curtain, Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 60; apparently borrowed from F. piquer, to pierce, hence (metaphorically) to poke one's nose into a thing. See Pique, Pick, Peck.

PEER (1), an equal, a nobleman. (F., - L.) The orig. sense is 'equal;' the twelve peers of France were so called because of equal rank. M. E. pere, Chaucer, C. T. 10990 [not 11119]; per, Havelok, 2241. - O. F. per, peer, later pair, 'a peer, a paragon, also a match, fellow, companion;' Cot.; or, as an adj., 'like, equall.' id. Cf. Span. par, equal, also a peer; Ital. pare, pari, alike, pari, a peer. - Lat. parem, acc. of par, equal. See Par, Pair. Der. peer-ess, a late word, with fem. suffix -ess, of F. origin, Pope, Moral Essays, ii. 70. iii. 140: beer-are, used by Dryden (Todd: no reference). in place 70, iii. 140; peer-age, used by Dryden (Todd; no reference), in place of the older word peer-dom, used by Cotgrave to translate F. pairie; also peer-less, Temp. iii. 1, 47; peer-less-ly, peer-less-ness.

PEER (2), to look narrowly, to pry. (0. Low G.)

maps for ports; Merch. Vcn. i. 1. 19. M. E. piren. 'Peering in 'Right so doth he, whan that he pireth And toteth on her womanhede does he, when he peers and looks upon her womanhood; Gower, C. A. iii. 29, 1. 4. 'And preuylich pirith till be dame passe' = and A. II. 29, 1.4. And prelyinch privity the fed dame passe = and privily peers, or spies, till the mother-bird leaves the nest; Rich. Redeles, ed. Skeat, iii. 48, - Low G. piren, to look closely, a form in which l has been lost; it is also spelt pliren, plüren; see Bremen Wörterbuch. For the loss of l, cf. Patch. + Swed. plira, to blink; Dan. plire, to blink. The orig. sense of Low G. pluren is to draw the eyelids together, in order to look closely. See Blear-eyed. And see Peer (3). Doublet, pry.

PEER (3), to appear. (F., -L.) Distinct from the word above, though prob. sometimes confused with it. It is merely short for appear. M. E. peren, short for appear. 'There was I bidde, in payn of deth, to pere; 'Court of Love (late 1 5th cent.), l. 55. Cf. 'When daffodils begin to peer;' Shak. Wint. Ta. iv. 3. 1. As the M. E. aperen was frequently spelt with one p, the prefix a- easily dropped off, as in the case of peal for appeal; see Peal. See further under Appear.

In F. the simple verb paroir (Lat. parere) was used in a similar way. in a similar way. 'Paroir, to appear, to peep out, as the day in a morning, or the sun over a mountain;' Cot.

peyuesshe in P. Plowman, C. ix. 151, where four MSS. have peuysche; the sense being 'ill-natured.' It occurs also in G. Douglas, tr. of Virgil, Æn. xi. 408 (Lat. text), where we find: 'Sik ane peuych and catyve saule as thine' = such a perverse and wretched soul as thine. And again, in the same, Æn. vi. 301, where the Lat. 'Sordidus ex humeris nodo dependet amictus' is translated by: 'Hys smottrit habyt, owr his schulderis lydder Hang pevagely knyt with a knot togidder,' where it seems to mean 'uncouthly.' And yet again, Aruns is called 'thys pewech man of weyr' [war], where it answers to Lat, improbus; Æn. xi. 767. Ray, in his North-country Words, ed. 1691, gives: 'Peevish, witty, subtil.' Florio explains schifezza by 'coynes, quaintnes, peeuishnes, fondnes, frowardnes.' Peevish in Shak. is silly, childish, thoughtless, forward. Peevishnesse = way-werdness. wardness, Spenser, F. Q. vi. 7. 37. Thus the various senses are childish, silly, wayward, froward, uncouth, ill-natured, perverse, and even witty. All of these may be reduced to the sense of 'childish,' the sense of witty being equivalent to that of forward, the child being toward instead of froward. β. A difficult and obscure word; but prob. of onomatopoetic origin, from the noise made by fretful child. K. John, ii. 406. — O. F. peste-meste (mod. F. pête-mête), 'pell-mell, fact, a common use of it. 'Piper, to whistle, or chirp, like a bird; dren. The origin appears, perhaps, in Lowland Sc. peu, to make a also to cousen, deceive, cheat, gull, overreach, beguile, esp. by false plaintive noise, used in the Complaint of Scotland, ed. Murray, i. 39, to denote the plaintive cry of young birds: 'the chekyns [chickens] began to peu.' Wedgwood cites Dan. dial. piæve, to whimper or cry like a child; not given in Aasen. Cf. F. pianter, 'to peep or cheep as a young bird, also to pule, or howle as a young whelp;' Cot. Cf. also Peep (1) and Pewit. In this view, the suffix isk has the not uncommon force of given to, as in thiev-ish, mop-ish. Similarly, from Gael. piug, a plaintive note, we have piugach, having a querulous voice, mean-looking. Der. peevish-ly, -ness. PEEWIT, another spelling of Pewit. (E.)

PEG, a wooden pin for fastening boards, &c. (Scand., -C.) M. E. pegge; Pegge, or pynne of tymbyr; Prompt. Parv. The nearest form is Dan. pig (pl. pigge), a pike, a spike, a weakened form of pik, a pike, peak; so also Swed. pigg, a prick, spike, from pik, a pike. (For the vowel-change, cf. Corn. peg, a prick.)

B. These are words of Celtic origin; cf. W. pig, a point, pike, peak; and see Peck, Peak, Rike. Der. peg, verb, Temp. i. 2. 295; pegg-ed.

PELF, lucre, spoil, booty. (F., = L.?) 'But all his minde is set on mucky pelfe;' Spenser, F. Q. iii. 9. 4. M. E. pelfyr, pelfrey. 'Spolium;' Prompt. Parv. Pelf, to rob. occurs as a verb, Cursor Mundi, l. 6149. = O. F. pelfre, booty, allied to pelfrer, to pilfer (Burry). guy).

B. Of unknown origin; Roquefort gives O. F. pilfer, pilfeir, to rob, plunder, which Mahn (in Webster) derives from Lapilare, to rob, and facere, to make. This derivation from two verbs is not satisfactory; yet it is highly probable that, at any rate, the first syllable of pelfrer is connected with F. and E. pillage. The difficulty is to explain the latter part of the word. \(\gamma\). Pelf and pilfer are obviously related; but it is not clear which is the older word. See Pilfer.

PELICAN, a large water-fowl. (F., -L., -Gk.) In Hamlet, iv. 5. 146. Spelt pellican, Ancren Riwle, p. 118. – F. pelican, 'a pellican;' Cot. – Lat. pēlicanus, pēlēcanus. – Gk. πελεκάν (gen. πελεκάνος), πελεκάs, πελέκαs, strictly, the wood pecker, the joiner-bird of Aristophanes, Av. 884, 1155; also a water-bird of the pelican kind. The wood-pecker was so called from its pecking; and the pelican from its large bill. - Gk. πελεκάω, I hew with an axe, peck. - Gk. πέλεκυς, an axe, hatchet. + Skt. paragu, an axe, hatchet, paraguada, an axe.

PELISSE, a silk habit, worn by ladies. (F., -L.) Formerly a furred robe. Of late introduction; added by Todd to Johnson. furred robe. Of late introduction; added by Todd to Johnson. Der. sur-plice. Doublet, pilch.

PARITORY, a wild flower that grows on PELLITORY (1), PARITORY, a wild flower that grows on walls. (F., -I.) Often called pellitory of the wall, a tautological expression. Pellitory stands for paritory, by the common change of r to I. M. E. paritorie, Chaucer, C. T. 16049. - O. F. paritoire, 'pellitory of the wall; Cot. - Lat. parietaria, pellitory; properly fem. of adj. parietarius, belonging to walls. - Lat. pariet-, stem of paries, a wall. β. Perhaps paries = that which goes round, from par- = Gk.

reof = Skt. pari, around, and \(\sqrt{1}, to go \) (whence Lat. i-re).

PELLITORY (2), PELLETER, the plant pyrethrum.

(Span., - L., - Gk.) Sometimes called pelleter of Spain, because it grows there (Prior). It is the Anacyclus pyrethrum, the name of which has been assimilated to that of the plant above, which was earlier known. On account of this it is called by Cotgrave 'bastard pellitory, or right pellitory of Spain; but the name is not from O. F. pirette (Cot.), but from Span. pelitre, pellitory of Spain. — Lat. pyrethrum. - Gk. πύρεθρον, a hot spicy plant, feverfew (Liddell). So named from its hot taste. - Gk. πυρ, fire, cognate with E. fire; with PELT (1), to throw or cast, to strike by throwing. (L.) 'The chidden billow seems to pelt the clouds;' Oth. ii. 1. 12. M. E. pelten, pilten, pulten, to thrust, strike, drive; pt. t. pelte, pilte, pulte; pp. pelt, pilt, pult. 'And hire over eare pilter hire tail ber inne' = and in her other ear she [the adder] thrusts her tail; O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, ii. 197. 'Fikenhild agen hire pelte Wib his swerdes hilte' = Fikenhild pushed against her with his sword-hilt; King Horn, ed. Lumby, 1415. The pp. pilt = thrust, put, is in Gen. and Exodus, ed. Morris, 2214. The pp. ipult = cast, thrown, is in Layamon, 10839 (later text). See further examples in Stratmann, to which add, from Halliwell: 'With grete strokes I shalle hym pelte,' MS. Ashmole 61; which comes very near the mod. usage. The sense of 'drive' comes out in the common mod. E. phrase full pelt = full β. The easiest way of interpreting the vowel-sounds is to refer the word to an A.S. form pyltan*, to thrust, drive, not recorded. This would give M.E. pulten or pilten; cf. A.S. lytel, whence M.E. lutel, litel, and A.S. pyt, a pit, whence M.E. put, pit. The e is a dialectal variety, like Kentish pet for pit, and E. dent as well as dint, from A. S. dyni. 7. Just as pyt is from Lat. puteus, such a form as A. S. pyltan * would answer to Lat. pultare, to beat, strike, knock; δ. Lat. pultare, and this is the most prob. origin of the word. like pulsare, is an iterative form from pellere (pp. pulsus), to drive; see Pulsate. The simple Lat. pellere appears, probably, in Havelok, 810: 'To morwen shal ich forth pelle' = tomorrow I shall drive forth, i.e. rush forth. ¶ It is usual to derive E. pelt from O. F. pelater, to throw a ball, from pelate, a ball, discussed under Pellet. But though the word pellet may have influenced the later usage of the verb to pelt, and probably did so, such an origin for the word must certainly be rejected, as the M. E. forms clearly shew; esp. as pelt was in use before pellet. Certainl full pelt is not full pellet, nor anything of the kind. Der. pelt-ing, pelt, sb.

Used in the North PELT (2), a skin, esp. of a sheep. (F., -L.) for the skin of a sheep; in hawking, a pelt is the dead body of a fowl killed by a hawk (Halliwell). The skin of a beast with the hair on (Webster). And see Richardson. M. E. pelt. 'Off shepe also comythe pelt and eke felle' [skin]; The Hors, Shepe, and Goos, l. 43 (by Lydgate), in Political, Religious, and Love Poems, cd. Furnivall. We also find prov. E. peltry, skins (Halliwell); formerly peltre-ware, as in Berners, tr. of Froissart, vol. ii. c. 170 (R.); Ilackluyt's Voyages, i. 192, l. 11 from bottom, where it occurs in a reprinted poem of the 15th century. The form pelt seems to have been shortened from peltry or peltry-ware, there being no such word as pellet in F.; whilst peltry = O. F. pelleterie, 'the trade of a skinner, or peltmonger;' Cot. = O. F. pelletier, 'a skinner.' Formed (like bijoutier, graine-tier) by a suffix -tier (due to a diminutive -et and suffix -ier) from O. F. pel, mod. F. peau, a skin; see Pell. ¶ But it may be added that the passage quoted by Hackluyt says that peltre-ware was brought from Pruce (Prussia); so that pelt may have been borrowed directly from M. H. G. pelliz (mod. G. pelz), a skin, the t being due to G. z. However, the M. H. G. pelliz, like Du. pels, are mere borrowings from O. F. pelice, 'a skin of fur' (Cot.) = Lat. pellicea, fem. of pelliceus, adj. formed from pellis. So that it comes to much the same thing. See Pelisse.

PELLUCID, transparent. (F., -L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - F. pellucide, 'bright, shining;' Cot. - Lat. pellucidus, transparent. -Lat. pellucere, perlucere, to shine through.—Lat. per, through; and lucere, to shine, from lux, light. See Por- and Lucid.

In runnips, cd. 1700.—Lat. perms, III. a bason; hence, the pelvis, from its shape. Allied to Gk. πέλις, πέλλα, a wooden bowl, cup. Perhaps from PAR, to fill; whence Lat. plenus, E. full, &c.

PENGUIN, PINGUIN, the name of an aquatic bird. (C.?)
As Indian Britons were from penguins; Butler, Hudibras, pt. 1. c. 2, 1. 60. It occurs still earlier, in the 15th note (by Selden) to Drayton's Polyolbion, song 9, ed. 1613, where we find: 'About the year 1170, Madoc, brother to Dauid ap Owen, Prince of Wales, made this sea-voyage [to Florida]; and, by probability, those names of Capo de Breton in Norumbeg, and pengwin in part of the Northerne America, for a white rock and a white-headed bird, according PEN (2), an instrument used for writing. feather; in late Lat. a pen.

β. The old form of penna was pesna by W. sailors, this may be the solution. We can go still further back, and shew that the word existed in Sir F. Drake's time. In a tract printed in 1588, and reprinted in An English Garner, ed. Arber, vol. ii. p. 119, we read that: 'On the 6th day of January, 1587, we put into the straits of Magellan; and on the 8th, we came to two islands named by Sir F. Drake, the one Bartholomew Island, because he came thither on that Saint's day; and the other Penguin Island, upon which we powdered [salted] three tons (!) of penguins for the victualling of our ship.' The etymology is open to the objection that the penguin's head is black, but the name may have been transferred to the penguin from some similar bird. 2. Another story (in Littré) is that some Dutchmen, in 1598, gave the name to some birds seen by them in the straits of Magellan, intending an allusion to Lat. pinguis, fat. But this will not account for the suffix -in, and is therefore wrong; besides which the 'Dutchmen' turn out to be Sir F. Drake, who named the island 11 years earlier than the date thus assigned. After all, is it certain that the name is not S. American? The F. pingouin appears to be derived from the E. word.

PENINSULA, a piece of land nearly surrounded by water. (L.) Cotgrave has 'peninsule, a peninsula.' - Lat. peninsula, a piece of land nearly an island. - Lat. pen-e, pæn-e, almost; and insula, an island; see Isle. Der. peninsul-ar, peninsul-ate.

PENNON, PENNANT, a small flag, banner, streamer. (F., -L.) Pennant is merely formed from pennon by the addition of t after n, as in ancien-t, tyran-t. It occurs in Drayton, Battle of Agincourt (R.) Pennon is in Shak. Hen. V, iii. 5. 49. M. E. penon, penoun, Chaucer, C. T. 980. - O. F. pennon, 'a pennon, flag, streamer; les pennons d'une fleiche, the seathers of an arrow; ' Cot. Cf. Span. pendon, a banner (with excrescent d); Ital. pennone, a pennon, of which the old meaning was 'a great plume or bunch of feathers' (Florio). Formed, with suffix -on, from Lat. penna, a wing, feather; whence the sense of 'plume,' and lastly, of streamer or standard. See Pen (2). Der. pennon-cel, a dimin. form, from O. F. pennoncel, 'a pennon on the top of a launce, a little flag or streamer;

PENNY, a copper coin, one twelfth of a shilling. (L., with E. suffix.) Formerly a silver coin; the copper coinage dates from A.D. 1665. M. E. peni, Havelok, 705; pl. penies, Havelok, 776, also pens (pronounced like mod. E. pence) by contraction, P. Plowman, B. v. 243. The mod. E. pence is due to this contracted form. A.S. pening, a penny, Mark, xii. 15, where the Camb. MS. has penig, by loss of n before g; the further loss of the final g produced M. E. peni. The oldest form is pending (A.D. 835), Thorpe, Diplomatarium, p. 471, l. 26; formed from the base pand, with dimin, suffix -ing. B. It is clear that pand = Du. pand, a pawn, pledge, O. H. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 9, where however the first part of the word is a singular corruption of the old name a kird or which we find Contrave transcorruption of the old name puliol or puliall; we find Cotgrave translating O.F. pulege by 'penny royall, puliall royall,' the name being really due to Lat. puleium regium, penny-royal (Pliny, b. xx. c. 14), a name given to the plant (like E. flea-bane) from its supposed efficacy against fleas; from Lat. pulen, a flea (see Flea). PERPETUAL, everlasting. (F., -L.) M. E. perpetuel, Chaucer, C. T. 1178. - F. perpetuel, 'perpetuall', Cot. - Lat. perpetualis, universal; later used in same sense as perpetuarius, permanent. - Lat. perpetuare, to perpetuate. - Lat. perpetuus, continuous, constant, perpetual. - Lat. perpet-, stem of perpes, lasting throughout, continuous. Lat. perp. throughout; and pet-, weakened form of γ PAT, to go, appearing in Gk. πάτοε, a path, πατεῦν, to tread. See Per- and Path. Thus the orig. sense has reference to a continuous path, a way right through. Der. perpetual-ly, M. E. perpetuelly, Chaucer, C. T. 1344; perpetu-ate, Palsgrave, from Lat. pp. perpetuatus; perpetu-at-ion; perpetu-i-ty, from F. perpetuité, 'perpetuity' (Cot.), from Lat.

PERPLEX, to embarrass, bewilder. (F., -L.) In such perplexed plight; Spenser, F. Q. iii. 1. 59. Minsheu gives only the participial adj. perplexed, not the verb; and, in fact, the form perplexed seems to have been first in use, as a translation from the French. - F. perplex, 'perplexed, intricate, intangled;' Cot. - Lat. perplexus, entangled, interwoven. - Lat. per, thoroughly; and plexus, entangled, pp. of plectere, to plait, braid. See Por- and Plait, Der. perplex-i-ty, M. E. perplexitee, Gower, C. A. iii. 348, l. 18, from and Query.

PERRY, the fermented juice of pears. (F., -L.) In Phillips, ed.

1706. 'Perrie, drinke of peares;' Minsheu, ed. 1627. - F. poiré, 'perry, drink made of peares, 'Anisacu, Carlos,' - Perry, 'eperry, drink made of peares;' Cot. [The change from point to the form perry was perhaps due to some confusion with M. E. pery, a pear-tree; for which see Pear.] Formed with suffix -é (= Lat. -atus, i. e. made of) from poire, a pear. - Lat. pirum, a pear; see Pear.

PERSECUTE, to harass, pursue with annoyance. (F.,-L.)

The sb. persecution is older in E. than the vb., and is spelt persecucioum in Wyclif, Second Prologue to Apocalypse, l. 1. Shak has persecute, All's Well, i. 1. 16. - F. persecuter, 'to persecute, prosecute;' Cot. Formed as if from a Low Lat. persecutare *, from Lat. persecutus, pp.

of persequi, to pursue, follow after.—Lat. per, continually; and sequi, to follow. See Per- and Sequence. Der. persecut-ion.

PERSEVERE, to persist in anything. (F.,-L.) Formerly accented and spelt persever, Hamlet, i. 2. 92. M. E. perseueren (with u=v), Chaucer, C. T. 15585.—F. perseuerer, 'to persevere;' Cot.— Lat. perseuerare, to adhere to a thing, persist in it. — Lat. perseuerurs, very strict. — Lat. per, thoroughly; and seuerus, strict; see Por- and Severe. Der. perseuer-ance, M. E. perseuerance, Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 168, l. 22, from O. F. perseuerance, Lat. perseuerantia.

PERSIST, to continue steadfast, persevere. (F.,-L.) In Shak. All's Well, iii. 7. 42. - F. persister, 'to persist;' Cot. - Lat. persistere, to continue, persist. - Lat. per, through; and sistere, properly to make to stand, set, a causal form from stare, to stand, from STA, to stand. See Per- and Stand. Der. persistent, from the stem of the pres. part.; persistence; persistenc-y, 2 Hen. IV, ii. 2. 50.

PERSON, a character, individual, body. (F., -L.) M. E. person,

(1) a person, Chaucer, C. T. 10339; (2) a parson, id. 480; earlier persun, Ancren Riwle, p. 126, l. 15. – F. personne, 'a person, wight, creature;' Cot. – Lat. persona, a mask used by an actor, a personage, peroratus, pp. of perorare, to speak from beginning to end, also, to close a character, part played by an actor, a person. The large-mouthed a speech. - Lat. per, through; and orare, to speak; see Per- and masks worn by the actors were so called from the resonance of the voice sounding through them; the lengthening of the vowel o may have been due to a difference of stress. - Lat. personare, to sound through. - Lat. per, through; and sonare, to sound, from sonus, through. — Lat. per, through; and sonare, to sound, from some, sound. See Per- and Sound. Doublet, parson, q. v. Der. person-able, Spenser, F. Q. iii. 4. 5; person-age, id. F. Q. ii. 2. 46, from O. F. personnage (Cot.); person-al, Macb. i. 3. 91, from O. PERSPECTIVE, optical, relating to the science of vision. (F., - L.) Properly an adj., as in 'the perspective or optike art;' Minsheu, ed. 1627; but common as a sb., accented perspective, in the sense of an optical glass or optical delusion; see Rich. II, ii. 2. 18; also Skelton's Poems, ed. Dyce, i. 25, l. 22. - F. perspective, sb. f., 'the perspective, prospective, or optike art;' Cot. - Lat. perspectiua, sb. f., the art of thoroughly inspecting; fem. of perspectious, relating to inspection. - Lat. perspectus, clearly perceived, pp. of perspicere, to see through or clearly. — Lat. per, through; and specere, to see, spy. See Per- and Spy. Der. perspective-ly, Hen. V, v. 2. 347. And see Perspicacity, Perspicuous.

PERSPICACITY, keenness of sight. (F., -L.) In Minsheu,

ed. 1627; and in Cotgrave. - F. perspicacité, 'perspicacity, quick sight;' Cot. - Lat. perspicacitatem, acc. of perspicacitas, sharpsightedness. — Lat. perspicaci., crude form of perspicax, sharp-sighted; with suffix -tas. Formed with suffix -ax from perspic-ere, to see through; see Perspective. Der. perspicaci-ous, a coined word, as an equivalent to Lat. perspican; perspicacious-ly, -ness. And see Perspicuous.

PERSPICUOUS, evident. (L.) In Shak. Troil. i. 3. 324. Taken immediately (by change of -us to -ous, as in arduous, &c.) from Lat. perspicuus, transparent, clear. - Lat. perspicere, to see through;

Ferspication, than platent, clear, in East, perspicate, to see though, see Perspective. Der. perspicaus-ly, -ness; also perspication, from F. perspication, 'perspication,' Cot.

PERSPIRATION, a sweating. (F., -L.) The verb perspire is really later, and due to the sb.; it occurs in Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors. b. iv. c. 7. § 4: 'A man in the morning is lighter in the scale, because in sleep some pounds have perspired.' The sb. is in Cotgrave; perspirable is in Minsheu, ed. 1627. — F. perspiration, 'a perspiration, or breathing through.' — Lat. perspirationem, acc. of perspiratio*, not given in White's Dict., but regularly formed from perspiratus, pp. of perspirare, to breathe or respire all over. - Lat. per, through; and spirare, to breathe; see Per- and Spirit. Der. perspirat-or-y; also perspire, verb, answering to Lat. perspirare.

PERSUADE, to prevail on, convince by advice. (F., - L.) Common in Shak., Meas. for Meas. i. 2. 191; perswade in Palsgrave. - F. persuader, 'to perswade;' Cot. - Lat. persuadere (pp. persuasus), to persuade, advise thoroughly. - Lat. per, thoroughly; and suadere, to advise; see Per- and Suasion. Der. persuad-er; also (from pp. persuasus) persuas-ible, from F. persuasible, 'persuasible, 'Cot.; persuasible-ness, persuasibili-ty; also persuas-ion, Temp. ii. 1. 235, Skelton, Garland of Laurel, l. 34, from F. persuasion, 'persuasion, 'persuasion,' Cot.; persuas-ive, from F. persuasif, 'persuasive,' Cot.; persuasive,' ive-ly, persuas-ive-ness.
PERT, forward, saucy. (C.) In Shak. it means 'lively, alert,' M. E. pert, which, however, has two meanings, L. L. L. v. 2. 272. and two sources; and the meanings somewhat run into one another. 1. In some instances, pert is certainly a corruption of apert, and pertly is used for 'openly' or 'evidently;' see Will. of Palerne, 4930, also 53, 96, 156, 180, &c. In this case, the source is the F. apert, open, 53, 90, 130, 160, 160.

2. But we also find 'proud and pert,' Chaucer, C. T. 3948; 'stout he was and pert,' Li Beaus Disconus, l. 123 (Ritson). There is an equivalent form perk, which is really older; the change from k to t taking place accessionally as in Faculty of the perturbation. occasionally, as in E. mate from M. E. make. 'Perke as a peacock;' Spenser, Shep. Kal. Feb. 1. 8. 'The popelayes perken and pruynen fol proude' = the popinjays smarten up and trim themselves very proudly; Celestin and Susanna, ed. Horstmann, l. 81, pr. in Anglia, ed. Wülcker, i. 95. Cf. prov. E. perk, pert, proud, elated; perky, saucy; peart, brisk, lively. - W. pert, smart, spruce, pert; perc, compact, trim; percus, trim, smart; percu, to trim, to smarten. See Perk. Der. pert-ly, Temp. iv. 58; pert-ness, Pope, Dunciad, i. Perk.

PERTAIN, to belong. (F., -L.) M. E. partenen, Will. of Palerne, 1419; Wyclif, John, x. 13. Not a common word. - O. F. partenir, to pertain; in Burguy and Roquefort, but not in Cotgrave. (It seems to have been supplanted by the comp. apparent; see Appertain.) - Lat. pertinere, to pertain. See Pertinent.

both pertinacity and pertinacy; Minsheu, ed. 1627, has only the latter form, which is the commoner one in old authors, though now disused. Pertinacity is from F. pertinacité, omitted by Cotgrave, but occurring in the 16th century (Littré). Pertinacy is from F. pertinace, cited by Minsheu, but not found in Cotgrave or Littré. tinacity is a coined word; pertinacy (F. pertinace) is from Lat. pertitracety is a conied word, personally (r. personale) is from Lat. personal nacia, personal personal nacia, crude form of pertinax, very tenacious.—Lat. per-, very; and tenax, tenacious, from tenere, to hold. See Per- and Tenable. Der. pertinacious, Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus (R.), a coined word, to represent Lat. pertinax, just as

PERTINENT, related or belonging to. (F.,-L.) In Shak.

Wint. Tale, i. 2. 221. - F. pertinent, 'pertinent;' Cot. - Lat. pertinent, stem of pres. part. of pertinere, to belong. - Lat. per, thoroughly; and tenere, to hold, cling to; see Per- and Tenable. Der. pertinent-ly, pertinence; and see pertinacity.

PERTURB, to disturb greatly. (F.,-L.) M.E. 1
Chaucer, C. T. 908. - F. perturber, 'to perturb, disturb; Lat. perturbare, to disturb greatly.— Lat. per, thoroughly; and turbare, to disturb, from turba, a crowd. See Per- and Turbid. Der. perturb-at-ion, spelt perturbacyon, Bp. Fisher, On the Seven Psalms, Ps. 38, ed. Mayor (E. E. T. S.), p. 53, l. 21, from F. perturbation (Cot.), which from Lat. acc. perturbationem.

PERUKE, an artificial head of hair. (F.,—Ital.,—L.) The same word as periwig, which, however, is the Dutch form of the word; see Periwig. For the form peruke, R. refers to a poem by Cotton to John Bradshaw; and Todd refers to Bp. Taylor, Artificial Handsomeness, p. 44; we therefore find the word at the close of the 17th century, periwig being in earlier use. - F. perruque, 'a lock of haire;' -Ital. parrucca, O. Ital. parucca, 'a periwigge,' Florio; who also gives the form perucea.

β. The same word with Span. peluca, a wig, Port. peruca; Littré also cites Sardinian pilucea, and other forms. The key to the etymology is in remembering the frequent interchange of r and l; the true forms are those with l, such as Span. peluca, Sardinian pilucca. These are closely related to Ital. piluccare, now used in the sense 'to pick a bunch of grapes,' but formerly 'to pick or pull out haires or feathers one by one;' Florio. Y. The true old sense of pilucca was probably 'a mass of hair separated from the head, thus furnishing the material for a peruke. Cf. also Ital. pelluzo, very soft down, O. Ital. pellucare, pelucare, to plucke off the haires or skin of anything, to pick out haires; 'Florio. Also F. peluche, 'shag, plush,' Cot.; see Plush. 5. The O. Ital. pelucare and Sard. pilucca are formed (by help of a dimin. suffix -ucca) from Ital. pelo, hair. - Lat. pilum, acc. of pilus, a hair. Root unknown. Doublets, periwig, wig.  The usual form of the Ital. dimin. is not -ucca, but -uccio or -uzzo in the masc., and -uccia, -uzza in the feminine.

PERUSE, to examine, read over, survey. (Hybrid; L. and F., -L.) In Shak. in the sense 'to survey, examine,' Com. Errors, i. 2. 13; also 'to read,' Mcrch. Ven. ii. 4. 39. 'That I perused then;' G. Turbervile, The Louer to Cupid for Mercy, st. 12. 'Thus hauynge perused the effecte of the thirde booke, I will likewise peruse the fourth;' Bp. Gardiner, Explication, &c., Of the Presence, fol. 76 (R.) 'To peruse, peruti;' Levins, cd. 1570. And see Skelton, Phyllyp Sparowe, 1.814. A coined word; from Per- and Use.

No other source can well be assigned; but it must be admitted to be a barbarous and ill-formed word, compounded of Latin and French, and by no means used in the true sense; since to per-use could only rightly mean to 'use thoroughly,' as Levins indicates. The sense of the word comes nearer to that of the F. revoir or F. 'survey' or 'examine;' cf. 'Myself I then perused,' i. e. surveyed, Milton, P. L. viii. 267; 'Who first with curious eye Perused him,' id. P. R. i. 320. The F. revoir and E. survey both point to the Lat. uidere, to see; hence Wedgwood observes: 'the only possible origin seems Lat. peruisere, to observe [intensive form of peruidere], but we are unable to show a F. perviser, and if there were such a term, the vocalisation of the v in the pronunciation of an E. peruise would be very singular. Webster suggests that peruse arose from the misreading of an old word peruise, really pervise, but read as if the v were u. This is ingenious, but is utterly negatived by the fact that an E. peruise is as mythical as a F. perviser; at least, no one has yet produced either the one or the other. On the other hand, there is a fair argument for the supposed barbarous coinage from per and use, in the fact that compounds with per were once far more common than they are now. I can instance peract, Dr. Henry More, Poems (Chertsey Worthics' Library), p. 133, l. 31; perdure, perfixt, perplanted, perquire, persway, all in Halliwell; perscrite, pertract, Andrew Borde, Introduction of Knowledge, ed. Furnivall, p. 144, l. 32, p. 264, l. 25; pervestigate, perugilate, both in Minsheu; peraction, perarte, percuiciate, pertusion. tion, perendinate, perflation, perfretation, perfriction, perfusion, per- (as above), from F. pestilence = Lat. pestilentia; pestilent-ly, pestilent-i-al,

PERTINACITY, obstinacy. (F., -L.) Phillips, ed. 1706, gives & graphical, perpession, perplication, perside, perstringe, perterebrale, perboth pertinacity and pertinacy; Minsheu, ed. 1627, has only the latter vagation, all in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. Whoever ponders these form, which is the commoner one in old authors, though now discount of the commoner one in old authors, though now discount of the commoner one in old authors, though now discount of the commoner one in old authors, though now discount of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner of the commoner The chief difficulty, after all, is in the curious change of sense, from that of 'use carefully' to 'survey' or 'read.' The testimony of Levins is curious; he seems to have accepted the word literally. We may also note, further, that peruse follows the old pronunciation of use, which had no initial y-sound, as it now has. Thus Chaucer could pronounce the usage as th'usage; C. T. 110. Dor. perus-al, PERVADE, to penetrate, spread through. (L.) 'Pervade, to go over or through;' Phillips, ed. 1706.—Lat. peruadere, to go through.—Lat. per, through; and uadere, to go, allied to E. wade. See Perand Wade. Der. per-vas-ive (rare), from the pp. peruasus, Shenstone, PERVERT, to turn aside from the right, to corrupt. (F.,-L.) M. E. peruerten (with u for v), Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, bk. ii. pr. 1, 1. 737. - F. peruertir, 'to pervert, seduce;' Cot. - Lat. peruertere, to overtum, ruin, corrupt (pp. peruersus). - Lat. per, thoroughly; and uertere, to turn; see Per- and Verse. Der. pervert-er; also perverse, Fabyan's Chron. vol. i. c. 112, in the description of Brunechieldis, from F. pervers, 'perverse, cross' (Cot.), which from Lat. pp. peruersus; honce perverse-ly, perverse-ness, pervers-i-ty, pervers-ion. so pervert-ible.

'Why should you PERVICACIOUS, wilful, obstinate. (L.) be so pervicacious now, Pug?' Dryden, Kind Keeper, A. ii. sc. 2 (ed. Scott). Coined by adding ous to peruicacie, crude form of peruicaci, wilful, stubborn.

B. Perhaps from per, thoroughly, and the base ui-scen in uis, strength.

Cf. Lat. peruicus, stubborn, in which -cus is a suffix (Aryan -ka).

Sec Per- and Violate.

PERVIOUS, penetrable. (L.) In Dryden, tr. of Ovid, Mcleager, l. 146. Borrowed directly from Lat. peruins, passable, by change of -us to -ous, as in arduous, &c. - Lat. per, through; and uia, a way; hence, 'affording a passage through.' See Per- and Voyage. Der.

PESSIMIST, one who complains of everything as being for the worst. (L.) Modern; not in Todd's Johnson. Formed with suffix -ist (= Lat. -ista, from Gk. -ιστης) from Lat. pessim-us, worst. [So also optim-ist from optim-us, best.] β. Pessimus is the superl. also optim-ist from optim-us, best.] B. Pessi connected with comp. peior, worse; see Impair.

PEST, a plague, anything destructive or unwholesome. (F.,-L.) 'The hellish pest;' Milton, P. L. ii. 735.—F. peste, 'the plague, or pestilence;' Cot.—Lat. pestem, acc. of pestis, a deadly disease, plague. Perhaps from Lat. pestern, acc. of pesters, a deatof discuse, pague. Perhaps from Lat. perdere, to destroy; see Pordition. Der. pesthouse; pesti-ferous, Sir T. Elyot, The Governor, b. i. c. 3 (R.), Englished from Lat. pestiferus (the same as pestifer), from pesticrude form of pestis, and fer, bringing, from ferre, to bring, cognate with E. Bear (1); also pesti-lent, q.v.

PESTER, to encumber, annoy. (F., -L.) The old sense is to 'encumber' or 'clog,' 'Neyther combred wyth ouer great multitude, nor pestered wyth too much baggage;' Brende, tr. of Q. Curtius, fol. 25 (R.) 'Pestered [crowded] with innumerable multitudes of people;' North's Plutarch (in Shakespeare's Plutarch, ed. Skeat, p. 175). Hence pesterous, cumbersome, in Bacon, Life of Hen. VII, ed. Lumby, p. 196, l. 29 (wrongly explained as pestiferous). A shortened from of impester, by loss of the first syllable, as in the case of fence for defence, sport for disport, story for history, &c. Cotgrave explains the F. pp. empestré as 'impestered, intricated, intangled, incumbered.' = O. F. empestrer, 'to pester, intricate, intangle, trouble, incumber.' Mod. F. empêtrer. 3. Empêtrer signifies properly to hobble a horse while he feeds afield, and depêtrer is to free his legs from the bonds. These words come from the medieval Lat. pastorium, a clog for horses at pasture. Pastorium (derived through pastum from passere, to feed) is common in this sense in the Germanic laws: 'Si quis in exercitu aliquid furaverit, pastorium, capistrum, frenum,' &c. (Lex Bavar. tit. II. vi. I). So also in the Lex Longobard. tit. I. xx. 5: 'Si quis pastorium de caballo alieno tulerit; Brachet. Y. Thus empestrer represents Low Lat. impastoriare*, regularly formed from in, prep., and pastorium, a clog. Pastorium is a derivative from pastus, pp. of pascere, to feed, inceptive form from a base pa. — PA, to feed; see Food. ¶ Wholly unconnected with pest; but, on the other hand, it is closely connected with Pastern, q. v.

PESTILENT, bringing a plague, hurtful to health or morals. (F., - L.) In Hamlet, ii. 2. 315. [The sb. pestilence is much older; M. E. pestilence, P. Plowman, B. v. 13.] - F. pestilent, 'pestilent, plaguy;' Cot. - Lat. pestilent., stem of pestilens, unhealthy; we also find an old rare form pestilentus.

[B. Pestilens is formed as a pressure from a realy destilent is not be perfected.] find an old rare form pestilentus.

B. Pestilens is formed as a pres. part. from a verb pestilere*, not in use, but founded on the adj. pestilis. pestilential. This adj. is formed with suffix -li- (Aryan -ra) from pesti-, crude form of pestis, a plague; see Pest. Der. pestilence, sb. PESTLE, an instrument for pounding things in a mortar. (F., - L.) & F. petrifier, 'to make stony;' Cot. Formed as if from Lat. petri-M. E. pestel, Tale of Gamelyn, l. 122. 'Pestel, of stampynge, Pila, pistillus, pistellus;' Prompt. Parv. - O. F. pestel (Roquefort), later pesteil, 'a pestle or pestell;' Cot. - Lat. pistillum, a pestle; regularly formed, as a dimin. of an unused sb. pistrum*, from pistum, supine of pinsere, to pound, rarely spelt pisere. B. Pinsere (=pisere) is cognate with Gk. miloscu, to grind coarsely, to pound, and Skt. pisk, to grind, pound, bruise. - PIS, to grind, pound; whence also Russ. pikhate, to push, shove. See Pistil, Piston.

'The love of cronies, petts, and favourites;' Tatler, no. 266, Dec. 21, 1710. Formerly peat, as in Shak. Tam. Shrew, i. 1, 78. 'Pretty peat;' Gascoigne, Flowers, Hir Question; Works, ed. Hazlitt, i. 48. Ray (A.D. 1691) calls pet a North-country word, and explains a petlamb as 'a cade lamb.' Of Celtic origin.—Irish peat, sb. a pet, adj. petted. 'Oirce peata, petted pigs;' O'Reilly. Gael. peata, a pet, a tame animal. Der. pet, verb; pett-ed; and probably pet (2), q. v. PET (2), a sudden fit of peevishness. (C.) 'In a pet of temperance;' Milton, Comus, 721. Shak. has pettish, adj., i. e. capricious, Troil. ii. 3. 139; spelt petish, Levins. There was also an old phrase to take the pet,' or to take pet. Cotgrave translates F. se mescontenter de by 'to take the pet, to be ill satisfied with.' The simplest and most probable derivation is from Pet (1), q. v. A pet is a spoilt and most probable derivation is from Pet (1), q. v. A pet is a spoilt child; hence pettish, capricious; to take the pet, to act like a spoilt child; whence, finally, the sb. pet in its new sense of capricious action or peevishness. Der. pett-ish, pett-ish-ly, pett-ish-ness.

PETAL, a flower-leaf; part of a corolla. (Gk.) Petala, among herbalists, those fine coloured leaves of which the flowers of all plants are made up; Phillips, ed. 1706. Here petala is the Greek plural form, shewing that the word was taken from the Greek immediately.—Gk. πέταλον (pl. πέταλα), a leaf; properly neut. of πέταλοι, spread out, broad, flat. Πέτα-λοι is formed with suffix -λοι (Aryan -ra) from the base πετα- (whence also πετά-νννμι, I spread out), extended form of the base πετ- (for πατ-), to spread. Cf. Lat. patulus, spreading, pat-ere, to lie open, be spread out. — PAT, to spread out; see Fathom. Der. petal-oid.

PETARD, a war-engine, a case filled with explosive materials.

(F., -L.) In Hamlet, iii. 4. 207; spelt petar in the quarto edd. of Hamlet, and by all editors down to Johnson. Cotgrave has both petard and petarre. - F. petart, petard, 'a petard or petarre; an engine. . wherewith strong gates are burst open.' Formed with suffix -art or -ard (of Germanic origin, from G. hart, hard, Brachet, Introd. § 196) from the verb peter, to break wind. - F. pet, a break-Introd. § 196) from the verb peter, to break wind.—F. pet, a breaking wind, slight explosion.—Lat. peditum, a breaking wind.—Lat. peditus, pp. of pēdere (contracted from perdere), to break wind. + Lith. persti, 1 p. s. pr. perd-zui. + Gk. πέρδευ. + Skt. pard. + Icel. freta. + O. H. G. firzan, G. furzen. All from PARD, to crack, explode slightly; whence also E. partridge.

PETIOLE, the footstalk of a leaf. (F.,—L.) Modern; botanical.—E privide a petitole — Let article means of petitole a lettle foot a

- F. pétiole, a petiole. - Lat. petiolum, acc. of petiolus, a little foot, a stem or stalk. B. Apparently for pediolus; the usual derivation is from pedi-, crude form of pes, a foot; see Foot.

PETITION, a prayer, supplication. (F., -L.) M. E. peticion, petition; Rob. of Brunne [not Rob. of Glouc.], tr. of Langtoft, p. 313, l. 18. - F. petition, 'a petition;' Cot. - Lat. petitioneen, acc. of petitio, a suit.—Lat. petitus, pp. of petere, to attack, ask; orig. to fall on.—\PAT, to fly, fall; whence also E. find, feather, &c.; see Find, Feather, Impetus. Der. petition, vb., petition-ar-y, petitioner, petition-ing.

PETREL, PETEREL, a genus of ocean-birds. (F., -G., -L., -Gk.) 'The peterels, to which sailors have given the name of Mother Carey's chickens;' Hawkesworth's Voyages (Todd). The spelling petrel is used in a translation of Buffon's Nat. Hist., London, 1792, where we are told that the stormy petrels 'sometimes hover over the water like swallows, and sometimes appear to run on the top of it; vol. ii. p. 128. From the latter peculiarity they take their name. -F. pétrel (sometimes pétérel); Littré cites a letter written by Buffon, At petral (sometimes peteral); Little cites a letter written by Button, dated 1782, who gives his opinion that petral is a better spelling than pétéral, because the derivation is from the name Peter, which is pronounced, he says, as Petra. (The usual F. word for Peter is Pierra.)

B. Thus petral is formed as a diminutive of Pêtra or Peter; and the allusion is to the action of the bird, which seems to walk on the sea, like St. Peter. The G. name Petersvogal (lit. Peter-fowl = Peter-bird) gives clear evidence as to the etymology. G. Peter. - Lat. Petrus, Peter. - Gk. Hérpos, a rock; a name given to petr-, stem of petra, a rock, a word borrowed from Gk. πέτρα; and Lat. oleum, oil. See Petrify and Oil. ¶ There is a curious mention of rock-oil in l'lutarch's Life of Alexander; see North's

PETRONEL, a horse-pistol. (F., -Span., -L.) 'Their peeces then are called petronels;' Gascoigne, The Continuance of the Author, upon the Fruite of Fetters, st. 7; Works, ed. Hazlitt, i. 408. Author, upon the Fruite of Fetters, st. 7; works, ed. Haziitt, i. 400. Spelt petrionel in Ben Jonson, Every Man, ed. Wheatley, iii. 1; some edd. have petronel.—F. petrinal, 'a petronell, or horseman's piece;' Cot.

B. Wedgwood remarks that they are said to have been invented in the Pyrenees; and he is very likely right in deriving the word from Span. petrina, a girdle, belt; as a horseman's carbine would require to be slung by a belt. Cf. O. Ital. pietranelli, 'souldiers serving on horseback, well armed with a pair of cuirasses and wea-poned with a fire-locke-piece or a snaphance or a petronell; 'Florio. y. Span. petrina is allied to Span. petral, a poitrel; both are from Lat. pector., stem of pectus, the breast: see Poitrel pector-, stem of pectus, the breast; see Poitrel.

PETTY, small, insignificant. (F., -C.?) Common in Shak.; see Merch. Ven. i. 1. 12, &c. M. E. petit, P. Plowman, B. xiv. 242.— F. petit, 'little, small, . meane, petty;' Cot. β. Perhaps of Celtic origin; Diez connects it not only with Sardinian piticu, little, Wallachian pitic, a dwarf, O. Ital. pitetto, petitto, Prov. and Catalan Wallachian pitte, a dwari, O. Hai. piteno, petito, 1201. and petit, Wallachian piti, small, little; but also with Span. pito, a pointed piece of wood [I can only find Span. piton, a tenderling, sprig or sprout of a tree], and O. F. pite, a small piece of money (Cotgrave). He cites several other words (none of them very easy to verify), from all of which he concludes the existence of a Celtic base pii, meaning something with a fine point, preserved in W. pid, a tapering meaning something with a line point, preserved in w. pia, a tapering point.

y. Similarly the Ital. piccolo, little, may be related to a Celtic base pic, seen in W. pig, a point, peak, bill, beak.

¶ The W. pitw, petty, may be borrowed from English. Der. petti-ly; petti-ness, Hen. V, iii. 6. 136; petti-coat, i. e. little coat, As You Like It, i. 3. 15 (see Coat); petti-fogger, Marston, The Malcontent, A. i. sc. 6 (R.), spelt pettie fogger in Minsheu, ed. 1627, allied to prov. E. fog, to hunt in a servile manner, to flatter for gain, used by Dekker (Halliwell), from O. Du. focker, 'a monopole, or an engrosser of wares and commodities,' Hexham.

PETULIANT, peevish. (L.) In Ben Jonson, Epigram 2 (To My Book), l. 5.—Lat. petulant-, stcm of petulans, forward, pert, petulant; lit. 'ready to attack in a small way,' as it answers to the form of a pres. part. of petulare*, a dimin. of petere, to attack seek. See Petition. Der. petulant-ly; also petulance, from F. petulance,

F. pui, an elevated place, the same as puye, 'an open and outstanding terrace or gallery, set on the outside with rails to lean on;' Cot. Cf. Span. poyo, a stone-bench near a door, Ital. poggio, a hillock. [Prob. orig. applied to a raised desk to kneel at.] - Lat. podium, an elevated place, a balcony, esp. a balcony next the arena, where the emperor and other distinguished persons sat. [The loss of d and final -um, and change of poi to O. F. pui, are perfectly regular.] = Gk. πόδιον, a little foot; whence the senses of footstool, support for the feet, gallery to sit in, &c. must have been evolved; for there can be no doubt as to the identity of the Gk. and Lat. words. - Gk. #006-, crude form of novs, a foot; with dimin. suffix -ov. Gk. novs is cognate with E. foot; see Foot. Der. pew-fellow, Rich. III, iv. 4. 58.

The Du. puye, 'a pue' (Hexham), is borrowed from F. puye.

PEWET, PEEWIT, the lapwing. (E.) 'Pewet or Puet, a kind of bird;' Phillips, ed. 1706. 'Een Piewit-vogel, ofte [or] Kiewit, a puet, or a lap-winckle;' Hexham's Du. Dict., ed. 1658.

Named from its cry. So also Du. piewit or kiewit, G. kibitz.

PETRIFY, to turn into stone. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) Properly transitive; also used intransitively. 'When wood and many other bodies do petrify;' Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, bk. ii. c. 1. § 3.— ont well become petro in Italian. The solution is, probably, that the Ital., Span., and O. F. forms have lost an initial s, owing to the 3 formed to the Gk. spelling as far as relates to the initial ph. Formed difficulty of sounding the initial sp; and the original word really does appear in E. in the form spelter. 'Spelter, a kind of metall, not known to the antients, which the Germans call zink;' Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. Zinc and pewter are often confounded. See Spelter. Der. pewter-er, Prompt. Parv.

PHAETON, a kind of carriage. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) Properly Phaethon, but we took the word from French. Spelt phaeton (trisyllabic) in Young, Night Thoughts, l. 245 from end. - F. phaeton, a phaeton; occurring in a work written in 1792 (Littré). - F. Phaethon, proper name.—Lat. Phaethon.—Gk. In Phillips' Dict. ed. 1706. - Late Lat. pharynx; merely the Latinised form of the Gk. word. - Gk. φάρυγξ, the joint opening of the gullet and wind-pipe; also, a cleft, a bore; closely allied to φάραγξ, a chasm, gulley, cleft, ravine, and to φαράειν, to plough. Perforate.

PHASE, PHASIS, an appearance; a particular appearance of the moon or of a planet at a given time. (L., -Gk.) The form phase does not appear to have been borrowed from F. phase, but to have resulted as an E. singular from the pl. sb. phases, borrowed immediately from Latin. 'Phases, appearances; in astronomy, the several positions in which the moon and other planets appear to our sight, &c.; Phillips' Dict., ed. 1706. 'Phasis, an appearance; Bailey, vol. ii. 1731. BHA, to speak; see Ban. This explains the word em-phasis. The root BHA, to speak, declare, is plains the word em-phasis. The root BHA, to speak, declare, is probably identical with BHA, to shine, to shew.

PHEASANT, a gallinaceous bird. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) Now con

The river Phasis is now called the Rioni; it flows from the Caucasus into the Black Sea, at its extreme E. point.

PHENIX, PHŒNIX, a fabulous bird. (L., - Gk.) The word appears very early. Spelt fenix, it is the subject of an A. S. poem extant in the Exeter book; printed in Grein's Bibliothek, i. 215. This poem is imitated from a Lat. poem with the same title.—Lat. phoenix; Pliny, Nat. Hist. i. 2. 2.—Gk. φοίνιξ, a phoenix; see Herodotus, ii. 73, and Smith's Classical Dictionary.

β. The same dotus, ii. 73, and Smith's Classical Dictionary. β. The same word also means Phoenician or Punic (Gk. φοίνιξ = Lat. Punicus); also, a palm-tree; also purple-red. The origin can hardly be assigned. ¶ Littré supposes that the phœnix was named from its bright colour; and that the colour was so named because invented by the Phœnicians.

Formerly phænomenon, with pl. phænomena, as in Phillips, ed. 1706. - Lat. phanomenon, pl. phanomena. - Gk. φαινόμενον, pl. φαινόμενα, properly the neut. of the pass. part. of φαίνειν, to shew (pass. φαίνομαι, to be shewn, to appear). β. φαίνειν = φάν-γειν, lit. to make bright; from φαν-, lengthened form of φα-, to shine. — ✓ BHA, to shine; see Phantom. β. The sb. φλέψ is from φλεειν, to gush, over-the compound sound; hence Phillips has 'Phthisic, the phthisick or Topos, cutting.

The sb. φκφ is from φλεει, to gust, over those φλε-, akin to φλα-, to spout forth, discussed in Curtius, i. 375; allied to Lat. flare, E. blow (1), and to Lat. flarere, E. blow (2). - √ BHLA, to blow; Fick, i. 703.

PHLEGM, slimy matter in the throat, sluggishness, indifference. (F., -L., -Gk.) Spelt flegme in Cotgrave. R. quotes from Arbuthnot, On Aliments, c. 6: 'Phlegm among the ancients signified a cold viscous humour, contrary to the etymology of the word, which is from φλέγειν, to burn; but amongst them there were two sorts of phlegm, cold and hot.' The use of the word was due to the supposed influence of the four 'humours,' which were blood, choler, phlegm, and gall; phlegm causing a dull and sluggish temperament. Chaucer, C. T. 625, has saweffem, a word formed from Lat. salsum phlegma, C. 1. 025, has saweefem, a word formed from Lat. saisum phiegma, salt phiegm. = F. phiegme, 'flegme;' Cot. = Lat. phiegma. = Gk. φλέγμα, base φλεγματ., (1) a flame, (2) inflammation, (3) phiegm. = Gk. φλέγεν, to burn.

Der. photograph, short for photographed picture; photograph-ic, photograph-er. So also photo-meter, an instrument for measuring the intensity of light; see Metre.

PHRASE, part of a sentence, a short sentence. (F., -L., -Gk.) Frequent in Shak. Merry Wives, i. 1. 151, i. 3. 33, &c. - F. phrase, not in Cotgrave, but cited in Minsheu; Littre cites the spelling frase in in Cotgrave, but cited in Minshel; Lattre cites the speiling frase in the 16th century.—Lat. phrasis.—Gk. φράσιε, a speaking, speech, phrase.—Gk. φράζειν (= φράδ-γειν), to speak.

β. The Gk. base φραδ is probably allied to Goth. frai-, fraih-, as seen in fraihjan, to perceive, know, think, understand, usfratwjan, to make wise. The Gk. φραδής, shrewd, cunning, answers to Goth. frods, froihs, wise. See Fick, i. 679.

Der. phrase, vb., Hen. VIII, i. 1. 34; phrase-less, Shak Less's Complaint 200; shrave-o-logs, Spectator, no. 616 s. Shak. Lover's Complaint, 226; phrase-o-logy, Spectator, no. 616, a strange compound, in which the o is inserted to fill out the word, and conform it to other words in .o-logy; phrase-o-logi-c-al. Also antiphrasis, para-phrase, peri-phrasis.

PHRENOLOGY, the science of the functions of the mind. (Gk.) *Phrenology, a compound term of modern formation, in very common use, but not very clearly explained by those who employ it; Richardson. = Gk. φρενό-, crude form of φρήν, the mind; and -λογια, from λόγοε, a discourse, which from λέγειν, to speak.

β. The Gk. φρήν is possibly allied to Gk. σπλήν, whence E. spleen. Der.

culty of sounding phth was easily got over by the substitution of t for the compound sound; hence Phillips has 'Phthisis, the phthisick or tissick;' and it is still called 'the tizic.' The spelling tysyke occurs as early as in Skelton, Magnificence, 1, 561. So also Ital. tisica, Span. early as in Skelton, Magnincence, 1, 501. So also Ital. tisica, Span. tisica, tisica, tisica, tisica, consumption. Milton speaks of 'a broken-winded tizzic;' Animadversions on the Remonstrants' Defence (R.).] = Lat. phthisis; Gk. φθίσιε, consumption, a decline, decay. Gk. φθίσιεν, to decay, wane, dwindle. The Gk. φθ answers to Skt. kh, and φθίσιεν is allied to Skt. kshi, to destroy, whence pp. kshita, decayed, and kshitis = φθίσιs; Curtius, ii. 370. Der. phthisi-c. phthisi-c-al.
PHYLACTERY, a charm, amulet, esp. among the Jews, a slip of parchment inscribed with four passages from scripture. (F., -L., -Gk.) Spelt philaterie in Tyndall's version, A. D. 1526; M. E. filaterie, Wyclif, Matt. xxiii. 5. -O. F. filatere, filatere, forms given in Littré. s.v. phylactère; Cotgrave spells it phylacterie. [The e, omitted in Wyclif and Tyndall, was afterwards restored.]—Lat. phylacterium, fylacterium.—Ck. φυλακτήριον, a preservative, amulet; Matt. xxiii. 5. - Gk. φυλακτήρ, a guard, watchman. - Gk. φυλάσσειν (fut. φυλάξω),

The guard. Cf. φύλαξ, a watchman, guard.

(F., -L., -Gk.) 'Throw physic to the dogs;' Macb. v. 3. 47. 'A doctor of phisike;' Chaucer, C. T. 413. Spelt fisike, Seven Sages, ed. Weber, 186. – O. F. phisike, phisique. 'Phisique est une science par le [la] quele on connoist toutes les manieres du cors de l'homme, et par le quele on garde le [la] santé du cors et remue les maladies; Alebrant, fol. 2 (13th cent.; cited in Littré). In Cotgrave's time, the word had a more 'learned' meaning; he gives 'Physique, naturall philosophy,' and 'Physicien, a naturall philosopher.'—Lat. physica, physice, natural science (White). - Gk. φυσική, fem. of φυσικός, natural, physical. - Gk. φυσι-, crude form of φύσιs, nature, essence of a thing; β. Gk. $\phi \dot{\nu} \sigma \iota s = \phi \dot{\nu} - \tau \iota s$, formed with suffix $-\tau \iota s$ with suffix -kos. (Aryan -ta) from the base φυ- appearing in φύειν, to produce, also, to grow, wax. — A BHU, to grow, to be; whence also Skt. bhú, to be, Lat. fore, and E. be. See Be. Der. physic, verb, As You Like It, i. 1. 92; physic-al, physic-al-ly, physic-ist. Also physic-i-an, M.E. fisician, fisicien, spelt fisicion in King Alisaunder, ed. Weber, 3504, from O. F. physicien, coined as if from Lat. physicianus*. Also physiognomy, q.v.; physiology, q.v.

Gk.) Lit. 'the art of knowing a man's disposition from his features; but frequently used as merely equivalent to features or face. M. E. fisnomie, visnomie; also fisnamy, fyssnamy. 'The fairest of fyssnamy that fourmede was cuer;' allit. Morte Arthure, ed. Brock, 3331; cf. I. 1114. O. F. phisonomie, which occurs in the 13th century (Littre); Cotgrave has 'Physiognomie, physiognomic, a guess at the nature, or the inward disposition, by the feature, or outward lineaments; he gives physonomie as an old form of the word. The mod. F. is physionomie. [Observe that, though the g is now inserted in the word, it is not sounded; we follow the F. pronunciation in this respect.] Cf. Ital. and Span. fisonomia, features, countenance. Formed as if from a Lat. physiognomia *, but really corrupted from a longer form physiognomonia, which is merely the Lat. form of the Gk. word. – Gk. φυσιογνωμονία, the art of reading the features; for which the shorter form φυσιογνωμία is occasionally found. - Gk. φυσιογνώμων, skilled in reading features, lit. judging of nature. - Gk. φυσιο, extended from φύσι-, crude form of φύσιs, nature; and γνώμων, an interpreter; see Physic and Gnomon. Der. physiognom-ist. PHYSIOLOGY, the science of nature. (F., -L., -Gk.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - F. physiologie, in Cotgrave. - Lat. physio-logia. - Gk. φυσιολογία, an enquiry into the nature of things. - Gk. logia. - Gk. φυσιολογία, an enquiry into the mature of chings φυσιο-, extended from φύσι-, crude form of φύσιs, nature; and -λογια, which from λένειν. to speak. See a discourse, from λόγοι, speech, which from λέγειν, to speak. See Physics and Legend. Der physiologi-c-al, physiologi-c-al-ly. PIACULAR, expiatory, or requiring expiation. (L.) Little used now. Blount, ed. 1694, has both piacular and piaculous. - Lat. piacularis, expiatory. - Lat. piaculum, an expiation; formed, with suffixes -cu-lu-, from piare, to expiate, propitiate, make holy. - Lat. pius, sacred, pious; see Pious, Expiate.

PIANOFORTE, PIANO, a musical instrument. (Ital., -L.) Generally called piano, by abbreviation. Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. Invented A.D. 1717; first made in London, 1766 (Haydn). So called from producing both soft and loud effects.—Ital. piano, soft; and forte, strong, loud.—Lat. planus, even, level (hence, smooth, soft); and fortis, strong. See Plain and Force (1). Der. pian-ist, a coined word.

PIASTRE, an Italian coin. (F., -Ital., -L., -Gk.) 'Piaster, a coyn in Italy, about the value of our crown;' Blount's Gloss., ed. phrenologi-c-al, phrenologi-st.

PHTHISIS, consumption of the lungs. (L., - Gk.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. [The disease was formerly called 'the phthisich,' as in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. This is an adjectival form, from Lat. Spaine' (Florio). [But the form of the word is Italian.] Closely likened to a plaster or 'flattened piece.'

PIAZZA, a square surrounded by buildings; a walk under a roof supported by pillars. (Ital., -L.) Properly pronounced piazza, as in Italian, with the Ital. vowel-sounds. In rather early use; described in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, at which time it was applied to the piazza in Covent Garden. 'The piazza or market-stead;' Fox, Martyrs, p. 1621, an. 1555 (R.) - Ital. piazza, 'a market-place, the chiefest streete or broad way or place in a town;' Florio. - Lat. platea; see Place. Doublet, place.

PTRROCH. the music of the bag-pipe, a martial tune. (Gaelic.)

PIBROCH, the music of the bag-pipe, a martial tune. (Gaelic.) 'The pibroch resounds, to the piper's loud number, Your deeds on the echoes of dark Loch na Garr;' Byron, Lachin y Gair (1807). Pibroch is not a bag-pipe, any more than duet means a fiddle Edinb. Review, on the same. - Gael. piobaireachd, the art of playing on the bag-pipe, piping; a pipe-tune, a piece of music peculiar to the bag-pipe, piping; a pipe-tune, a piece of music peculiar to the bag-pipe, '&c. = Gael. piobair, a piper. = Gael. piob, a pipe, a bag-pipe; see Pipe.

PICCADILL, PICKADILL, a piece set round the edge of a garment, whether at the top or bottom; most commonly the collar; Nares. (F., = Span, = C.) See Piccadell in Nares. 'Pickadil, the round have or the several divisions set together short whethirt of round hem, or the several divisions set together about the skirt of a garment, or other thing, also a kind of stiff collar, made in fashion of a band; Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. Also in Minsheu, ed. 1627.—
F. piecadille, piecadille; Cot. explains the pl. piecadilles by 'piecadilles, the several divisions or peace fortent tenths. the several divisions or peeces fastened together about the brimme of the collar of a doublet.' The form of the word shews it to be Spanish; it is formed, with dimin. suffix -illo, from Span. picado, pp. of picar, to prick, to pierce with a small puncture (Neuman). picada, a puncture, incision made by puncture; picadura, a puncture, an ornamental gusset in clothes (Neuman). - Span. pica, a pike, a long lance, a word of Celtic origin; see Pike. Der. Piccadilly, the street so named, according to Blount and Nares; first applied to 'a famous ordinary near St. James's.'

PICK, to prick with a sharp-pointed instrument; hence, to peck, to pierce, to open a lock with a pointed instrument, to pluck, &c. (C.) The sense 'to choose' or 'gather flowers' is due to a niceness of choice, as if one were picking them out as a bird with its beak. All the senses ultimately go back to the idea of using a sharply pointed instrument. M. E. pikken, picken, Chaucer, C. T. 14972; in the Six-text edition (B. 4157) the Camb. MS. has pikke, where the rest have pekke. 'Get wolde he teteren and pileken mid his bile' = yet would tear in pieces and pluck with his bill; where another MS. has pikken for pileken; Ancren Riwle, p. 84. [We also find piken (with one k), as in 'to pyken and to weden it,' P. Plowman, B. xvi. 17, probably taken from F. piquer, which is ultimately the same word.]—A. S. pycan, to pick, of rather doubtful authority.

And let him pycan út his eagan = and caused his eyes to be picked out; Two Saxon Chronicles, ed. Earle, an. 796, p. 267. [Thorpe prints pytan.]

β. However, M. E. pikken answers to an A. S. piccan* (=pician), a causal verb, meaning to use a pike or peak or sharp instrument; so also Icel. pikka, to pick, to prick; Du. pikken, to instrument; so also Icel. pikka, to pick, to prick; Du. pikken, to pick; G. picken, to pick, peck.

y. None of these are Teutonic words, but are all borrowed from Celtic.—Irish piccaim, I pick, pluck, nibble; Gael. pioc, to pick, nip, nibble; W. pigo, to pick, peck, prick, choose; Corn. piga, to prick, sting. These are probably derived from the sb. which appears in E. as peak and pike. See Peak, Pike, Pink (1). Der. pick-er, Hamlet, iii. 2. 348; pick-lock, pick-pocket; pick-purse, Chaucer, C. T. 1900; also pickaxe, q.v., picket, q.v., piquet. Also pitch-fork = M. E. pikforke, Prompt. Parv. Perhaps pick-le, pic-nic. Doublets, peck (1), pitch, verb.

PICKAXE, a tool used in digging. (F., -C.) A pickaxe is not an axe at all, but very different; the name is an ingenious popular corruption of the M. E. pikois or pikeys; see my note to P. Plowman, corruption of the M. E. pikois or pikeys; see my note to P. Plowman, C. iv. 465. 'Pykeys, mattokke;' Prompt. Parv. 'Mattok is a C. iv. 465. 'Pykeys, mattokke';' Prompt. Parv. 'Mattok is a pykeys, Or a pyke, as sum men seys;' Rob. of Brunne, Handlyng Synne, 940. The pl. appears as pikeys in the Paston Letters, ed. Gardner, i. 106; and as pikeyses, Riley, Memorials of London, p. 284. — O. F. picois, piquois (Burguy), later picquois, 'a pickax;' Cot.— O. F. picois, piquois (Burguy), later picquois, 'a pickax;' Cot.— F. pic, 'a masons pickax,' Cot.; still called 'a pick' by English workmen. Of Celtic origin.—Bret. pik, a pick or pickaxe. Y. Pike, Pick.

PICKET, a peg for fastening horses; a small outpost. (F.,— C.) The sense of 'outpost' is secondary, and named from the picketing of the horses, i. e. fastening them to pegs. Not in early use; in Phillips, ed. 1706.—F. piquet, spelt picquet in Cotgrave, who explains it as 'a little pickax, also the peg or stick thrust down into pica, which was the old name for the Ordinale: 'quod usitato vocaallied to Ital. piastro, 'a plaister;' Florio. Cf. also O. Ital. plasma, the earth by a surveyor that measures with cord or a chain.' Dimin. 'a kind of coine or plate of silver in Spaine,' id. In fact, the word is a mere variant of Plaster, q.v. The lamina of metal was likened to a plaster or 'fattened piece.'

PICKLE, a liquid in which substances are preserved. (Du.? or E.?) M. E. pikil, pykyl. 'Pykyl, sawce, Picula;' Prompt. Parv. Cf.

Du. pekel, pickle, brine; Low G. pekel, the same (Bremen Wörterb.). β. Origin unknown; the old story that pickle took its name from its inventor, whose name is given as William Beukeler in Pennant's British Zoology, vol. iii, and as Wilhelm Böckel in the Bremen Wörterbuch, is an evident fable; b would not become p, the usual corruption being the other way. By way of mending matters, the name is turned into Pökel in Mahn's Webster, to agree with G. pökel, pickle; but then Pökel will not answer to the Du. form pekel. γ. Wedgwood's suggestion is preferable to this, viz. that the word is E., and the frequentative of the verb to pick, in the sense to cleanse, E., and the requestative of the verb to pick, in the sense to cleanse, with reference to 'the gutting or cleansing of the fish with which the operation is begun.' The prov. E. pickle, to pick, is still in use; and the Prompt. Parv. has: 'pykelynge, purgulacio,' derived from 'pykyn, or clenayn, or cullyn owte the onclene, purgo, purgulo, segrego.' Also 'pykynge, or clensynge, purgacio.' See Pick. Der. pickle, sb., brine; whence the phr. a rod in pickle, i. e. a rod soaked in brine to make the punishment more severe; also to be in a vickle is a in a most pickle, i. c. in a mess.

PICNIC, an entertainment in the open air, at which each person contributes some article to the common table. (E.) Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. The word found its way into French shortly before A.D. 1740 (Littré), and was spelt both ficnic and It also found its way into Swedish before 1788, as we find in Widegren's Swed. Dict. of that date the entry 'picknick, an assembly of young persons of both sexes at a tavern, where every one pays his club, i. c. his share.

3. It has no sense in F. or Swed., and I believe the word to be English; there can be little doubt that the first element is pick, in the sense 'to nibble,' see Webster; cf. slang E. peck, food, peckish, hungry, pecker, appetite, γ . The latter element is difficult to explain; in reduplicated words, with riming elements, one of the elements is sometimes unmeaning, so that we are not bound to find a sense for it. At the same time, we may, perhaps, assign to nick (perhaps knick) the sense of 'trifle;' cf. knick-knacks, trifles, spelt nick-nacks in Hotten's Slang Dictionary. Thus picnic may mean an eating of trifles, a hap hazard repast. Cf. the curious Northern word nicker-pecker, as a name for the woodpecker (Halliwell); though this probably means 'a picker of nicks,' i.e. notches. Knack for 'trifle' is sufficiently common, and knick may be an attenuated form of it. Cf. click-clack, tip as a weakened

PIDDLE, to trifle, deal in trifles. (Scand.?) 'Neuer ceasynge piddelynge about your bowe and shaftes; 'Ascham, Toxophilus. ed. Arber, p. 117. Perhaps a weakened form of peddle, orig. to deal in trifles; hence, to trifle. See Peddle. Hence piddling, paltry, used as an adj.; see Nares, ed. Halliwell.

PIE (1), a magpie; mixed or unsorted printer's type. (F., -I..) The unsorted type is called pie or pi, an abbreviation of pica; from the common use of pica-type. It is ultimately the same word as pier-inagpie, as will appear; see Pie (2). M. E. pie, pye, a magpie, Chaucer, C. T. 10963.—F. pie, 'a pie, pyannat, meggatapy; 'Cot. (See Magpie.).—Lat. piea, a magpie.

B. Doubtless allied to Lat. pieus, a wood-pecker; and prob. to Skt. pika, the Indian cuckoo. There has most likely been a loss of initial s, as we find G. specht, a produced by the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the production of the pro fol. 1, cited in Procter, On the Book of Common Prayer, p. 8. The name pica, lit. magpie, was doubtless given to these rules from their confused appearance, being printed in the old black-letter type on white the old black-letter type on white paper, so that they resembled the colours of the magpic. β . The word pica is still retained as a printer's term, to denote certain sizes of type; and a hopeless mixture of types is pie. ¶ In the oath 'by cock and pie,' Merry Wives, i. 1. 316, cock is for the name of God, and pie is the Ordinal or service-book.

PIE (3), a pasty. (C.?) M. E. pie, Chaucer, C. T. 386. Certainly not a contraction from Du. pastei, a pasty, as suggested in Mahn's Webster, since we had the word pasty in English without going to Holland for it. This desperate guess shews how difficult it is to assign a reasonable etymology. β . We find Irish pighe, a pie, Gael. pighe, pigheann, a pie. If these are true Celtic words, we have here the obvious origin; the word is just of the character to be retained as a household word from the British. Cf. Irish pighe-feola, a pasty, lit. flesh-pie, in which feol, flesh, is certainly Irish.

7. I venture to suggest that the orig. sense of pighe may have been 'a pot,' with reference to the vessel in which the pie was made; cf. Gael.

pige, a jar, pot. See Piggin.

PTEBALD, of various colours, in patches. (Hybrid: F., - L.; and C.) 'A piebald steed;' Dryden, tr. of Virgil, Æn. ix. l. 54. Richardson quotes it in the form 'A pie-ball'd steed;' which is a correct old spelling. Compounded of pie and bald.

β. Here pie signifies 'like the magpic,' as in the word pied. Bald, formerly ball'd or balled, signifies 'streaked,' from W. bal, having a white Bald, formerly streak on the forchead, said of a horse. See further under Pie (1) and Bald. A like compound is skew-bald, i. c. streaked in a skew or irregular way.

PIECE, a portion, bit, single article. (F., -L.?) M. E. pece, Rob. of Glouc, p. 555, l. 5; the spelling piece is rarer, but occurs in Gower, C. A. i. 295, l. 5; the spelling piece is rarer, but occurs in Gower, C. A. i. 295, l. 5. — O. F. piece, mod. F. pièce, a piece. Cf. Span, pieza, a piece; Prov. pessa, pesa (Bartsch); Port. peça; Ital. pezza.

β. Of unknown origin; we find Low Lat. petium, a piece of land, used as early as A. D. 730. This is clearly a related word, merely differing in gender. As F. piège, a net, is from Lat. pedium, we should expect where to come from a form tetica.* we should expect pièce to come from a form petica *. Scheler draws attention to the use of Low Lat. pedica in the sense of a piece of land, and suspects an ultimate connection with pes (gen. pedis), a foot. Cf. Lat. petiolus, a little foot, a stem or stalk of fruits; see Petiole. Note also Gk. neia, a foot, also the hem or border of a garment. y. Otherwise, Diez suggests a connection with W. peth, a part, Bret. pez, a piece; in which case the word is of Celtic origin; but the W. th does not suit. Der. piece, vb., Hen. V, prol. 23; piece-less, piec-er, piece-work; also piece-meal, q. v.

PIECE-MEAI, by portions at a time. (Hybrid; F. and E.)

M. E. pece-mele; Rob. of Glouc. has by pece-mele, p. 216, l. 20. The word is reduplicated, meaning 'by piece-pieces.' For the first element, see Piece.

B. The second element is the M. E. termination

-mele, found also in flokmele, in a flock or troop, lit. 'in flock-pieces,'

Change C. T. refer limited limb from limb lit 'in limb-pieces' Chaucer, C. T. 7962; lim-mele, limb from limb, lit. 'in limb-pieces, Layamon, 25618. A fuller form of the suffix is -melum, as in wukemelun, week by week, Ormulum, 536; hipyllmelum, by heaps, Wyclif, Wisdom, xviii. 25. See Koch, Eng. Gram. ii. 292. M. E. melum = A.S. mélum, dat. pl. of mél, a portion; see Meal (2).

PIEPOWDER COURT, a summary court of justice formerly held at fairs. (F., - L.) Explained in Blount's Nomolexicon, ed. 1601; he says, 'so called because they are most usual in summer, and suiters to this court are commonly country-clowns with dusty feet.' At any rate, the Lat. name was curia pedis pulverizati, the court of the dusty foot; see Ducange, s. v. curia. The E. piepowder is a mere corruption of O. F. pied pouldre, i.e. dusty foot. = F. pied, a foot, from Lat. acc. pedem; and O. F. pouldre, dusty, pp. of pouldre, poudrer, to cover with dust, from pouldre, poudre, dust. See Foot and Powder. ¶ Blount refers us to the statute 17 Edw. IV.

PIER, a mass of stone-work. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) In Shak. Merch. Ven. i. 1. 19. M. E. pere. 'Pere, or pyle of a brygge [bridge], or other fundament' [foundation]; Prompt. Parv. [The alleged A. S. per or pere is unauthorised.] - O. F. piere, later pierre, a stone. A. S. per or pere is unauthorised. — O. P. pere, later piere, a scone. [With the M. E. spelling of pere for piere, compare that of pece for piece.] — Lat. petra, a rock, stone. — Gk. πέτρα, a rock; cf. πέτρος, a mass of rock. Root unknown. — Der. pier-glass, properly a glass hung on the stone-work between windows; see Webster.

PIERCE, to thrust through, make a hole in, enter. (F., -L.?)

bulo dicitur Pica, sive directorium sacerdotum, Sarum Breviary. violent; it is, however, accepted by Mahn and E. Müller. Pertuisier, occurring in the 12th century, is from pertuis, a hole, and is parallel to Ital. pertugiare, to pierce, from pertugio, a hole; and to Prov. pertusar, to pierce, from pertuis, a hole. y. The Ital. pertugio pertusar, to pierce, from pertuis, a hole. y. The Ital. pertugio answers to a Low Lat. pertusium*, not found, but a mere extraogen from Lat. pertusus, pp. of pertundere, to thrust through, bore through, pierce, a compound of per, through, and tundere, to beat; see Contuse.

5. The suggestion of Diez is supported by these considerations, (1) that the Lat. per through seems contains to he siderations, (1) that the Lat. per, through, seems certainly to be involved in F. percer; and (2) that Lat. pertundere gives the exact sense. Ennius has latu' pertudit hasta (White), which is exactly 'the spear pierced his side.' Der. pierc-er; also pierce-able, spelt perceable in Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 7.

PÎETY, the quality of being pious. (F., -L.) In Shak. Timon, iv. I. 15; and prob. earlier. — F. pieté, piety; omitted by Cotgrave, but given in Sherwood's index. — Lat. pietatem, acc. of pietas, piety. Formed with suffix -tas (Aryan -ta), from pie-, put for the crude form of pius, pious; see Pious. Doublet, pity.

PIG, a porker, the young of swine. (E.?) M. E. pigge, Ancren Riwle, p. 204, l. 9. Prof. Earle kindly informs me that he has found the A. The origin of the word is unknown, and it is doubtful if it is a Teutonic form, as Teutonic words rarely begin with p.+Du. bigge, big, a pig. +Low G. bigge, a pig, also, a little child; 'de biggen lopet enem under de vöte,' the children run under one's feet; Bremen Wörterbuch. Cf. also Dan. pige, Swed. piga, Icel. pika, a girl. Der. pig, verb; pigg-isk, pigg-er-y; pig-head-ed, used by Ben Jonson (R.), pigtail; pig-nut, Temp. ii. 2. 172. Also pig-iron: 'A sow of iron is an ingot; Pano di metallo, a mass, a sow or ingot of metal (Florio). When the furnace in which iron is melted is tapped, the iron is allowed to run into one main channel, called the sow, out of which a number of smaller streams are made to run at right angles. These are compared to a set of pigs sucking their dam, and the iron is called sow and pig iron respectively. Probably the likeness was suggested by the word sow having previously signified an ingot.— Wedgwood. Add to this, that sow may very well have been applied Wedgwood. Add to this, that sow may very well have been applied jocularly to an ingot, owing to its bulk and weight. Ray mentions these sows and pigs in his 'Account of Iron-work;' see Ray's Glossary, ed. Skeat (E. D. S.), Gloss. B. 15, p. 13.

PICEON, the name of a bird. (F.,-L.) Spelt pyione (= pijon) in the Prompt. Parv. p. 396; pygeon in Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox (1481), ed. Arber, p. 58.—F. pigeon, 'a pigeon, or dove;' Cot. Cf. Span. pichon, a young pigeon; Ital. piccione, pippione, a pigeon.—Lat. pipionem, acc. of pipio, a young bird, lit. 'a chirper' or 'piper.'— Lat. pipire, to chirp, cheep, pipe; see Pipe, Peep. Of imitative origin, from the cry pi, pi of the young bird. Der. pigeon-hole, pigeon-hole, pigeon-hole, pigeon-livered, Hamlet, ii. 2. 605.

PIGMY, the same as Pygmy, q. v. (F., = L., = Gk.)

PIKE, a sharp-pointed weapon, a fish. (C.)

1. M. E. pike, pyke, PIKE, a sharp-pointed weapon, a fish. (C.) 1. M. E. pike, pyke, in the sense of a pointed staff, P. Plowman, B. v. 482; spelt pic, in the sense of spike, Layamon, 30752. [The A. S. pic is unauthorised.] Of Celtic origin. — Irish pice, a pike, fork; cf. picidh, a pike or long spear, a pickaxe; Gael. pic, a pike, weapon, pickaxe; W. pig, a point, pike, bill, beak, picell, a javelin; Bret. pik, a pick, pickaxe. B. The orig. sense is 'sharp point' or 'spike;' pike, peak, beak are all variants of the same word. See also Pick, Peck. 7. The F. words pic, piquer, bec are likewise of Celtic origin. 8. There has been an early loss of initial s: cf. Lat stica, a spike. See has been an early loss of initial s; cf. Lat. spica, a spike. See Spike.

2. M. E. pike, a fish; Bet is, quod he, a pike than a pikerel, Chaucer, C. T. 9293. So called from its sharply-pointed jaws; see Hake. The young pike is called a pikerel, or pickerel (Nares), formed with dimin. suffixes -er and -el, like cock-er-el from M. E. percen, Rob. of Glouc. p. 17, l. 10. — F. percer, 'to pierce, gore;' Cot. [Florio has Ital. perciato, pierced through, but no verb perciare; it looks as if borrowed from French.] β. Origin uncertain; the suggestion in Diez, that percer is contracted from vi. 105. Also pick, vb., peck, pitch, vb.; pickaze; piccadill, picket, O. F. pertuisier, with the same sense, is ingenious, but somewhat piquet, picnic. Doublets, peak, pick, sb., pique, sb., beak, spike. PILASTER, a square pillar or column, usually set in a wall.

PILCHARD, the name of a fish. (C.?) 'A Pilcher, or Pilchard; 'Minsheu, ed. 1627. Spelt pilcher in Shak. Tw. Nt. iii. 1. 39 (first folio). Of uncertain origin; but prob. Celtic; pilchards are abundant off the Cornish coast. Cf. Irish pilseir, a pilchard. We may also note Irish pelog, Gael. peilig, a porpoise; W. pilcod, minnows. The final d in the mod. E. word is excrescent.

PILCROW, a curious corruption of Paragraph, q.

PILE (1), a roundish mass, heap. (F., -L.) In Shak. Cor. iii. 1. 207. - F. pile, 'a ball to play with, a hand-ball, also a pile, heap;' Cot. - Lat. pila, a ball. Perhaps allied to Gk. πάλλα, a ball. Der. pile, verb, Temp. iii. 1. 17. And see piles, pill (1).

PILE (2), a pillar; a large stake driven into the earth to support foundations. (L.) M. E. pile, pyle; P. Plowman, B. xix. 360; C. xxii. 366.—A. S. pil, a stake; A. S. Chron. ed. Thorpe. p. 5, col. 2, 1. 6 from bottom. — Lat. pila, a pillar; a pier or mole of stone. But the sense of 'sharp stake' is due rather to Lat. pilum, a javelin; cf. A. S. pil, a javelin, stake, Grein. There seems to have been some confusion in the uses of the word. Der. pile-driver; also pillar, q. v., pil-aster, q. v.

¶ Pile in the heraldic sense is an imitation of a pil-aster, q.v. ¶ Pile in the heraldic sense is an imitation of a sharp stake. In the old phrase cross and pile, equivalent to the modern head and tail, the allusion is to the stamping of money. One side bore a cross; the other side was the under side in the stamping, and took its name from the pile or short pillar (Lat. pila) on which the coin rested. Thus Cot. translates O. F. pile (which here = $p\bar{\imath}la$, not $p\bar{\imath}la$) by 'the $p\bar{\imath}le$, or under-iron of the stamp, wherein money is stamped; and the pile-side of a piece of monie, the opposite whereof is a crosse; whence, Ie n'ay croix ne pile'= I have neither cross nor pile.

PILE (3), a hair, fibre of wool. (L.) In Shak. All's Well, iv. 5. 103; cf. three-piled, L. L. L. v. 2. 407. Directly from Lat. pilus, a hair (the F. form being poil). Der. pil-ose, three-piled. Also de-pil-

PILES, hemorrhoids. (L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. Spelt pyles in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 9. Small tumours; directly from Lat. pila, a ball; see Pile (1).

PILFER, to steal in a small way. (F., -L.?) In Shak. Hen. V, i. 2. 142. - O. F. pelfrer, to pilfer. - O. F. pelfre, booty, pelf. See Pelf. Der. pilfer-ings, K. Lear, ii. 2. 151.

PILGRIM, a wanderer, stranger. (F., -L.) M.E. pilgrim, Change G. T. o. college from the large in Language and 2020.

Chaucer, C. T. 26; earlier forms pilegrim, pelegrim, Layamon, 30730, 30744. [The final m is put for n, by the frequent interchange between liquids.]—O. F. pelegrin*, only found in the corrupter form pelerin, 'a pilgrim;' Cot. Cf. Prov. pellegrins, a pilgrim (Bartsch), Port. and Span. peregrino, Ital. peregrino and pellegrino (shewing the change from r to 1). = Lat. peregrinus, a stranger, foreigner; used in Heb. xi.

13, where the A. V. has 'pilgrims.' Orig, an adj. signifying strange, foreign, formed from the sb. pereger, a traveller. This sb. was also orig. an adj. signifying 'on a journey,' abroad or away from the specific through a foreign country.' Let the through a new from the second strains through a foreign country.' lit. 'passing through a (foreign) country. - Lat. per, through; and ager, a land, country, cognate with E. acre. The vowel-change from a in ager to e in pereger is regular. See Per- and Acre. Der. pilgrim-age, Chaucer, C.T. 12, from O.F. pelegrinage*, only preserved as pelerinage, 'a peregrination or pilgrimage;' Cot. Doublet, peregrine, chiefly used of the peregrine or 'foreign' falcon, Chaucer, C. T.

PILL (1), a little ball of medicine. (F., -L.) 'Pocyons, electuaryes, or pylles;' Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 5. A contracted form of pilule. - F. pilule, 'a physical pill;' Cot. - Lat. pilula, a little ball, globule, pill. Dimin. of pila, a ball; see Pile (1).

PILL (2), to rob, plunder. (F., -L.) Also spelt peel; see Peel (2). [But the words peel, to strip, and peel, to plunder are from different sources, though much confused; we even find pill used in the sense 'te strip.' The sense of 'stripping' goes back to Lat. pellis, skin, or to pilare, to deprive of hair, from pilus, hair; as shewn under Peel (1).] M. E. pillen, Chaucer, C. PILLAR, a column, support. (F., -L.) In early use. M. E. piler, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, i. 281, l. 29, -O. F. piler (Littré), later pilier, 'a pillar;' Cot. Cf. Span. and Port. pilar, a pillar. - Low Lat. pilare, a pillar; formed (with adj. suffix) from Lat. pila, a pier of stone; see Pile (2).

PILLION, the cushion of a saddle, a cushion behind a saddle. (C.) Spenser speaks of a horseman's 'shaunck-pillion (shauk-pillion) without stirrops;' View of the State of Ireland, Globe ed. p. 639. without surrops; view of the state of retained, whose ed. p. 039, col. 2, l. 21. [Not the same word as pilion, a kind of hat, in P. Plowman's Crede, 839; which is from Lat. pileus.]—Irish pilliun, pilliun, a pack-saddle; Gael. pillean, pillin, a pack-saddle, a cloth put under a pannel or rustic saddle. Obviously from Irish pill, a covering, better spelt peall, a skin, hide, couch, pillow. So also Gael. peall, a skin, hide, coverlet, mat, whence also peillic, a covering of skins or coarse hide, coverlet, mat, whence also petitic, a covering of skins or coarse cloth. And cf. W. pilyn, a garment, clout, pillion, allied to pilen, cuticle. \(\beta\). The Irish and Gael. peall is cognate with Lat. pellis, a skin, and E. fell, a skin. See Pell, Fell (2).

PILLORY, a wooden frame with an upright post, to which criminals were fastened for punishment. (F.) M. E. pilory, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 345; pillory, P. Plowman, B. iii, 78, C. iv. 79 (see my note on the line). \(-\text{F}\). pilori, 'a pillory; 'Cot. \(\beta\). Of unknown origin; it were easy to connect it with O. F. piler (E. pilar) if it were not for the existence of forms which cannot thus be disif it were not for the existence of forms which cannot thus be disposed of, such as Port. pelourinho, Prov. espitlori, Low Lat. pillorium, spiliorium, &c., cited by Littré and Scheler. There seems to have been a loss of initial s.

PILLOW, a cushion for the head. (L.) M. E. pilwe, Gower, C. A. i. 142, last line. The change from M. E. -we to E. -ow is regular; cf. arrow, M. E. arwe. But it is less easy to explain the M. E. form, which we should expect to be pulö, as the A. S. is pyle, Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, b. v. c. 11. § 1. However, both M. E. pilwe and A. S. pyle orosius, D. V. C. 11. § 1. However, Doth M. E. pitwe and A. S. pyte are alike due to Lat. puluinus, a cushion, pillow, bolster; a word of uncertain origin.

B. The Lat. puluinus also gave rise to Du. peuluu, a pillow, and G. pfühl, a pillow. E. Müller cites the M. H. G. phulwe, O. H. G. phulwi; and we may note that the M. H. G. phulwe resembles M. E. pilwe, whilst the G. pfühl comes near to A. S. pyle.

Der. pillow, vb., Milton, Ode on Christ's Nativity, 1. 231; pillow-case. PILOT, one who conducts ships in and out of harbour. (F., - Du.?) Spelt pylot in Gascoigne, Voyage into Holland, A.D. 1572, l. 44; cf. Macb. i. 3. 28.—F. pilot, 'a pilot or steersman;' Cot. Mod. F. pilote. Connected with piloter, to take soundings, a word used by Palsgrave, cd. 1852, p. 709.

B. This early use of piloter as a verb renders it very probable (as admitted by Littré and Scheler) that the F. word is borrowed from Du. piloot, a pilot, rather than the contrary, as supposed by Diez. The O. Du. form was piloot (Hexham); a word which is immediately explicable as being equivalent to pijl-loot, i. c. one who uses the sounding-lead; compounded of Du. pijlen, 'to sound the water' (Hexham), and loot, lead. Hexham also gives: 'een dieploot, grondi-loot, ofte [or] sinck-loot, a pilots or a saylers plummet, to sound the depth of the water; and lootmans water, water to sound. γ. So also G. peilen, to sound; peil (as a nautical term), water-mark; peil-loth, a lead, plummet.

8. It is clear that the lit. sense of Du. pijloot (= G. peilloth) must have been 'a plummet or sounding-lead; the transference in application from the plummet to the man who used it is curious, but there are several such examples in language; e. g. we call a sailor 'a blue-jacket,' and a soldier 'a red-coat;' we speak of 'a troop of horse,' meaning 'horse-men;' and the man who wields the bow-oar in a boat is simply called 'bow.' Du. pijk, it is the same word as E. pile, a great stake, from Lat. pilum; Hexham has the pl. pijlen, 'piles, great stakes.' The earliest contrivance for sounding shallow water must certainly have been a long pole. The O. Du. pijle, peyle, 'a plummet of lead' (Hexham), is perhaps, a mere derivative from the verb pijlen. The Du. loot, G. loth, is E. lead. See, therefore, Pile (2) and Lead (2). Der. pilot, vb., pilot-age, pilot-cloth, pilot-fish.

PIMENTO, all-spice or Jamaica pepper; or, the tree producing it. (Port., -L.) Also called pimenta; both forms are in Todd's Johnson. - Port. pimenta (Vieyra); there is also (according to Mahn) a form pimento. The Spanish has both pimienta and pimiento; but the E. word clearly follows the Port. form.

3. The O. F. piment meant 'a spiced drink,' and hence the M. E. piment, Rom. of the Rose, iii (R.) Probably equivalent to F. pp. pimpés, but in any case connected with the F. verb pimper.—F. pimpés, 'sprucified, finified, curiously pranked, comptly tricked up; 'pp. of pimper, 'to sprucifie, or finifie it;' Cot. It may have merely meant 'a spruce fellow,' and have easily acquired a bad sense; but Littré notes that pimper is merely a nasalised form from piper, which not only meant 'to pipe, but also, as Cotgrave says, 'to cousen, deceive, cheat, gull, overreach.' In this view, a pimp is 'a cheat' as well as 'a spruce fellow;' the combination of meanings suits the E. word well enough. cites the Prov. verb pimpar, to render elegant, from the Prov. sb. pimpa, equivalent to F. pipeau, meaning (1) a pipe, (2) a bird-call, (3) a snare; with an allusion to an old proverb piper en une chose, to pipe in a thing, i. e. to excel in it. Hence pimper came to mean, (1) to pipe, (2) to excel, (3) to beautify or make smart. Cf. also F. pimp-to pipe, (2) to excel, (3) to beautify or make smart. Cf. also F. pimpant, 'spruce' (Cot.), especially applied to ladies whose dress attracted the eye (Littré).

Y. Thus pimper is from piper, to pipe; see Pipe.

PIMPERNEL, the name of a flower. (F., -L.) Spelt pympernel in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helh, b. iii. c. 5. 'Hee pimpernelle, pimpernelle;' Wright's Voc. i. 191, col. 1. -O. F. pimpernelle, pimpinelle, 'the burnet,' Cot.; mod. F. pimpernelle. Cf. Span. pimpinela, burnet; Ital. pimpinella, pimpernell.

B. Diez regards these words as corrupted from Lat. bipinella = bipennula, a dimin. from bipennis, c. double-winged. The pimpernel was confused with burnet (see i.e. double-winged. The pimpernel was confused with burnet (see Prior), and the latter has from two to four scale-like bracts at the base of the calyx; according to Johns, Flowers of the Field. y. If this be right, we trace the word back to bi-, for bis, twice; and penna, a wing; see Bi- and Pen. 8. Diez also cites Catalan pampinella, Piedmontese pampinela, but regards these as corrupter forms, since we can hardly connect pimpernel with Lat. pampinus, a tendril of a vine.

PIMPLE, a small pustule. (L.) Spelt pimpel in Minsheu, ed. 1627. A nasalised form of A.S. pipel, appearing in the pres. part. pipligend, pippigend, pimply; A.S. Lecchdoms, i. 234, note 9, i. 266, note 16. [The alleged A.S. pinpel is Lye's misprint for winpel; Wright's Voc. i. 26, l. 1.] Apparently not an E. word, but a nasalised form of Lat. papula, a pimple. Closely allied nasal forms appear in Gk. πομφόs, a bubble, a blister on the skin; and in Lithuanian pampti, to swell. Thus the orig. sense is 'swelling.' - ✓ PAP, PAMP, to swell; Fick, i. 661. Cf. also Skt. piplu, a freckle, mole, pupputa, a swelling at the palate or teeth; also F. pompete, 'a pumple or pimple on the nose, or chin,' Cot.; and (perhaps) W. pump, a bump.

PIN, a peg, a small sharp-pointed instrument for fastening things together. (L.) M. E. pinne, Chaucer, C. T. 196, 10630. Perhaps from an A. S. pinn, said to mean a pen, also a pointed style for writing; but this form is due to Somner, and unauthorised. The M. E. pinne or pin often means 'a peg' rather than a small pin in the modern sense.

B. We also find Irish pinne, a pin, peg, spigot, stud, pion, a pin, peg; Gael. pinne, a pin, peg, spigot; W. pin, a pin, style, pen Du. pin, pin, peg; O. Du. penne, a wooden pin, peg (Hexham); pinne, a small spit or ironshod staff, the pinnacle of a steeple (id.); Swed. pinne, a peg, Dan. pind, a (pointed) stick; Icel. pinni, a pin; G. pinnen, to pin; penn, a peg. γ . All borrowed words from Lat. pinna, variant of penna, a feather, pen, fin, pinnacle. In late Lat. penna meant a probe (Ducange); the various senses of the derived words easily suggest that penna, orig. a feather, came to mean, (1) a pen, (2) a style for writing on wax. From the latter sense the transition to the sense of 'peg' was easy. The double form of the Lat. word appears again in Du. and G. See Pen (2). Der. pin, verb, L. L. V. 2. 321, M. E. pinnen, Prompt. Parv.; pin-afore, so called because formerly pinned in front of a child, afterwards enlarged and made to tie behind; pin-case, Skelton, Elinor Rummyng, 529; pin-cushion; pin-money, Spectator, no. 295; pin-point; pinn-er, (1) a pin-maker, (2) the lappet of a head-dress, Gay, Shepherd's Week, Past. 5; pin-t-le (=pin-et-el), a little pin, a long iron bolt (Webster).

PINCH, to nip, squeeze, gripe. (F.) M. E. pinchen, Chaucer, C. T. 328; P. Plowman, B. xiii. 371.—F. pincer. 'to pinch, nip, twitch;'

The Charmsev dialect, pinchier; Métivier.

B. This is a masalised form of O. Ital. picciare, pizzare, 'to pinch, to snip' (Florio), mod. Ital. pizzicare, to pinch, Span. pizcar, to pinch (with which cf. Span. pinchar, to prick, to pierce with a small point); see Diez for other related forms.

7. These verbs are from the sb. which appears as Ital. pinzo, a sting, a goad, O. Ital. pizza, an itching (Florio), Span. pizco, a pinch, nip. γ . The orig. sense seems to have been 'a slight pricking with some small pointed instrument;' the word being formed from a base pit (probably Celtic) allied to W. pid, a sharp point. Cf. Du. pitsen, pinsen, to pinch (Hexham). See Petty. Der. pinch-er; pinch-ers or pinc-ers, M.E. pynsors, Wright's Vocab. i. 180, l. 5, with which cf. F. pinces, 'a pair of pincers,' Cot.

PINK (2), half-shut, applied to the eyes. (Du., -C.)
Obsolete.
PINCHBECK, the name of a metal. (Personal name; F.)

Probably equivalent to F. pp. pimpés, but in any case con- | Johnson's Dict.; also in Ash's Dict., ed. 1775. So named from the inventor, Mr. Christopher Pinchbeck, in the 18th century; see Notes and Queries, Ser. I. vol. xii. p. 341; Ser. II. vol. xii. p. 81; and Hotten's Slang Dict.

3. The name is French, and like many surnames, was orig a nickname. It means having a beak or mouth like pincers; from F. pince, 'a pincer,' Cot.; and bee, a heak. See Pinch and Beak. PINDAR, PINNER, one who impounds stray cattle. (E.) See the anonymous play, 'A pleasant conceyted Comedie of George-a-Greene, the pinner of Wakefield,' London, 1599. Spelt pinder in the reprint of 1632. M. E. pinder, pinner; spelt pyndare, pinnar in Prompt. Parv. p. 400; and see Way's note. Formed, with suffix er of the agent, from A. S. pyndan, to pen up; Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Pastoral Care, c. xxxix, ed. Sweet, p. 282, l. 13. Pyndan is formed (with the usual vowel-change from u to y) from the A. S. sb. pund, a pound for cattle; see Pound (2), Pinfold. The spelling pinner is due to a supposed connection with the verb to pen up; but there is no real relationship. See Pen (1).

PINE (1), a cone-bearing, resinous tree. (L.) M. E. pine, Legends of the Holy Rood, ed. Morris, p. 70, l. 307; spelt pigne, Gower, C. A. ii. 161, l. 10.—A. S. pin; pin-treow, a pine-tree; Wright's Vocab. i, 32.—Lat. pinus.

B. Lat. pinus is for pic-nus, i. e. the tree producing pitch; from pic-, stem of pix, pitch. So also Gk. nirw, a pine, is connected with niroa, Attic nirra, pitch. See Pitch (1). Der. pineapple, because the fruit resembles a pine-cone; pine-cone; pine-ry, a place for pine-apples, a coined word. Also pinn-ace.

PINE (2), to suffer pain, waste away, be consumed with sorrow.

L.) M. E. pinen, almost always transitive, signifying 'to torment;' (L.) M. E. pinen, almost always transitive, signifying to forment; Rom. of the Rose, 3511; Chaucer, C. T. 15065; merely formed from the sb. pine, pain, torment, Chaucer, C. T. 1326, 6369.—A. S. pinan, to torment, A. S. Chron. an. 1137.—A. S. pin, pain, torment, A. S. Chron. an. 1137.—B. Not a Teut. word, but borrowed from Lat. poena, pain; see Pain. Hence also G. pein, Du. pijn, &c. PINFOLD, a pound for cattle. (E.) In Shak. K. Lear, ii. 2. 9. Put for pind-fold, i. e. pound-fold; see P. Plowman, B. xvi. 264, C. xix 282 where we find poundfold poundfold poundfold. P. Poundfold.

Put for pind-fold, i. e. pound-fold; see P. Plowman, B. xvi. 264, C. xix. 282, where we find poundfold, pondfold, pynfold. See Pound (2). PINION, a wing, the joint of a wing. (F., -L.) Used in Shak. to mean 'feather,' Antony, iii. 12. 4; he also has nimble-pinioned = nimble-winged, Rom. ii. 5. 7. M. E. pinion. 'Pynion of a wynge, pennula;' Prompt. Parv. = F. pignon, only given by Cotgrave in the sense of 'a finiall, cop, or small pinacle on the ridge or top of a house,' like mod. F. pignon, a gable-end. The sense of the E. word was probably derived from some dialectal F. pignon; we find O. F. Airman in the sense of 'pennon on a lance.' for which Burguy gives a was probably derived from some dialectal F. pignon; we find O. F. pignon in the sense of 'pennon on a lance,' for which Burguy gives a quotation; and the Span. piñon means 'pinion,' as in English.

B. Both F. pignon and Span. piñon are derivatives from Lat. pinna, variant of penna, a wing, feather, fin. In Low Lat. pinna means 'a peak,' whence the sense of F. pignon; the same sense appears in Lat. pinnaculum. See Pen (2), Pennon, Pinnacle.

The E. pinion, in the sense of 'a small wheel working with teeth into another,' is really the same word; it is taken from F. pignon, with the same sense (Littré), which is from Lat. pinna, in the sense of 'float of a water-wheel (White). Cotgrave gives 'pinon, the pinnion of a clock. Der. pinion, verb, lit. to fasten the pinions of a bird, hence, to tie a man's elbows together behind him, K. Lear, iii. 7. 23.

PINK (1), to pierce, stab, prick. (C.) Esp. used of stabbing so as to produce only a small hole, as, for instance, with a thin rapier. The word, though unusual, is still extant. 'Pink, to stab or pierce; in the days of rapier-wearing a professed duellist was said to be "a regular pinker and driller;" Slang Dictionary. Todd quotes from Addison's Drummer: 'They grew such desperate rivals for her, that one of them pinked the other in a duel.' Cotgrave has: 'Eschiffeur, a cutter or pinker.' Shak. has pink'd porringer, i.e. a cap reticulated or pierced with small holes, Hen. VIII, v. 4. 50. M. E. pinken, to prick. 'Heo pynkes with heore penne on heore parchemyn' pinken, to prick. 'Heo pynkes with heore penne on heore parchemyn' = they prick with their pens on their parchment; Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 156. B. It is best to regard pink as the regular nasalised form of pick, in the sense 'to peck;' from a Celtic source, viz. Gael. and Irish pioc, W. pigo, Com. piga, to prick, sting; see Pick. In fact, the E. pink, to cut silk cloth in round holes or eyes (Bailey), is parallel to O. F. piquer, with the same sense (Cotgrave). Y. E. Müller derives pink from A.S. pyngan, to pierce, Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Pastoral, c. xl, ed. Sweet, p. 296, l. 7, which is merely borrowed from Lat. pungere, to prick. The Lat. pungere (base pug, pt. t. pupugi), is to be referred to YPIK, to prick, pierce; cf. Gk. min-pos, bitter; see Pungent.

6. The root is the same either pr. t. pupugi, is to be referred to A FIR, to prick, pierce; cf. Gr. min-pos, bitter; see Pungent.

8. The root is the same either way.

9 The A. S. pyngan is represented, not by pink, but by prov. E. ping, to push, M. E. pingen, to prick, Romance of Otuel, p. 55. See also Pinch, which is an allied word.

word as Pink (1), from a Celtic source pic, a point. The same notion comes out in the verb to pinch; also in prov. E. pink, a minnow, i.e. a very small fish. See also Pink(3). Der. pink-eyed, q.v. PINK (3), the name of a flower, and of a colour. (C.) Spelt pincke, as the name of a flower, Spenser, Shep. Kal. April, 1.136. [The name of the colour is due to that of the flower, as in the case of violet, mauve; in the case of carnation, the flower is named from its colour. Again, the phrase 'pink of perfection' is prob. due to Shakespeare's 'pink of courtesy,' a forced phrase, as remarked by Mercutio; Romeo, ii. 4. 62.] The flower seems to have been named from the delicately cut or peaked edges of the petals; see Pink (1) and Pink (2). Or else from a resemblance to a bud or small eye see Pink (2); an application which may easily have been suggested by the corresponding use of O. F. oeillet, which Cotgrave translates by the corresponding use of O. F. oeillet, which Cotgrave translates by 'a little eie. also, an oilet-hole; also, the young bud of a tree, &c., also, a gilliflower, also, a pink.' The use of pink in the sense to pierce, to cut silk cloth into round holes or eyes, has already been noted; see Pink (1). We may note 'pink'd porringer,' i.e. cap ornamented with cyclet-holes, in Shak. Hen. VIII, v. 4. 50. The prov. E. pink, a chaffinch, is W. pinc, a chaffinch, connected with W. pinc, smart, brisk, gay, fine; this is altogether a different word, and prob. allied to E. Finch. We cannot, in opposition to phonetic laws, derive E. pink from F. pince a pink: different word, and prob. allied to E. Finch.

We cannot, in opposition to phonetic laws, derive E. pink from F. pince, a pink; this F. pince also means 'a pincer,' or 'croe, great barre, or lever of iron; also, the view or footing of a deere, the tip, or edge of the bottome of a beast's hoof,' Cot., and is evidently connected with pincer, to nip, pinch. In this case, the F. pince, a pink, clearly takes its name from its peaked edges, since F. pince, a pink, clearly takes its name from its peaked edges, since F. pincer is to be referred to a radical meaning 'pointed;' see Pinch. In any case, the ultimate origin of pink, in all senses but (4), is from a Celtic pic, a peak.

PINK (4), a kind of boat. (Du.) See Nares. 'Hoy's, pinks, and sloops;' Crabbe, The Borough, let. 1, l. 52.—Du. pink, a fishing-boat. The derivation is very curious, and is pointed to by Scheler in a note to the 4th edition of Diez; though Scheler fails after all to explain it. Pink is a corruption of O. Du. espincke, as shewn by Hexham, who has: 'Espincke, or pincke, a pinke, or a small fisher's boat.' This is the same word as Swed. esping, Icel. espingr, a long boat; formed with suffix -ing from esp., signifying 'aspen,' of which wood it must have been first made. Cf. Iccl. espi, aspen-wood; O. Du.

espe, 'an aspe-tree;' Hexham. See Aspen.

PINK-EYED, having small eyes. (Hybrid; Du., -C.; and E.) 'Them that were pinke-eied and had very small eies, they terned ocella;' Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xi. c. 37 (on the Eye). See Nares. 'Plumpy Bacchus, with pink [half-closed] eyne; 'Antony, ii. 7. 121.

Du. pinken, to wink. Hexham has: 'pincke, light, or an eye; pincken, ofte [or] pinck-oogen, to shut the eyes; pimpooge, ofte [or] pimpoogen, pinck-eyes, or pinck-eyed.' See further under Pink (2). PINNACE, a small ship. (F., - Ital., - L.) In Shak. Merry Wives, i. 3. 89. - F. pinasse, 'the pitch-tree; also, a pinnace;' Cot. -O. Ital. pinaccia, pinazza, 'a kind of ship called a pinnace;' Florio. So called because made of pine-wood.—Lat. pinus, a pinc; see Pine (1).

PINNACLE, a slender turret, small spire. (F.,—L.) M. E. pinacle, Gower, C. A. ii. 124, l. 20; spelt pynacle, Wyclif, Matt. iv. 5.—F. pinacle, 'a pinacle, a spire;' Cot.—Lat. pinaculum, a pinnacle, or pinacle, 'a pinacle, a spire;' Cot.—Lat. pinaculum, a pinnacle, a spire;' Cot.—Lat. pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a pinaculum, a p peak of a building; Matt. iv. 5 (Vulgate). Double dimin. (with suffixes -cu-lu-) from pinna, a wing, feather, hence, a feather-like adjunct to a building. See Pin, Pon (2), Pinnate.

PINNATE, feather-like. (L.) A botanical term. folia, among herbalists, such leaves as are deeply indented, so that the parts resemble feathers; Phillips, ed. 1706.—Lat. pinnatus, feathered.—Lat. pinna, for penna, a feather. See Pen (2).

PINT, a measure for liquids. (F., -Span., -L.) M. E. pinte, pynte; Prompt. Parv. - F. pinte, 'a pint;' Cot. -Span. pinta, a spot, M. E. pinte, blemish, drop, mark on cards, pint. So called from the pint being marked by a mark outside (or inside) a vessel of larger capacity. The lit. sense is 'painted,' hence a mark, spot, &c. Cf. Span. pintor, a painter, pintura, a painting. β. The Span. pinta, pintor, pintura, answer to Lat. picta, pictor, pictura. Thus pinta is from Lat. picta, fem. of pictus, painted, pp. of pingere, to paint; see Paint.

PIONEER, a soldier who clears the way before an army. (F.—

L.) Formerly written pioner, Hamlet, i. v. 163. This may have been merely an E. modification, as the whole word appears to be F. Richardson quotes the spelling pyoner from Berners' tr. of Froissart, vol. i. c. 138.—F. pionnier, 'a pioner;' Cot.

B. F. pionnier, O. F. peonier, is a mere extension of F. pion, O. F. peon, a foot-soldier; with the more special meaning of foot-soldier who works at digging mines. For the etymology of O. F. peon, see Pawn (2).

PIONY, the same as Peony, q. v.

winking, half-shut; from O. Du. pincken, or pinck-oogen, to shut a PIOUS, devout. (F.,-L.) In Macb. iii. 6. 12, 27; and prob. the eyes, Hexham; where ooge = eye. The notion is that of bringing earlier. = F. pieux (fem. pieuse), pious, godly; Cot. The O. F. to a point, narrowing, or making small, and it is much the same form was pius (Littré), directly from Lat. pius, holy; not from a form a form. piosus *. The root of Lat. pius is uncertain. Der. pious-ly; piety, Timon, iv. 1. 15, a coined word, and a doublet of pity, q.v.; piet-ist, borrowed from G. pietist, the name of a Protestant sect in Germany instituted about 1689 (Haydn), and taking their name from their devotion, the word being a mere coinage (with suffix -ist) from a part of the stem (piet-) of Lat. pietas. And see pity.

part of the stem (piet-) of Lat. pietas. And see pity.

PIP (1), a disease of fowls, in which a homy substance grows on the tip of the tongue. (F.,-L.) M.E. pippe, pyppe (once dissyllabic). 'Pyppe, sekenesse [sickness], Pituita; 'Prompt. Parv. 'Pyppe, a sickenesse, pepye;' Palsgrave.—O.F. pepie, 'pip;' Cot. Cf. Span. pepita, the pip (Neuman); Ital. pipita, Port. pevide (in the phrase pevide de gallinhas, the pip).

B. All from Lat. pituita, phlegm, rheum, the pip; which must first have passed into the form pivita, and afterwards into that of pepita (Diez). Hence also O.H.G. phiphis, the pip, cited by Diez; Du. pip; O. Swed. pipp, &c. Y. Lat. pituita is formed (with suffix -ita, like -itus in crin-itus) from a verbal stem pitu-= sputur. from sputus, pp. of spuere, to spit out: and means stem pitu-=sputu-, from sputus, pp. of spuere, to spit out; and means 'that which is spit out,' hence phlegm, &c. The Lat. spuere is

PIP (2), the seed of fruit. (F., -L.? - Gk.?) This is nothing but a contraction of the old name fippin or pepin, for the same thing. a contraction of the out mains typen of perm, we also also prippin is in Cotgrave; pepin in Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xv. c. 14, ed. 1634, p. 438 l; b. xvii. c. 10, p. 511 a, b.—F. pepin, 'a pippin or kernel, the seed of fruit;' Cot. Allied to Span. pepina, a pip, kernel; and prob. to Span. pepino, a cucumber.

3. It is conjectured that the name was first applied to the pips of the melon or cucumber, and that the derivation is, accordingly, from Lat. pepo, a melon, borrowed from Gk. $\pi \acute{e}\pi \omega \nu$, a melon, orig. an adj. signifying 'ripe.' The Gk. $\pi \acute{e}\pi \omega \nu$ meant 'ripened by the heat of the sun,' lit. 'cooked,' from πέπων meant ripened by the neat of the sun, int. cooked, from πέπ., base of πέπτευ, to cook, allied to Skt. pach, to cook, and to Lat. courses; see Cook. ¶ Would it not be simpler to refer F. pepin to Gk. πέπων, ripe, more directly, the presence of pips indicating ripeness? This would not disturb the etymology. The odd resemblance between Span. pepita, a pip, and pepita, the pip in fowls, is due to mere confusion; see Pip (1). They are not connected.

PIP (3), a spot on cards. (F., -C.) The resemblance to pip, a kernel, is merely delusive; confusion between these words has caused corruption of the word now considered. Yet pip occurs as carly as in Shakespeare, Tam. Shrew, i. 2. 33. β. The true name carly as in Shakespeare, Tam. Shrew, i. 2. 33. β. The true name is pick, still preserved provincially. 'Pick, a diamond at cards; Grose says it means a spade,' Halliwell; and see Brockett. 'A diamond, or picke at cards;' Minsheu, ed. 1627.—O. F. picque, pique, 'a spade, at cards;' Cot. It also means a pike; see Pike, Pique. The word seems to have meant (1) a spade, (2) a diamond, and (3) a pip (on cards) in general.

PIPE, a musical instrument formed of a long tube; hence, any long tube, or tube in general. (E.) The musical sense is the orig. one. M.E. pipe, Wyclif, Luke, vii. 32; Chaucer, C. T. 2752. The pl. pipen is in Layamon, 5110.—A. S. pipe, a pipe, A.S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, ii. 126, 1. 3; and in comp. song-pipe, a song-pipe, in the Glosses to Prudentius (Leo).

3. The word perhaps may be claimed as English, being obviously of imitative origin, from the 'peeping' or chirping sound; the pipe was frequently used to imitate and decoy birds. It is very widely spread. We find Irish imitate and decoy dires. It is very winder spread.

and Gael. piob, a pipe, flute, tube; Irish pib, a pipe, tube; W. pib, a pipe, tube, pipian, to pipe, pibo, to pipe, squirt. Also Du. pijp, Icel. pipa, Swed. pipa, Dan. pibe, G. pfeifa. Cf. also Lat. pipire, pipure, to peep or chirp as a young bird, Gk. miniser, to chirp. All from the repetition pi-pi of the cry of a young bird.

If the word was borrowed at all, it was, perhaps, taken from Celtic, i.e. from the old British. Der. pipe, verb, Chaucer, C. T. 3874 [not 3974]; pip-er, pip-ing; pipe-clay; and see pip-kin, pib-roch. See also peep (1), peep (2). Doublet, fife.

PIPKIN, a small earthen pot. (E.) 'A pipkin, or little pot;'

Minsheu, ed. 1627. A dimin. (with suffix -kin) of E. pipe, in the sense of a vessel, chiefly applied to a cask of wine. This particular sense may have been imported. It occurs both in French and Dutch. 'Pipe, a measure called a pipe, used for corn as well as wine; 'Cot. 'Een pijpe met olye ofte wijn, a pipe or caske with oyle or wine; Hexham.

FIPPIN, a kind of tart apple. (F.?-L.?-Gk.?) In Shak. Merry Wives, i. 2. 13; and in Minshen, ed. 1627. Cotgrave explains F. renette as 'the apple called a pippin, or a kind thereof.' Sometimes said to be named from pip (3), because of the spots upon it, which utterly fails to explain the suffix -in. We must rather connect it with pip (2), of which the old spelling was actually pippin, as has been shewn. That is, it was named with reference to the pips inside it (not outside); 'prob. an apple raised from the pip or seed,' Wedgwood. See Pip (2). ¶ Hexham has Du. pippinck. puppinck, a pipping, an apple so called; 'also 'pupping, an apple & ed. Halliwell, p. 249 (Stratmann).—F. pisser; supposed to be a called a pippinck.' But the Du. word seems to have been borrowed from E., and they hardly knew what to make of it. Thus Sewel's Du. Dict. has yet another form pippeling, with the example 'Engelsche pippingen, English pippins.'

PISTACHIO, PISTACHO, the nut of a certain tree. (Span., pippelingen, English pippins.'

pipelingen, English pippins.'

PIQUE, wounded pride. (F., -C.) Oddly spelt pike in Cotgrave, who is an early authority for it. -O. F. picque, pique, 'a pike; also, a pikeman; also a pike, debate, quarrel, grudge; 'Cot. B. Of Celtic origin; see Pike. Der. pique, verb; piqu-ant (as in 'piquant' [Journal Familiar Letters vol i sect. 5. let. 38 [not 36], sauce,' Howell, Familiar Letters, vol. i. sect. 5. let. 38 [not 36], where, by the way, the spelling is pickant), from F. piquant, pres. part. of piquer, verb. Hence piquant-ly, piquanc-y.

PIQUET, a game at cards. (F.,-C.) 'Piquet, or Picket, a certain game at cards, perhaps so called from pique, as it were a small contest or scuffle; 'Phillips, ed. 1706. This is ingenious, and perhaps true; Littré says the game is supposed to have been named from its inventor. In any case, piquet is a doublet of Picket, q.v.

PIRATE, a sea-robber, corsair. (F., -L., -Gk.) In Shak.

mesparis, one who attempts or attacks, a pirate. Formed with suffix -τηε (Aryan -ta) from πειρά-ω, I attempt. – Gk. πείρα, an attempt, trial, essay. – PAR, to go through, experience; appearing in Gk. πείρω, I pierce (perf. pass. πέ-παρ-μαι), and in E. ex-per-ience and fare; see Fare, Experience. Der. pirat-ic-al, pirat-ic-al-ly;

PIROGUE, a sort of canoe. (F., -W. Indian.) Sometimes spelt piragua, which is the Span. spelling. Both F. pirague and Span. piragua are from the native W. Indian name. The word is said to be Caribbean (Littré).

FIROUETTE, a whirling round, quick turn, esp. in dancing.

F. Formerly used as a term in horsemanship. 'Pirouette, Piroet, (F.) Formerly used as a term in horsemanship. a turn or circumvolution, which a horse makes without changing his ground; 'Bailey's Dict., vol. ii. ed. 1751.—F. pirouette, 'a whirling also a whirling about;' Cot.

β. Origin unknown, according to Littré; but in Métivier's Dict. Franco-Normand appears the Guernsey word piroue, a little wheel or whirligig, a child's toy, of which pirouetle is obviously the diminutive. Métivier well compares this with the E. pirie or pirry, formerly in use to denote 'a whirlwind.' The spelling has prob. been affected by confusion with F. roue (Lat. rota), a wheel. 'And not be aferde [afraid] of pirries or great stormes;' Sir T. Elyot, The Governor, b. i. c. 17; in Skeat, Spec. of English, p 197. See further examples of pirry in Richardson, s. v. ferry (which is an inferior spelling), and in Prompt. Parv. s.v. pyry; also in Nares.

7. I take this word to be of imitative origin; cf. Scotch pirr, a gentle wind, lcel. byrr, wind; E. birr, buzz, with which compare also purr, whirr, purl. Similarly we find Span. birazones, land and sea breezes, O. F. birrasque, 'a high going sea, or tempest at sea, caused by whirlwinds, and accompanied by gusts of raine,' Cot. The latter is a Gascon word, from the Gascon birer, These examples lead to a base bir- or pir-, with the same sense as E. whirr. Hence pir-ou-ette may very well = whirl-igig, and pirry = whirl-wind. In fact, we find M. E. pirle, prille, a whirligig, child's toy, Prompt. Parv. p. 413, which is a mere dimin. of a form pirr. Der. pirouette, vb.

PISCES, the Fish; a zodiacal sign. (I.) M. E. Pisces, Chaucer, C. T. 6286. - Lat. pisces, pl. of piscis, a fish; cognate with E. Fish, q.v. Der. pisc-ine; pisci-vorous, fish-eating, from Lat. uorare, to devour; pisc-at-or-y, from Lat. piscatorius, belonging to fishing, from piscator, a fisherman, formed from piscatus, pp. of piscari, to fish. PISH, an interjection, expressing contempt. (E.) In Shak. Oth.

ii. 1. 270; iv. 1. 42. Of imitative origin; it begins with expulsion of breath, as in pooh!, and ends with a hiss.

PISMIRE, an ant. (Hybrid; F. and Scand.) In Shak. I Hen. IV, i. 3, 240. 'The old name of the ant, an insect very generally named from the sharp urinous smell of an ant-hill;' Wedgwood. M. E. pissemire (four syllables), Chaucer, C. T. 7407.—M. E. pisse, urine; and mire, an ant, in Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 214 (Stratmann). B. The A.S. mire, given in Benson's A.S. Dict., is unauthorised, but may be correct; still, the true E. word is emmet or ant, and mire is rather Scandinavian, appearing in Icel. maurr, Swed. myra, Dan. myre, an ant, as also in Du. mier. γ. The word is very myra, Lan. myra, an ant, as also in Du. mer. γ. The word is very widely spread; we find also Irish moirbh, W. mor-grugyn, Bret. merienen, Russ. mur-avei, Gk. μύρ-μηξ, all meaning 'ant,' for which Curtius proposes a root MUR, to swarm; cf. Ck. μυρίοι, ten thousand. The Cornish murrian means 'ants.' See Myriad. ¶ I do not see how to derive Du. mier from Du. mijgen (= Lat. mingere) as proposed by Wedgwood, since the base of this word is MIG; see Fick, iii. 239. Rietz connects mire with midge, but this presents a similar difficulty, as this is from a base MUGYA (Fick, iii. 241), and contains a g which is difficult to dispose of.

Spelt pistachoe or pistake-nut in Phillips, ed. 1706. Span. pistacho (with ch as in English), a pistachio, pistich-nut. — Lat. pistacium. — Gk. πιστάκιον, a nut of the tree called πιστάκη. — Pers. pistá, the pistachio-nut; Rich. Dict. p. 331.

PISTIL, the female organ in the centre of a flower. (L.) Ash's Dict., ed. 1775. Named from the resemblance in shape to the pestle of a mortar.—Lat. pistillum, a small pestle; dimin. of an obsolete form pistrum*, a pestle. See Pestle. Doublet, pestle.

PISTOL, a small hand-gun, (F.,—Ital.) In Shak. Merry Wives, iv. 2. 53; and as a proper name.—F. pistole, 'a pistoll, a great horseman's dag;' Cot. [Here dag is an old name for a pistol.]—Ital. pistola, 'a dag or pistoll;' Florio.

B. We also find Ital. pistolese, 'a great dagger,' in Florio; and it seems to be agreed that the two words are closely connected; that the word pistolese is the older one; and that the name was transferred from the dagger to the pistol, both being small arms for similar use. The E. name dag for pistol confirms this; since dag must be the F. dague, a dagger. γ. Both pistolese and pistola are said to be named from a town in Tuscany, near Florence, now called Pistoja. The old name of the town must have been Pistola, as asserted by Mahn; and this is rendered extremely probable by the fact that the old Latin name of the town was Pistoria, which would easily pass into Pistola, and finally into Pistoja. 'Pistols were first used by the cavalry of England about 1544; 'Haydn. Der. pistol, vb., Tw. Nt. ii. 5. 42; pistol-et.

Doublet, pistole.

PISTOLE, a gold coin of Spain. (F., - Ital.) In Dryden, The Spanish Friar, Act v. The dimin. form pistolet is in Beaum, and Fletcher, The Spanish Curate, Act. i. sc. 1 (Jamie). Yet the word is not Spanish, but French. The forms pistole and pistolet, in the sense of 'pistole,' are the same as pistole and pistolet in the sense of pistol. - Pistolet, a pistolet, a dag, or little pistoll, also, the gold coin tearmed a pistolet; Cot. Diez cites from Claude Fauchet (died 1599) to the effect that the crowns of Spain, being reduced to a smaller size than French crowns, were called pistolets, and the smallest pistolets were called bidets; cf. 'Bidet, a small pistoll;' Cot. Thus the name is one of jocular origin; and the words pistole and pistol are doublets. Pistol, being more Anglicised, is the older word in PISTON, a short cylinder, used in pumps, moving up and down within the tube of the pump. (F., -Ital., -L.) In Bailey's Dict., vol. ii. ed. 1731. - F. piston, 'a pestell, or pounding-stick;' Cot. In mod. F. 'a piston.' - Ital. pistone, a piston; the same word as pestone, mod. F. 'a piston. — Ital. pistone, a piston; the same word as pessone, a large heavy pestle. — Ital. pestare, to pound. — Late Lat. pistare, to pound (White); formed from pistus, pp. of pinsere, pisere, to pound. — ✓ PIS, to pound. See Pestle, Pistil, Pea.

PIT, a hole in the earth. (L.) M. E. pit, Wyclif, Luke, xiv. 5; put, Ancren Riwle, p. 58, l. 4.—A.S. pyt, pytt; Luke, xiv. 5.—Lat. puteus, a well, pit; Luke, xiv. 5 (Vulgate). β. Perhaps orig. a vall of pure water a spring; and so expected with Let the pure well of pure water, a spring; and so connected with Lat. putus, pure, from the same root as purus; see Pure. Der. pit, verb, to set in competition, a phrase taken from cock-fighting. 'A pit is the area in which cocks fight; hence, to pit one against the other, to place them in the same pit, one against the other, for a contest; Richardson. Also pit-fall, Mach. iv. 2. 35; pit-man, pit-saw; cock-pit.

PITAPAT, with palpitation. (E.) In Dryden, Epilogue to Tamerlane. A repetition of pat, weakened to pit in the first instance.

See Pat, Pant.

PITCH (1), a black sticky substance. (L.) M. E. pich, pych; Rob. of Glouc. p. 410, l. 12; O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, i. 251, 1. 24; older form pik, id. i. 269, 1. 22. A. S. pic, Exod. ii. 3. - Lat. pic., stem of pix, pitch. Hence also C. pech. B. Allied words are Gk. stem of pin, pitch. Hence also G. pech. β. Allied words are Gk. πίσσα (for πικ-ya), Lithuan. pikkis, pitch. Also Lat. pinus, a pinetree, Gk. πίτυι, a pinetree; Skt. pitudúrus, pútudúrus, the name of an Indian pine (lit. pitch-tree, since dárus = tree). See Curtius, i. 201, who cites the Skt. word from Fick. See Pine (1). Der. pitch, verb; pitch-y, All's Well, iv. 4. 24. Also pay (2).

PITCH (2), to throw, to fall headlong, to fix a camp, &c. (C.) A weakened form of pick, to throw, Cor. i. 1. 204; esp. used of throwing a pike or dart. 'I pycke with an arrowe, Ie darde;' Palsthis proposes a root MUK, to swarm; cl. Ok. popul, ten thousand. The Cornish murrian means 'ants.' See Myriad. ¶ I do not see how to derive Du. mier from Du. mijgen (= Lat. mingere) as proposed by Wedgwood, since the base of this word is MIG; see Fick, iii. 239. Rietz connects mire with midge, but this presents a similar difficulty, as this is from a base MUGYA (Fick, iii. 241), and contains a g which is difficult to dispose of.

PISS, to discharge urine. (F.) M. E. pissen, Mandeville's Travels, p. 183. 'He pighte him on the pomel of his hed'=he pitched [fell] on the top of his head; Chaucer, C. T. 2691. 'Ther he pikte his PLACARD, a bill stuck up as an advertisement. (F., - Du.) In steel' = there he fixed his staff; Layamon, 29653. The same word as pick, verb; and closely related to pike; to pitch is 'to throw a pike.' Of Celtic origin; cf. W. picellu, to throw a dart. See Pick, Pike. Der. pitch, sb., Tw. Nt. i. 1. 12; pitch-fork, M.E. pikforke = pick-fork

PITCHER, a vessel for holding liquids. (F., - Low Lat., - Gk.) M.E. picher, pycher; English Gilds, ed. Toulmin Smith, p. 354, l. 12; pychere, Sir Perceval, l. 454, in Thornton Romances, ed. Halliwell.—O.F. picher, a pitcher (Burguy); spelt pichier in Cotgrave, who gives it as a Languedoc word. Cf. Span. and Port. pichel, a tankard, Ital. pecchero, bicchiere, a gobbet, beaker.—Low Lat. picarium, bica-Ital. pecchero, discentere, a goldict, beaker.—Low Lat. pecchero, discentium, a goblet, beaker, wine-cup.—Gk. β ixos, an earthen wine-vessel; with dimin. forms β ixlov, β ixlov.

B. The Gk. β ixos is of Eastern origin (Liddell). Diez considers that the change of initial b to p was due to High-German influence, and gives O. H. G. pechar as the old form of mod. G. becher. Sec Beaker, which is a doublet. ¶ We can hardly derive pitcher from a Celtic source, on account of the Span. and Ital. forms; the E. word of Celtic origin which somewhat resembles it is Piggin, q.v. Der. pitcher-plant.

PITH, the soft substance in the centre of stems of plants, marrow. (E.) M. E. pith, pithe, Chaucer, C. T. 6057. - A. S. pioa, Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, c. xxxiv. § 10; lib. iii. pr. 11. + Du. pit, pith; O. Du. pitte (Hexham). + Low G. peddik, pith (Bremen Wörterbuch).

B. Can it be allied to Skt. spháti, sphíti, swelling, increase? Der. pith-y, Tam.

Shrew, iii. 1. 68; pith-i-ly, pith-i-ness; pith-less, 1 Hen.VI, ii. 5.11. PITTANCE, an allowance of food, a dole, small portion. (F.) M. E. pitance (with one t), pitance, P. Plowman, C. x. 92; Ancren Riwle, p. 114, l. 5. - F. pitance, 'meat, food, victual of all sorts, bread and drinke excepted;' Cot. β. Of disputed etymology; bread and drinke excepted; Cot.

B. Of disputed etymology; cf. Span. pitanza, a pittance, the price of a thing, salary; Ital. pietanza, a pittance, portion. In all probability the Ital. pietanza is a popular corruption, due to a supposed connection with pietà, pity, mercy, as if to give a pittance were to give alms. The Lombard form is still pitanza (Diez). Diez connects pitance with O. F. pite, a thing of little worth, which he further connects with petit, small; and he supposes pittance to be from the same Celtic origin as petty; see Petty. γ. The Span. pitar means to distribute allowances of meat, &c., and is clearly a connected word; this seems at once to set aside any connection with piety or pity. But Ducange gives the Low Lat. pictantia as a pittance, a portion of food (given to monks) of the value of a picta, which he explains to be a very small coin issued by the counts of Poitiers (moneta comitum Pictavensium). This answers to O. F. pite, 'the half of a maille, a French farthing, also, a moath, a mite;' Cot.

8. This brings us back to the same O. F. pite, but 8. This brings us back to the same O. F. pite, but suggests a different origin for that word, viz. Low Lat. picta, a Poitiers coin. And this Lat. pieta is supposed to be a mere abbrevia-tion from Lat. Pietava, i.e. Poitiers (White). If this be right, the origin is really French.

PITY, sympathy, mercy. (F.,-L.) M. E. pite, Floriz and Blauncheflor, ed. Lumby, 529; Ancren Riwle, p. 368, l. 14. - O. F. pite (pite), 13th cent. (Littre); pitet, 12th cent. (id.) - Lat. pietatem, acc. of pietas; see Piety. Der. pity, verb, As You Like It, ii. 7. 117; piti-able, piti-abl-y, piti-able-ness; piti-ful, All's Well, iii. 2. 190; piti-ful-ly, piti-ful-ness; piti-less, As You Like It, iii. 5. 40; piti-less-ly, piti-less-ness; pity-ing-ly. Also pite-ous, a corruption of M. E. pit-ous, Chaucer, C. T. 8956, 8962, spelt pitos, Rob. of Glouc., p. 204, l. 12, from O. F. piteus, mod. F. piteux, 'pitiful, merciful,' Cot. = Low Lat.

pietosus, merciful. And hence piteous-ly.

PIVOT, a pin upon which a wheel or other object turns. F., -Ital., - Low Lat.) In Cotgrave. - F. pivot, 'the pivot or, as some call it, the tampin of a gate, or great doore, a piece of iron, &c made, for the most part, like a top, round and broad at one end and sharp at the other, whereby it enters into the crappaudine [iron wherein the pivot plays]; and serves as well to bear up the gate as to facilitate the motion thereof; Cot. Formed, with dimin. suffix ot, from Ital. piva, a pipe, a weakened form of pipa, a pipe. - Low Lat. pipa, a pipe; connected with Lat. pipare, pipire, to chirp as a bird; see Pipe.

B. The Ital. piva meant (1) a pipe, (2) a tube with a fine bore; and so at last came to mean a solid peg, as well shewn in the O. Ital. dimin. form pivolo, or piviolo, 'a pin or peg of wood, a setting or poaking sticke to set ruffes with, also a gardeners toole to set herbes with called a dibble; Florio. intimates some doubt as to this etymology, but whoever will consult the articles piva and pivolo or piviolo in Florio will probably be satisfied; I do not reproduce the whole of his remarks.

PLACABLE, forgiving, easy to be appeased. (L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627; and in Milton, P. L. xi. 151. Taken directly from l.at. placabilis, easily appeased; formed with suffix -bilis from placa-re, to appease. Allied to placere; see Please. Der. placable, placableness. Also placabili-ty, Sir T. Elyot, The Governor, b. ii. c. 6.

Minsheu, ed. 1627; he notes that it occurs in the 2nd and 3rd years of Philip and Mary (1555, 1556). - F. placard, plaquard, 'a placard, an inscription set up,' &c. ; . . also a bill, or libell stuck upon a post; also, rough-casting or pargetting of walls; Cot. The last is the orig. sense. Formed with suffix -ard (of O.H.G. origin, from G. hart = E. hard) from the verb plaquer, 'to parget or to rough-cast, also, to clap, slat, stick, or paste on;' Cot. = F. plaque, 'a flat lingot [ingot] or barre of metall, . . a plate to naile against a wall and to set a candle in; 'Cot. - Du. plak, a ferula, a slice; O. Du. plack, 'a ferula or a small batle-dore, wherewith schoole-boys are strooke in the palmes of their hands; Hexham.

B. This Du. word seems to palmes of their hands; Hexham. β . This Du. word seems to have meant any thin slice or plate, whence the F. us. of plaque. However, all doubt as to the derivation is removed by observing the use of the Du. verb plakken, viz. to paste, glue, formerly also 'to dawbe or to plaister,' Hexham. [The Du. plakkaat, a placard, is merely borrowed back again from the French.] Y. The Du. plak is cognate with, G. blech, a plate, and comes from a base PLAK. with the notion of flatness, allied to the base PLAT, with the same notion. See Plate, Place. ¶ Diez prefers this etymology to that sometimes given from Gk. πλάξ (stem πλακ-), a flat surface. This Gk. word is prob. related, but only in a remote way. Der. placard, verb.

PLACE, a space, room, locality, town, stead, way, passage in a book. (F., - L., - Gk.) In early use. In King Horn, ed. lumby, 718. - F. place, 'a place, room, stead, ... a faire large court;' Cot. - Lat. platea, a broad way in a city, an open space, courtyard. Sometimes platea, but properly platea, not a true Lat. word, but borrowed. -Gk. πλατεία, a broad way, a street; orig. fem. of πλατύε, flat, wide. + Lithuan. platus, broad. + Skt. prithus, large, great. All from PRAT, to be extended, spread out; cf. Skt. prath, to spread out, spread. See Fick, i. 148; Curtius, i. 346. Hence also plant, q. v. Der place, verb, K. PLAGIARY, one who steals the writings of another, and passes them off as his own. (F., - I.) Spelt plagiarie in Minsheu, ed. 1627, with the same definition as in Cotgrave (given below). [Sir T. Brown uses the word in the sense of plagiarism, Vulg. Errors, b. i. c. 6. § 7, yet he has plagiarism in the very next section. Bp. Hall has plagiary as an adj., Satires, b. iv. sat. 2. 1. 84.] - F. plagiaire, one that steals or takes free people out of one country, and sels them in another for slaves; . . also a book-stealer, a book-theef; 'Cot.—Lat. plagiarius, a man-stealer, kidnapper.—Lat. plagium, kidnapping; whence also plagiare, to steal or kidnap a free person; lit. to ensnare, net. - Lat. plaga, a net; a weakened form for an older placa*, not found; cf. neg-otium for nec-otium, pangere from the base pak, &c. From the base l'LAK, to weave, seen in Gk. πλέκειν, to weave, Lat. plec-tere, plic-are; cf. Russ. pleste, to weave, plait. See Plait. Der. plagiar-ise, plagiar-ism, plagiar-ist.

PLAGUE, a pestilence, a severe trouble. (L.) Taken directly from Latin. M. E. plage (not common), Wyclif, Rev. xvi. 21, to translate Lat. plagam; the pl. plagis (= plages, plagues) is in Wyclif, Gen. xii. 17, where the Vulgate has the Lat. plagis. = Lat. plaga, a stocke, blow, stripe, injury, disaster. + Gk. πληγή, a blow, plague, Rev. xvi. 21. β. From the base PLAK, to strike; appearing in tithuan stability of strike Classification. Lithuan. plakti, to strike, Gk. πλήσσειν (= πλήκ-γειν), to strike, Lat. plangere, to strike. See Curtius, i. 345; Fick, i. 681. ¶ The spelling plage occurs as late as in the Bible of 1551, Rev. xvi. 21. The u was introduced to keep the g hard. Der. plague, vb., Temp. iv. 192; plague-mark, plague-spot. And see Plaint, Flag (1). PLAICE, a kind of flat fish. (F., -L.) M. E. plaice, playee; Havelok, 896. Spelt place, plaise in Minsheu, ed. 1627. — O. F. plaïs, noted by Littré, s. v. plie; he also gives plaise as a vulgar F. name of the fish, the literary name being thie, as in Cotgrave. — Lat.

B. So called from its flatness; from the base PLAT, flat, which appears also in Lat. plat-ea, whence E. place. See Place.

PLAID, a loose outer garment of woollen cloth, chiefly worn by the Highlanders of Scotland. (Gael.) Spelt plad in Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 313, who speaks of a 'Scotch plad;' also in Phillips, ed.

a blanket; cf. Irish plaide, a plaid, blanket.

B. Macleod and Dewar consider plaide to be a contraction of Gael. (and Irish) peallaid, a sheep-skin. Cf. Gael. peallag, a shaggy hide, a little covering. These words are from Gael. (and Irish) peal, a skin, hide, also a covering or coverlet. It thus appears that the original plaid was a skin of an animal, as might be expected. The Gael. peall is cognate with Lat. pellis, a skin, and with E. fell, a skin. See Fell (2). Der.

PLATANÉ, a plane-tree; see Plane (3).

PLATE, a thin piece of metal, flat dish. (F., -Gk.) M. E. plate, Chaucer, C. T. 2123, -O. F. and F. plate, in use in the 12th century; see Littré. Hamilton, s. v. plat (flat), gives 'Vaisselle plate, hammered plate; particularly, plate, silver plate.' Plate is merely the fem. of F. plat, flat. Cf. Low Lat. plata, a lamina, plate of metal, Ducange; and esp. Span. plata, plate, silver (whence La Plata). But the Span. word was derived from the French; Littré. - Gk. πλατύε, broad; whence Du. and Dan. plat, G. and Swed. platt, are borrowed; see Place. Der. plate, vh., Rich. II, i. 3. 28; plate-glass, plat-ing. And see platt-er, plat-eau, plat-form, plat-ina, plat-it-ude.

PLATEAU, a flat space, table-land. (F., -Gk.) Modern. Not in Todd's Johnson. - F. plateau; Cotgrave gives the pl. plateaux, 'flat and thin stones.' The mod. F. plateau also means 'table-land;' Hamilton. - O. F. platel, a small plate, used in the 12th century; Littré. Dimin. of plat, a platter, dish, which is a sb. made from the PLATOON, a group of men, sub-division of a company of soldiers. (F., -L.) 'Platoon, a small square body of 40 or 50 men,' &c.; Bailey's Dict., vol. ii. ed. 1731. Corrupted from F. peloton, 'pronounced plo-tong, a ball, tennis-ball, group, knot, platoon;' Hamilton. Formed, with suffix -on, from F. pelote, a ball; whence also E. pellet. See Pollet.

PLATTER, a flat plate or dish. (F., -Gk.) M. E. plater (with one t), Wyclif, Matt. xxiii. 25. Formed (with substitution of the suffix -er for -el, by the common interchange of l and r) from O. F. platel, a plate (Burguy), which is also the origin of mod. F. plateau, still used in the sense of 'waiter, tray, tea-board;' Hamilton. Thus platter and plateau are doublets. See Plateau.

The form plaudit is due to misreading the Lat. plaudite as if it were an E. word, in which the final e would naturally be considered as silent. Sometimes the pronunciation in three syllables was kept up, with the singular result that the suffix -itè was then occasionally mistaken for the ordinary E. suffix sulfix-ite was then occasionally mistaken for the ordinary E. sulfix-ity. Hence we find 3 forms; (1) the correct Latin form. considered as trisyllabic. 'After the plaudite's stryke up Our plausible assente;' Drant, tr. of Horace, Art of Poetry (R.) (2) The form in -ity. 'And give this virgin crystal plaudities;' Cyril Tourneur, The Revenger's Tragedy, Act ii. sc. I (R.) (3) The clipped E. form. 'Not only the last plaudit to expect;' Denham, Of Old Age, pt. iv. (R.) = Lat. plaudite, clap your hands; a cry addressed by the actors to the spectators requesting them to express their striffction. It is the spectators, requesting them to express their satisfaction. It is the imperative pl. of plaudere, to applaud, also spelt plodere; see Plausible. Der. plaudit-or-y, an ill-coined word, neither French nor Latin.

PLAUSIBLE, deserving applause, specious. (L.) In Shak. it means 'contented, willing;' Meas. iii. 1. 253. Englished from Lat. plausibilis, praiseworthy. Formed, with suffix -bilis, from plausi-plauso-, stem of plausus, pp. of plaudere, plodere, to strike, beat, clap of fight, skirmish, battle. Thus ass-plega, ash-play, is the play of spears, i. e. fighting with spears; sweord-plega, sword-play, fighting spears, i. e. fighting with spears; sweord-plega, sword-play, ngnting with swords. Even in the Bible, 2 Sam. ii. 14, to play really means to fight; but this is due to the use of ludere in the Lat. version; Wyclif uses the same word. To play on an instrument is to strike upon it. Cf. 'tympanan plegiendra' = of them that strike the timbrels; A. S. version of Ps. lxvii. 27, ed. Spelman. And again, 'plega' mid handum' = clap hands; Ps. xlvi. 1. Thus the orig, sense of plega is a stroke, blow, and plegian is to strike.

Y. The base is PLAG, stroke, blow, and plegian is to strike. γ . The base is PLAG, and, considering the scarcity of Teutonic words with initial p, it is most likely that the word is merely a borrowed one, from Lat. plaga, a blow, stroke, thrust. See Plague. If plega were cognate with plaga, it would be less similar in form. ¶ E. PLEASURE, agreeable emotion, gratification. (F., -L.) Formerly plesure, as in The Nut-brown Maid (about A.D. 1500), l. 93; see Spec. of Eng. ed. Skeat, p. 102; but the word is probably older. Also pleasure, Skelton, Phyllyp Sparowe, 1004; id. p. 147. Formed, by the curious change of -ir into -ure, from F. plaisir, pleasure; the same change occurs in less-ure, whilst in treas-ure the suffix takes the place of -or. The object seems to have been to give the word an apparent substantival ending. B. Again, the F. plaisir is merely a substantival use of the O. F. infin. plaisir, to please; just as F. loisir (leisure) is properly an infinitive also. See Please. [Quite different from plurisy, q.v.] Spelt pleurisie in Minsheu, ed. 1627, and in Cotgrave. - F. pleuresie, 'a pleurisie;' Cot. - Lat. pleurisis, another form of pleuritis. - Gk. πλευρίτιε, pleurisy. - Gk. πλευρά, a rib, the side, the 'pleura.' Root uncertain. Der. pleurit-ic, from Gk. πλευριτικός, suffering from pleurisy; pleurit-ic-al. Also pleuro-pneumon-ia, inflammation of the pleura and lungs, from Gk. πνεύμων, a lung; see Pneumatic. PLIABLE, PLIANT, PLIERS; see under Ply.

PLIGHT (1), dangerous condition, condition; also, an engagement, promise. (E.) The proper sense is 'peril;' hence a promise involving peril or risk, a promise given under pain of forfeit, a duty, or solemn engagement for which one has to answer. M. E. plint, (1) danger, Layamon, 3897; (2) engagement, Story of Genesis and Exodus, ed. Morris, 1269; (3) condition, spelt plite, Chaucer, C. T. 16420.—A. S. plint, risk, danger, used to translate Lat. periculum in Aelfric's Colloquy, in the Merchant's second speech. Formed with the substantival suffix -t (Aryan -ta) from the strong verb plion, to risk, imperil, in Ælfred's tr. of Gregory's Pastoral Care, ed. Sweet, p. 229, l. 20; the pt. t. pleak occurs in the same, p. 37, l. 7. + O. Fries. plicht, peril, risk, care; we also find the short form ple, pli, danger, answering to A.S. plio, danger, in Ælfred, tr. of Gregory, p. 393, l. 9. + O. Du. plicht, 'duty, debt, obligation, administration, office, custom, or use;' Hexham; cf. plegen, 'to be accustomed, to experiment, or trie' [i. e. to risk]; id. + G. pflicht, duty, obligation, faith, allegiance, oath; from the O. H. G. strong verb plegan, to faith, allegiance, oath; from the O. H. G. strong verb plegan, to promise or engage to do.

The connection, sometimes asserted, between this word and E. play, seems to me very doubtful. Der. plight, verb, M. E. plizhen, plikten, P. Plowman, B. vi. 35, A. S. pliktan, weak verb, to imperil, Laws of King Cnut (Secular), § 67, in Thorpe's Ancient Laws, i. 411; plight-er, Antony, iii. 13, 126.

PLIGHT (2), to fold; as sb., a fold. (F.,-L.) Shak. has 'plighted cunning,' K. Lear, i. 1. 283; where the quarto editions have pleated. Spenser has 'with many a folded plight;' F. Q. ii. 3. 26; also plight (= plighted) as a pp. meaning 'folded' or 'plaited,' F. Q. ii. 6, 7, vi. 7, 43.

B. The word is really misspelt, by confusion with plight (1), and should be plite, without gh. Chaucer has also pitgut (= pitgutett) as a pp. meaning solution of plants, F. Q. ii. 6. 7, vi. 7. 43. B. The word is really misspelt, by consuming the verb pliten, to fold, Troilus, ii. 697, 1204. It is clearly a mere variant of plant or pleat, though the vowel is difficult to account for. See Plait. \Philip 'Plite of lawne, &c., seemeth to be a certaine measure, or quantitic thereof. Anno 3 Edw. IV, cap. 5;' Minsheu.

*Plinthe, the neather part of a pillars foot, of the forme of a four-square bricke or tile; Minsheu, ed. 1627. Cotgrave gives F. plinthe, 'a plinth,' &c. - Lat. plinthus. - Gk. πλίνθος, a brick or tile, a brick-shaped body, a plinth. Cognate with E. Flint, q. v. Cf. Lithuan. plinta, a flint.

PLOD, to trudge on laboriously, labour unintermittingly. (C.) In Shak. Sonnet 50, Merry Wives, i. 3. 91, All's Well, iii. 4. 6. 'The primitive sense of plod is to tramp through the wet, and thence, figuratively, to proceed painfully and laboriously; Wedgwood. It particularly means to wade through pools; Grose (ed. 1790) has 'Plowding, wading through thick and thin; North.' Jamieson has 'Plout, to splash; Plouter, to make a noise among water, to be engaged in any wet or dirty work; Plouter, sb., the act of floundering through water or mire; Plotch, to dabble, to work slowly.' [He maiso notes plod, ploud, a green sod.] The M.E. sb. plod (dat. plodde) meant a filthy pool or puddle; 'In a foul plodde in the strete suththe me hym slong' = people then threw him into a foul puddle in the street; Rob. of Glouc. p. 536, 1.6. So also Northern plud, a puddle; E. D. S. Gloss, B. 1.—Irish plod, plodan, a pool, standing water, plodach, a puddle; whence plodaim, I float, plodanachd, paddling and rowing in water. So also Gael. plod, a clod [accounting for Scot. plod, a green sod], also a pool, standing water, plodan, a small pool; whence plodanachd, a paddling in water. Prob. related to Plash (1),

v. Der. plodd-er, plodd-ing, plodd-ing-ly.

PLOT (1), a conspiracy, stratagem. (F., -L.) One of the earliest instances of the word seems to be in Spenser, F. Q. vii. 6. 23 (about A.D. 1590); he also has plot as a verb, id. iii. 11. 20. It is hardly possible to assign any other origin for it than by considering it as an abbreviation of complot, used in exactly the same sense, both as a sb. and verb. We have numerous examples of the loss of an initial The word complot does not appear to be in much earlier use; and further information on this point is desired. Shak, has both plot and complot, and both words are employed by him both as sb, and verb. The sb. complot is in Titus Andron. ii. 3, 265, v. 1. 65, v. 2. 147; the vb. complot in Rich. II, i. 1. 96. Minsheu, ed. 1627, gives complot, but does not recognise plot, except as a ground-plan. - F. complot, a complot, conspiracy; whence comploter, to complot, conspiracy. Cot. The O. F. complot means (1) crowd, in the 12th century, β. Of disputed etymology; but Diez is plan or 'plat-form' (see Minsheu) caused confusion, and the shortening of complot to plot. Neither plot (1) nor complot are old words in English, whereas F. complot is found in the 12th century. The very prefix com indicates a Latin origin. Der. plot, vb., plott-er.

PLOT (2), PLAT, a small piece of ground. (E.) The sense of plot and of patch is almost exactly the same, and the words (as shewn under Patch) are closely related. A plot is a patch of ground; and it also meant, in M. E., a spot on a garment. 'Many foule plottes' = many dirty spots (on a garment); P. Plowman, B. xiii. 318. In the Prompt. Parv. p. 405, we are told that plot is the same as plek; and we also find 'Plecke, or plotte, portiuncula.' Way's note adds and we also find 'Pleeke, or plotte, portuncula.' Way's note adds that 'Pleek is given by Cole, Ray, and Grose as a North-Country word, signifying a place, and is likewise noticed by Tim Bobbin;' and he correctly refers it to A.S. place, Matt. vi. 5 (Northumb. version). This pleck is a mere variant of platch, the older form of patch; thus bringing plot and patch into close connection, as above noted. So also 'Plock, a small meadow (Herefordshire);' E.D. S. Gloss. B. 12. The expression 'plot of flowers faire' occurs in the Flower and the Leaf, l. 499 (15th century).—A.S. plot, a patch of ground; A.S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, iii. 286, l. 19 (the same passage is in Schmid, Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen, App. XI, l. 5; p. 408, ed. 1858). Cf. Goth. plats, a patch, Mark, ii. 21.

the spelling plat, see Plat (1).

PLOUGH, an instrument for turning up the soil. (Scand.) M.E. plouh, plou; Chaucer, C.T. 889; Havelok, 1017. It can scarcely be called an E. word; the traces of it in A.S. are but slight; we find plok = a plough-land, in A. S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, iii. 286, and plow = a plough-land, in A. S. Lecchooms, ed. Cockayne, in. 280, l. 19, where is the phrase 'ne plot ne ploh' = neither plot of ground nor plough-land. It is rather Scand. than E., the true A. S. word being sulh. = Icel. plogr, a plough; which also seems to be a borrowed word, the genuine Norse word being arôr; Swed. plog; Dan. plov. We find also O. Fries. ploch, G. pflug, O. H. G. pfluoc; and it is tolerably certain that the Lithuan. plugas, Russ. pluge, a plough, are borrowed words from the Teutonic. See Grimm, Gram. ii. 414; who has grave doubts as to whether the word is really Teutonic, though early known and widely spread. β. Perhaps of Celtic origin; cf. Gael. ploc, a block of wood, stump of a tree, used as the orig. plough; see Plug, Block.

y. Max Müller, Lect. on Lanorig. plough; see Plug, Block. γ. Max Müller, Lect. on Language, i. 296 (8th ed.), identifies plough with Skt. plava, Gk. πλοίον, a boat, from γ PLU, to float: 'As the Aryans spoke of a ship ploughing the sea, they also spoke of a plough sailing across the field.' This sounds too poetical, and does not account for the gh. Der. plough, verb, Cor. iii. 1.71; plough-er, see Latimer's Sermon on the Ploughers; plough-able; plough-boy; plough-iron, 2 Hen. IV, v. 1. 20; plough-man, M. E. plouman, Chaucer, C. T. 531; plough-share, spelt plouh-schare in Trevisa, ii. 353, and derived from the verb to shear.

Wedgwood remarks that the G. name is regenfeifer, the rain-piper. PLUCK, to pull away sharply, to snatch. (E.) M. E. plukken, P. Plowman, B. v. 591; xii. 249; Wyclif, Matt. xii. 1.—A. S. pluccian, Matt. xii. 1. + Du. plukken, + Icel. plokka, plukka, perhaps a borrowed word. + Dan. plukke. + Swed. plocka. + G. pflücken. β. This is one of the five words beginning with p which Fick admits as being truly Teutonic; he gives the base as PLUK; iii. 167. The resemblance to Ital. piluccare, to pick grapes, is remarkable. but is a resemblance to Ital. piluccare, to pick grapes, is remarkable, but is a mere coincidence; it is impossible that a word found in A. S. can be derived from Italian, and it is unlikely that there was such a form in early Low Latin. Der. pluck, sb., a butcher's term for the heart, in early Low Latin. Der. pluck, 3D., a butcher's term for the neart, liver, and lights of an animal, prob. because they are plucked out after killing it; Skinner, ed. 1671, has 'pluck, a sheep's pluck, i. e. cor animalis,' an animal's heart. Hence pluck in the sense of 'spirit, courage;' whence the adj. plucky. Cf. the phrase 'pluck up thy spirits,' Tam. Shrew, iv. 3. 38; 'pluck up, my heart,' Much Ado, v. 1. 207. PLUG, a block or peg used to stop a hole. (Du., = C.) Skinner, ed. 1671, has 'a plug, or splug;' but that the initial s is a true part to prob. right in taking it to be the Lat. complicitum, neut. of complicitus, & of the word may be doubted. The word is also in Hexham, ed. pp. of complicate, involve, lit. to fold together. Another form of the pp. is complicates. See Complicate, Complex.

¶ Littre thinks the F. word may be from English, and adduces Hexham. Mod. Du. plug, a peg, bung. We find also Swed. plugg, a plug, Dan. plok, a peg, G. pflock, a wooden nail, plug, peg, pin. seem to be any real connection between plot (1) and plot (2); though it is highly probable that the use of E. plot in the sense of a groundities in the sense of a groundities of E. plot in the sense of a groundities of E. plot in the sense of a groundities of E. plot in the sense of a groundities. The word is not Teutonic, and was doubtless borrowed from Celtic. The original word appears in Irish ploc, pluc, a plug, stopper, bung. Cell eller a club bludgeon bead of a plug, stopper, bung. PLUM, the name of a fruit. (L., = Gk.) M. E. ploume, ploume, Prompt. Parv. 'Piries and plomtrees' = pear-trees and plum-trees, P.

Plowman, B. v. 16. - A. S. plume, Ælfric's Grammar, 6 (Bosworth); cf. plum-sla, lit. plum-sloe, plum-treaw, plum-tree, in Ælfric's Gloss. Nomina Arborum. Here plum-slú translates Lat. pruniculus, and plum-treow translates prunus. β . The A.S. plume is a mere variation of Lat. prunum, a plum, with change of r to l, and of n to m. The change from r to l is very common, and hardly needs illustration; the Span. coronel = E. colonel. The change from n to m is not unfrequent, as in lime-tree for line-tree, venom for Lat. uenenum, vellum from F. velin, megrim from F. migraine. Thus plum is a doublet of prune; see Prune, which is of Gk. origin. The Swed. plommon, Dan. blomme, G. pflaume, are all alike borrowed from Lat. prunum. Der. blomme, G. pflaume, are all alike borrowed from Lat. prunum.

PLUMP (1), full, round, fleshy. (E. or O. Low G.) 'Plump Jack, 1 Hen. IV, ii. 4. 527; 'plumpy Bacchus,' Antony, ii. 7. 121. M. E. plomp, rude, clownish (as in Dutch), Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox, ed. Arber, p. 100, l. 12. The word is in rather early use as a sb., meaning 'a cluster, a clump,' applied either to a compact body of men, or to a clump of trees. 'Presede into the plumpe' = he pressed into the throng; Morte Arthure, ed. Brock, 2199. Though it cannot be traced much further back, the word may be E., as the radical verb is preserved in the prov. E. plim, to swell, given as an Exmoor word by Grose, but somewhat widely known, and still in use in Oxfordshire and elsewhere.

B. Hence plump means orig. 'swollen,' and since that which is swollen becomes tight and firm, we find plump further used in the sense of 'hard;' as, 'the ways are plump' = the roads are used in the sense of 'hard;' as, 'the ways are plump = the roats are hard (Kent); E. D. S. Gloss. B. 11; C. 5. In Oxfordshire, the word plim is also used as an adj., in the sense of plump. The word appears in most Teutonic tongues. Cf. 'Plump, to swell;' Nares, ed. Halliwell. + O. Du. plomp, 'rude, clownish, blockish, or dull;' Hexham. This is a metaphorical use, from the notion of thickness. + Swed. plump, clownish, coarse. + Dan. plump, clumsy, vulgar. + G. plump, heavy, clumsy, blunt. Der. plump-ly, plump-ness. Also plump-er, a vote given at elections, when a man who has a vote for two separate candidates gives a single vote to one, thus swelling out that candidate's number of votes as compared with the rest; see Todd's (Todd). Johnson notes that it is sometimes pronounced ignorantly [and commonly] plump. Johnson also gives plump, verb, 'to fall like a stone into the water; a word formed from the sound, or rather corrupted from plumb.' Cf. 'It will give you a notion how Dulcissa plumps into a chair;' Spectator, no. 492. B. However expressive the word may seem, a careful examination of its history will tend to shew that it is really a peculiar use of plumb, and derived from F. plomb, Lat. plumbum, lead. 'To fall like lead' must have been a few outsite metaphor from the explicit times and Diez shews. in been a favourite metaphor from the earliest times, and Diez shews, in his article on Ital. piombare, to fall like lead, that this metaphor is widely spread in the Romance languages. Cf. Ital. cadere a piombo, to fall plump, lit. like lead; F. à plomb, 'downright;' à plomb sur, 'direct, or downright;' Cot. We even find it in M. E.; 'Hy plumten 'direct, or downright;' Cot. We even find it in M. E.; 'Hy plumten doune, as a doppe'= they dived straight down, like a diving-bird; K. Alisaunder, 5776. Y. We also find Du. plomp, interj., plump, plompen, to plumpe; Dan. plumpe, to plump, to souse; Swed. plumpa, to plump, to fall; G. plumpen, to fall plump. All of these may be suspected to owe their peculiar form to the Lat. plumbum, though easily supposed to be imitative. The word tends also to confusion with Plump (1), from which I believe it to be wholly distinct. See further under Plunge. Der. plump, verb, as above.

PLUNDER, to rob, pillage. (G.) A note in Johnson's Dict. (ed. Todd) says that 'Fuller considers the word as introduced into the language about 1642. R. pives a quotation for it from Prynne.

the language about 1642.' R. gives a quotation for it from Prynne, Treachery and Disloyalty, pt. iv. pp. 28, 29 (not dated, but after A.D. 1642, as it refers to the civil war). He also cites a quotation dated 1642, and this may be taken to be nearly the exact date when the word was borrowed. Hexham, in his Du. Dict., ed. 1658, gives O. Du. plunderen, plonderen, 'to plunder, or to pillage;' the mod. Du. spelling is plunderen. It is one of the very few G. words in English, and seems to have been introduced directly rather than through the Dutch. - G. plündern, to plunder, pillage, sack, ransack; provincially, to remove with one's baggage. Derived from the G. sb. plunder, trumpery, trash, baggage, lumber; the E. keeping the vowel of the β. Connected with Low G. plunnen, formerly also plunden, rags; Bremen Wörterbuch. The orig. sense of the sb. was 'rags, hence, worthless household stuff; the verb meant, accordingly, to strip a household even of its least valuable contents. The Dan. plyndre, Swed. plundra, Du. plunderen, are all alike borrowed from the G. or Low G.

Formed from a Low Lat. plumbicare*, not found, but the existence of which is verified by the Picard plonquer, to plunge, dive, due to the same Low Lat. form; see Diez, s.v. piombare. plonger is a frequentative of plomber, to cover with lead, to sound the depth of water; from F. plomb, lead; see Plumb. PLUPERFECT, the name of a tense in grammar. (L.) In the Grammar prefixed to Cotgrave's F. Dict. will be found the expression 'the præterpluperfect tense;' he gives 'J'avoies esté, I had been' as an example. The E. word is a curious corruption of the Lat. name for the tense, viz. plusquamperfectum. We have dropped the syllable quam, and given to plus the F. pronunciation.—Lat. plus, more; quam, pneumaticus. - Gk. πνευματικόs, belonging to wind, breath, or air. -Gk. πνευματ., stem of πνεύμα, wind, air. – Gk. πνέειν, to blow, breathe; put for πνέξειν (base πνυ-). Cf. O.H.G. fnehan, to breathe hard; Curtius, i. 348. And see Neesing. Der. pneumatic-al, -al-ly; pneumatic-s. And see pneumonia.

POACH (1), to dress eggs. (F.,—O. Low G.?) Formerly poche. Egges well poched are better than roasted. They be moste holesome whan they be poched; Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 13. Spelt potch in Palsgrave; Levins; Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 53; and in Cotgrave. - F. pocher; Cotgrave gives 'Poché, poched, thrust or digged out with the fingers; oeuf poché, a potched egge.' real origin of F. pocher in this particular sense is much disputed. do not think we can derive the F. word from E. poke, verb, which is what Wedgwood's suggestion amounts to; see Poke (2). Littré unhesitatingly derives pocher from F. poche, a pouch, pocket; but this does not explain Cotgrave's expression thrust, or digged out. Indeed, he goes on to point out that two verbs have been confused. There is (1) F. pocher, from poche; and (2) F. pocher, poucher (both forms are in Cotgrave), 'to thrust or dig out with the fingers,' which rests upon pouce, the thumb. What was the orig. sense of 'a poached egg' is a matter of dispute. It can hardly be an egg of which the inside is 'dug out' by the fingers or by the thumb; nor does 'poked egg' give any satisfactory sense. Scheler explains it very differently; he thinks that 'a poached egg' means to dress eggs in such a manner as to keep the yoke in a rounded form,' and that the sense rests upon that of 'pouch.' In this view, it is, in fact, 'a pouched egg.' I would explain it still more simply by supposing that the egg is likened to a pouch, because the art is to dress it in such a way as not to let the yolk escape. I incline, therefore, to Scheler's view, that pocher is here derived from poche, a pouch. See Pouch, Poke (1).

POACH (2), to intrude on another's preserves, for the purpose of stealing game. (F., = O. Low G.?) 'His greatest fault is, he hunts too much in the purlieus. 'Would he would leave off poaching!'

pocher le labeur d'autruy, to poch into, or incroach upon, another man's imploiment, practise, or trade; Cot.

B. Just as in the man's imploiment, practise, or trade; Cot. β . Just as in the case of Poach (1), there is great difficulty in assigning the right sense to F. pocher. Cotgrave gives it only as meaning 'to thrust, or dig at with the fingers,' in which sense it is also spelt poucher, and rests upon pouce, the thumb; see Littré. But Littre also assigns as an old sense of the verb, to put in a poke, sack, or pouch (and certainly pocher le labeur looks as if we may translate it to pocket the labour'); he also cites the Norman poquer, to carry fruits in one's pocket.

y. If we give the verb the sense adduced by Cotgrave, we may derive it from pouce = Lat. pollicem, acc. of pollex, the thumb.

8. It seems simpler to derive it directly from pocke, the pocket, in which case pocher may mean either to put into one's own pocket, or, possibly, to put one's hand in the pocket of another. See Pouch. And see Poke (1), Poke (2), for further discussion of these words. Der. poach-er.

POCK, a small pustule. (E.; perhaps C.) We generally speak of 'the small pox;' but the spelling pox is absurd, since it stands for pocks, the pl. of pock, a word seldom used in the singular. We might as well write sox as the pl. of sock; indeed, I have seen that spelling used for abbreviation. The word pock is best preserved in the adj. pocky, Hamlet, v. 1. 181. The term small pox in Beaum. and Fletcher, Fair Maid of the Inn, it. 2 (Clown), is spelt pocks in the old edition, according to Richardson. Cotgrave explains F. morbille by 'the small pox,' but in Sherwood's Index it is 'the small pockes; and in fact, the spelling pocks is extremely common. The pl. was once dissyllabic. Fabyan has: he was vysyted with the ph. was once dissynante. Fabyan has: he was vysyted with the sykenesse of pockys;' vol. ii. an. 1363, ed. Ellis, p. 653. M. E. pokke, pl. pokkes, P. Plowman, B. xx. 97.— A.S. poc, a pustule. 'Gif poc sy on eagan' = if there be a pustule on the eye, in a MS., foll. 142, 152, described by Wanley in his Catalogue of A.S. MSS., p. 304. So also 'wip pic-aidle' = for pock-disease, meaning small p. 304. So also 'wip púc-ádle' = for pock-disease, meaning small pox, A.S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, ii. 104, l. 14. There is an accent over the o in the MS., both here and in 11. 22, 23 (same page), but it is omitted in Il. 19, 24. + Du. pok, a pock. + G. pocke, a pock. Perhaps related to Poke (1), with the notion of 'bag;' and probultimately of Celtic origin. Cf. Irish pucoid, a pustule, pucadh, a swelling up, Gael. pucaid, a pimple. Der. pox (=pocks); pock-y.

POCKET, a small pouch. (F., =O Low G. or C.) M. E. poket, Prompt. Parv. 'Sered pokets' = small waxed bags; Chaucer, C. T. 16270. From a dialectal form of F. pochette, probably Norman. Métivier gives the modern Guernsey form as pouquette, dimin. of pouque, a sack or pouch; the older spellings would be poquette and poque. He cites a Norman proverb: 'Quant il pleut le jour Saint Marc, Il ne faut ni pouque ni sac' = when it rains on St. Mark's day (April 25), one wants neither poke nor bag. It is therefore a dimin. of O. Norman poque, Parisian F. poche. — O. Du. poke, a bag, 11 exham; see Pouch, Poke (1). Der. pocket, verb, Temp. ii. I. 67; pocket-book, pocket-money.

POD, a husk, a covering of the seed of plants. (Scand.? or C.?) In speaking of the furniture necessary for a cart, Tusser enumerates 'cart-ladder, and wimble, with percer, and pod;' Husbandry, ed. for E. D. S., § 17, st. 6, p. 36. Pod was explained by Mavor to mean 'a box or old leather bottle nailed to the side of the cart to hold mecessary implements, and perhaps grease.' The orig. sense was merely 'bag;' and the word is the same with pad, a cushion, i. e. a stuffed bag, and related to pudding, of which the old meaning was 'sausage,' i. e. stuffed skin.

B. The nearest word, in form, is Dan. pude, a cushion, pillow, Swed. dial. pude (also puda, puta), a cushion of the cushion pudding, a cushion pudding, swed. Rietz). The word is of Celtic origin, and may have been taken from Celtic directly; cf. Gael. put, a large buoy, commonly made of an inflated sheep-skin. From the root PUT, to bulge out, be inflated, discussed under Pudding, q. v. \(\gamma\). The peculiar use of pod to mean 'the husk' may have resulted from confusion with the old word cod, a husk. Thus what we now call a pea-pod is called word coa, a nusk. Inus what we now call a pea-pod is called peased in Shak. Mids. Nt. Dr. iii. 1. 191; &c. See Cod (2).

POKE (1), a bag, pouch. (C.) 'Two pigges in a poke' = two pigs in a bag, Chaucer, C. T. 4276; Havelok, 555. - Irish poc, a bag; Gael. poca, a bag. β. That the word is really Celtic appears from this, that a Celtic e would be represented in A. S. by the guttural λ as in the case of Irish cent = A. S. by a hundred; so the A.S. tural h, as in the case of Irish cead = A. S. hund, a hundred; so the A.S. form would be poha. We find poha vel posa as a gloss to peram in the Northumbrian gloss to St. Mark, vi. 8, in the Lindisfarne MS., and pohha vel posa in the Rushworth MS.; the form poca given in Bosworth being due to a misreading. Pohha also occurs in the Glossary to Cockayne's A. S. Leechdoms.

7. We find also Icel. pohi, a bag, O. Du. pohe, 'a poke, sack,' Hexham, perhaps borrowed from Celtic; also the related Goth, puggs (= pungs), a bag, Luke, x. 4; Iccl. pungr, a pouch, A. S. pung, a purse, pouch. S. Perhaps connected with Lat. bucca, the inflated cheek; so that the orig. sense was 'that which is blown out, or inflated;' just as bag is connected with the verb to bulge. Cf. Gael. poc, to become like a bag. Pock. Cf. Fick, iii. 167. Der. pock-et. Doublet, pouck.

POET, a composer in verse. (F., -L., -Gk.) M. E. poete, Wyclif, Deeds [Acts], xvii. 28; Gower, C. A. iii. 374, note, l. 2. - F. poetes, 'a poet, maker;' Cot. - Lat. poeta. - Gk. ποιητής, a maker, poke; whence prov. E. pote, to push, kick, thrust with the feet, North β. From the same Celtic source is O. Du. poke, a dagger, lit. 'a thruster, Hexham. — PUK, to thrust, prick, whence also Lat. pungere, to prick; see Pungent. Der. poke, sb., poker; and see punker. POLE(1), a stake, long thick rod. (L.) M. E. pole, P. Plowman, B. xviii. 52. The E. long o presupposes an A. S. ά, as in stone from A. S. stán. &cc. Thus pole = A. S. pál. We find 'Palus, pal' in Wright's Vocab. i. 84, last line; where pal must receive an accent, and be written pál. Merely a borrowed word, from Lat. pālus, a stake. Cf. W. pawl, a pole. See Pale (1). Similarly the G. pfahl, M. H. G. pfiil, a stake, is merely borrowed from the Latin. Doublets. bale (1). pawl.

POLE (2), a pivot, axis, end of the axis of the earth. (F., -L., -Gk.)

'The north pole;' L. L. L. v. 2. 699. M. E. pol, Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, pt. i. § 14, l. 6.—F. pol, 'a pole; pol artique, the north pole; Cot. - Lat. polum, acc. of polus, a pole. - Gk. πόλος, a pivot, hinge, axis, pole. - Gk. πέλειν, to be in motion; the poles being the points of the axis round which motion takes place. Allied, by the usual substitution of initial π for κ, to κέλομαι, κέλλω, I urge on, syllable, see Cat. But the sense of pole, M. E. pol. is unknown. The proposed etymologies are, (1) a Polish cat (Mahn); this seems very improbable, as the word is in Chaucer. (2) A cat that goes after poultry, from F. poule, a hen; this is contradicted by the vowel. (3) From O. F. pulent, stinking (Wedgwood); but this word is merely from the Lat. purulentus, and the syllable pul-alone (=Lat. purulentus) would be unmeaning; besides which, this again gives the wrong vowel. (4) I shall add a possible guess, that it may be pool-eat, i. e. cat living in a hole or lurrow since the Irish toll. Gael toll Core. cat living in a hole or burrow, since the Irish poll, Gael. poll, Corn. pol, mean 'a hole' or 'pit' as well as a pool.

POLEMICAL, warlike, controversial. (Gk.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. Formed with suffix -al (= Lat. -alis) from Gk. πολεμικόs, warlike. - Gk. πόλεμοs, war.

β. Formed with suffix -ε-μοs (like warlike. Gk. $\pi \delta \lambda \epsilon \mu \sigma s$, war. β . Formed with suffix $-\epsilon - \mu \sigma s$ (like $\delta \nu - \epsilon - \mu \sigma s = Lat$. an-i-mus) from $\pi \sigma \lambda = \pi \alpha \rho$. $- \checkmark$ PAR, to strike, dν-ε-μοε = Lat. an-i-mus) from πολ = παλ = παρ. - √ PAR, to strike, fight; appearing in Zend par, to fight (Curtius, i. 345), Lithuan. per-ti, to strike; cf. Russ. prate, to resist. Perhaps to the same root belong Gk. πάλ-εκυε, a battle-axe, Skt. paraçu, a hatchet. Der. polemic-al-ly; also polemic-s, from Gk. πολεμικ-όs.

POLICE, the regulation of a country with respect to the preservation of order; hence, the civil officers for preserving order. (F, - L., -Gk.) The expression the police is short for the police-force, i. c. the force required for maintaining police, or public order. The sb. is in Todd's Johnson; but we already find the expression 'so well a policed [regulated] kingdome' in Howell, Instructions for Foreign Travel, ed. Arber, p. 78, last line but one; A.D. 1642.—F. police, 'policy, politick regiment, civill government;' Cot.—Lat. politia.—Gk. molitia.—Gk. molitia.—Gk. molitia.—Gk. molitia. a citizen. - Gk. πολι-, crude form of πόλιε, a city; with suffix -τηε β. The orig. sense of πύλιε was 'a crowd, throng; hence, a community; the Skt. puri [a town] for pari = Gk. $\pi \omega \lambda is$ comes undoubtedly from the root PAR, to fill (Gk. $\pi \epsilon \lambda$, $\pi \lambda \epsilon$), and denoted originally the idea of fulness, of a crowd, a throng, from which, later, the idea "town" is developed even without this physical which, later, the deal town is developed even without this physical conception; Curtius, i. 102. With Skt. puri cf. Indian poor in Bhurt-poor, Futten-poor, &c. And see Folk, Full. Der. police, M. E. policie, Chaucer, C. T. 12534, answering to O. F. police (= Lat. politia), an older form of F. police. Also polity, in Hooker, Eccl. Polity, from Lat. politia; politic, spelt politick in Minsheu, from Lat. politicus, Gk. πολιτικός; polit-ic-ly; politic-s, spelt politickes in Minsheu; polit-ic-al, Minsheu; polit-ic-al-ly; polit-ic-i-an, used as adj. in Milton, Samson, 1105. And see acro-polis, metro-polis, cosmo-polite.

POLICY, a warrant for money in the public funds, a writing containing a contract of insurance. (F., -Low Lat., -Gk.) Quite distinct from policy as connected with Police, q.v. 'A policy of insurance is a contract between A and B;' Blackstone. And see Phillips' Dict., ed. 1706. The form is prob. due to confusion with policy in the other sense, or the final syllable may have been due to the Span. or Ital. form. – F. police, a policy; police d'assurance, policy of insurance; Hamilton. Cf. Span. poliza, a written order to receive a sum of money; poliza de seguro, a policy of insurance; Ital. polizza, a bill, ticket, invoice. - Late Lat. politicum, poleticum, poleticum, cum, various corruptions of polyptychum, a register, a roll in which dues were registered, a word of common occurrence; Ducange. Gk. woliming, a piece of writing folded into many leaves; hence, a long register or roll; orig. neut. of πολύπτυχος, having many folds, of England (Halliwell). Cf. Gael. put, to push, thrust. See Put. 6 form of πτυξ, a fold, leaf, layer, connected with πτύσσειν (= πτύκ-γειν), β. From the same Celtic source is O. Du. poke, a dagger, lit, 'a thruster,' to fold, double up; and with πυκ-νόε, close, compact. These words go back to a base www, to make firm, whence prob. also Lat. pugnus and E. fist; Curtius, ii. 105. Cf. Diptych.

polischen, Chaucer, C. T. 9456; sometimes contracted to polschen, as in P. Plowman, B. v. 482. 'A marble stone polyshed;' Caxton, Reynard the Fox, ed. Arber, p. 11.—F. poliss-, stem of polissant, pres. part. of polir, to polish.—Lat. polire, to polish.

B. Here polire part. of polir, to polish. - Lat. polire, to polish. prob. = po-lire, where po is a prefix, supposed to be related to the prefix pro-, before, and to Gk. $\pi p \delta s$, towards; whilst -lire is related to linere, to smear, and to litera, a letter; see Letter, Liniment. Thus polire = to smear upon, make glossy. Der. polisher; also polite, in Phillips, ed. 1706, from Lat. politus, pp. of polire; politely, polite-ness.

POLKA, a dance. (Bohemian?) Said to have been first danced by a Bohemian peasant-girl in 1831, and to have been named polka at Prague in 1835, from the Bohemian pulka, half; because of the half-step prevalent in it. See the account in Mahn's Webster. Cf. Russ.

POLL, the head, esp. the back of it, a register of heads or persons, POLL, the head, esp. the back of it, a register of heads or persons, a place where votes are taken. (O. Low G.) All the meanings are extended from poll, the rounded part of the head; hence, a head, person, &c. M. E. pol, pl. polles. 'Pol bi pol'=head by head, separately, P. Plowman, B. xi. 57. 'Bi pate ant by polle'= by pate and poll; Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 237, in a MS. of the reign of Edw. II. [Not in A. S.] An O. Low G. word, found in O. Du. polle, pol, or bol, 'the head or the pate,' Hexham; also in Low G. polle, the head, Bremen Wörterbuch; Swed. dial. pull (Rietz), Dan. puld (for pull), the crown of the head.

B. As initial p and k may be interchanged, it is the same as Swed. kulle, a crown, top, O. Swed. kulle, kulle, the crown of the head. kulla, to poll or shave O. Swed. kull, kulle, the crown of the head, kulla, to poll or shave off the hair (Ihre); Icel. kolir, top, shaven crown, kolidir, having the hair polled or cut short. See Kill.

y. These words appear the hair polled or cut short. See Kill. y. These words appear to be of Celtic origin; one sense of Irish coll is 'the head, or neck;' cf. W. col, peak, summit, and perhaps Lat. corona, a crown, Gk. κορυφή, a summit, κολοφών, a summit, κάρα, the head, κάρ, the hair of the head. Der. poll, verb, to cut off the hair, Numb. i. 2, iii. 47; poll-tax, a tax by the head, i.e. on each person. Also pole-axe, formerly pollax, Chaucer, C. T. 2546, O. Low G. pollexe, Bremen Wörterbuch, from O. Low G. polle, the poll, head, and eze, an axe; I doubt if it is the same as Icel. bolozi, which is rather an axe for lopping branches, from bolr, bulr, the trunk of a tree. Also poll-ard, used as a sb. in Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 424, and in Sir T. Browne, Cyrus Garden, c. iii. § 12, in which the use of the suffix -ard is not easy to account for, though it is, etymologically, the same as in drunk-ard, i. e. F. -ard from O. H. G. -hart, hard.

POLLOCK, POLLACK, a kind of cod-fish, the whiting. (C.) In Carew (Survey of Cornwall?); Todd's Johnson. Of Celtic origin; cf. Gael. pollag, a kind of fish, the gwyniad (i. e. whiting); Irish pullog, a pollock. Perhaps from Gael, and Irish poll, a pool; cf.

He also gives poltrare, poltrire, poltraggiare, poltroneggiare, to play the coward, to loll or wallowe in idlenes, to lie idlie a bed.' B. The old sense is clearly a sluggard, one who lies in bed; from poltro, a bed, couch. Poltro is for polstro, and is derived from G. polster, a cushion, bolster, quilt; see Bolster. Thus 'a poltroon' is a bolster-man, one who loves his couch. The usual astounding derivation from pollice truncus, deprived of one's thumb, rendered famous by Horne Tooke, is one of those etymologies which much folded. - Gk. πολύ, neut. of πολύε, much; and πτυχο-, crude hare prized as jewels, not because they rest on any evidence, but beword; it should rather be poltroom-y = F. poltronie, 'knavery;' Cot.

POPE, the father of a church, the bishop of Rome. (L., - Gk.) M. E. pope, Owl and Nightingale, 746. In Layamon, 14886, the older version has the dat. papen, where the later version has pope. These forms shew that the word was not taken from the F. pape, but from A.S. pápa (dat. pápan), which was borrowed immediately from the Latin. The A.S. homily on the Birthday of S. Gregory (ed. Elstob) begins with the words 'Gregorius se hálga pápa' = Gregory, Elstob) begins with the words 'Gregorius se halga pápa' = Gregory, the holy pope. - Lat. papa. - Gk. πάπα, πάππα, νοc. οf πάπαs, πάππαs, papa, father. See Papa. Der. pope-dom, A.S. pápedóm, A.S. Chron., an. 1124; pop-i·h, Titus Andron., v. 1. 76; pop-er-y. POPINJAY, a parrot; a mark like a parrot, put on a pole to be shot at; a coxcomb. (Bavarian; with modified suffix.) M. E. popingay, Chaucer, C. T. 13299; where the Ellesmere and Hengwrt MSS. have papeiay (= papejay); Six-text ed., Group E, 1. 2322. The pl. papeiayes occurs in Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 1465. Thus then is excressent, as in other words before a i-sound: cf. messenger for excrescent, as in other words before a j-sound; cf. messenger for messager, passenger for passager, &c. -O. F. papegai, papegay, 'a parrot or popinjay; also a woodden parrat, ... whereat there is a generall shooting once every year; Cot. Mod. F. papegai, papegaut; the latter spelling has a needless suffixed t, and is due to O. F. papegau, found in the 13th century (Littre). Cf. Span. papagayo, Port. papagaio, Ital. papagallo, a parrot.

β. It is clear that we have here two distinct forms; (1) F. papegai, Span. papagayo, papagaio, in which the base papa- is modified by the addition of F. papers, in which the base papers is modified by the addition of F. -gai, Span. -gayo, due to a popular etymology which regarded the bird as having gay plumage, or as chattering like the jay (it matters little which, since gay and jay are one and the same); and (2) O. F. papegau, Ital. papagallo, in which the bird is regarded as a kind of cock. Lat gallus, and the latter forms. of cock, Lat. gallus; and the latter form appears to be the older. These modifications of the suffix are not of great consequence; it is of more importance to tell what is meant by the prefix papaγ. Respecting this there is much dispute; it has been suggested (as in Littre) that the word is Arabic; but the late Arab. babaghá, a parrot, appears to be merely borrowed from the Span. papagayo, by the usual weakening of p to b (Diez). 8. There remains only the suggestion of Wedgwood, that the syllables pa-pa- are imitative, and were suggested by the Bavarian pappeln, pappelen, or pappern, to chatter, whence the sb. pappel, a parrot, lit. a babbler; Schmeller, i. 398. 399. Wedgwood adds: 'So also Skt. vach, to speak; vacha, a parrot. The change in the last element from Ital. gallo, Fr. gau, a cock, to Fr. gai, geai, a jay, probably arose from the fact that the jay, being remarkable both for its bright-coloured plumage and chattering voice, seemed to come nearer than the cock to the nature of the parrot.' of the parrot.

6. We may conclude that F. papegai, a talking jay, was modified from the older O. F. papegau, a talking cock; see Jay and Gallinaceous. Also, Bavar. pappeln is cognate with E. Babble, q.v. Cf. bubblyjock (i. e. babble-jack), the Lowland Scotch name for a turkey-cock; so named from the gobbling sound which it makes.

POPLAR, a kind of tall tree. (F., -L.) M. E. poplere, Chaucer, C. T. 2923; popler, Palladius on Husbandry, b. iii. 1. 194. -O. F.

suffix -ier (Lat. -arius) from O. F. pople * (not recorded), later form peuple, 'the poplar;' Cot. Cf. prov. E. popple, a poplar; Nares, ed. Halliwell.—Lat. populum, acc. of populus, a poplar.

B. Origin uncertain, but probably from its trembling leaves; populus—palpal-us, by reduplication of the base pal-, to vibrate, shake, seen in Gk. πάλλειν, to shake, vibrate, brandish; similarly we have Lat. pal-p-itare, to palpitate, tremble, pal-pe-bra, the quivering eye-lid. See Palpitate.

POPLIN, a fabric made of silk and worsted. (F.) Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. - F. popeline, of which an older form was papeline, first mentioned in A.D. 1667 (Littré). β. Origin unknown; it has been supposed to be connected with F. papal, papal, because it may have been first made at Avignon, where there was once a papal court, A.D. 1309-1408. The chronology does not bear out this suggestion. Cf. Span. popolens, populina, poplin.

y. I shall record my guess, that popelin, not papelin, is the right form; and that it is connected with O. F. popelin, 'a little finical darling,' Cot.; popin, 'spruce, neat, trimme, fine,' id.; se popiner, 'to trimme or tricke up himselfe.' In this view, popelin means 'spruce stuff for dresses,' or 'stuff fit for finical people,' an easy solution. words are related to Low Lat. popula, pupula, a young girl of light demeanour (Ducange); Ital. pupina, a doll (Florio), and to E. puppet; see Puppet.

In Diyden, Annus Mirabilis, st. 29; spelt porcellan, Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1665, pp. 391, 396; and see extract from Florio below. Porcelain was so named from the resemblance of its finely polished surface to that of the univalve shell of the same name, called in English the Venus' shell; as applied to the shell, the name goes back to the 13th century, when it occurs in the F. version of Marco Polo in place of the Ital. name (Littré). Cotgrave gives porcelaine, pourcelaine, 'the purple fish, also, the sea-snail, or Venus shell.'-Ital. porcellana, 'a purple fish, a kinde of fine earth called porcelane, wherof they make fine China dishes, called porcellan dishes;' Florio, β. Again, the shell derived its name from the curved ed. 1598. shape of its upper surface, which was thought to resemble the raised back of a little hog. [It is very easy to make a toy-pig with a Venus' shell and some putty; and such toys are often for sale.]— Ital. porcella, 'a sow-pig, a porkelin;' Florio. PORCUPINE, a rodent quadruped, covered with spines or quills. (F., -L.) a. In Shakespeare, old edd. have porpentine; a spelling which also occurs in Ascham, Toxophilus, ed. Arber, p. 31. spelling which also occurs in Ascham, Toxophilus, ed. Arber, p. 31. Levins has porpin. Huloet has: 'Porpyn, beaste, havinge prickes on his backe.' The Prompt. Parv. has: 'Poork-poynt, perpoynt, beste, Histrix;' p. 409. 'Porkepyn, a beest, porc espin;' Palsgrave.

3. We thus see that the animal had two very similar that the animal had two very similar poplier (13th cent.), mod. F. peuplier, a poplar; Littré. Formed with names, (1) porkepyn, shortly porpin, easily lengthened to porpint by the usual excrescent t after n, and finally altered to porpentine as a by-form of porkepyn; and (2) pork-point, porpoint; the latter of which forms would also readily yield porpentine.

y. We conclude that porpentine is late; that porkpoint was little used, and simply meant a pork or pig furnished with points or sharp quills; and that the modern porcupine is due (by substitution of obscure u for obscure v) to the M. E. form porkepyn, pronounced in three syllables and with the y long.

8. The M. E. porkepyn is obviously derived from O. F. porcespin, a word known to Palsgrave, A.D. 1530, but now obsolete, and supplanted by porcepic, in the 13th century pore spit (Littré), a form which is also given by Cotgrave, who has: Porcespi, a porcupine.

Thus the O. F. names for the animal were also double; (1) porcespitation of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of espi = porc-espic, the pig with spikes (see Spike); and (2) porc-espin, the pig with spikes. The English has only to do with the latter, which, though obsolete in French, is preserved in Span. puerco espin, Port. porco espinho, Ital. porco spinoso (Meadows, Eng. Ital. section). 2. Finally, the F. porc is from Lat. porcus; and O. F. espin is a by-form of O. F. espine (F. epine), from Lat. spina, a thorn. See Pork and Spine. It is easier to see the etymology than to prove it; I do not think it has been formally proved before. Holland, in his tr. of Pliny, b. viii. c. 35, has pork-pen, where pen, i. e. quill, is an ingenious substitution for -epine.

PORE (1), a minute hole in the skin. (F., -I., -Gk.) pore, Prompt. Parv. p. 409. The pl. poorus (= pores) is in Trevisa, i. 53.—F. pore, 'a pore;' Cot.—Lat. porum, acc. of porus, a pore.—Gk. πόρος, a ford, passage, way, pore.— PAR, to fare; see Fare. Der. por-ous from F. poreux, 'pory,' Cot.; porous-ly, -ness; por-os-i-ty, [Perhaps also puren; 'Abute for to pure'=to peer or pore about; K. Horn, ed. Lumby, l. 1092. But this example may belong to the verb to peer, which may have been confused with pore; though I believe there is no real connection between the words.]—Swed. dial. pora, pura, pāra, to work slowly and gradually, to do anything slowly; Rietz. Cf. Low G. purren, to poke about; uut purren, to clean out a hole by poking about with a pointed instrument; Du. porren, to poke, thrust, instigate. B. The idea seems to be that of poking or thrusting about in a slow and toilsome way, as in the case of clearing out a stopped-up hole; hence to pore over a job, to be a long while about it. Much in the same way we use the expression to potter about, or to potter over a thing; where potter is the frequentative of prov. E. pote, to thrust, from W. putio, to thrust.

y. As most Scand. words beginning with p are unoriginal, the word may be ultimately Celtic; cf. Gael. purr, to push, thrust, drive, urge, jerk, butt; Irish purraim, I push, jerk, thrust.

PORK, the flesh of swine. (F., -L.) M. E. pork, Rich. Cuer de Lion, 3049. - F. pore, 'a pork, hog; also pork, or swines flesh;' Cot. - Lat. poreum, acc. of poreus, a pig. + Lithuan. parszas, a pig (Nesselmann). + W. porch. + Irish ore, by the usual loss of initial p. +A.S. fearh, a pig; whence E. farrow. PORPHYRY, a hard, variegated rock, of purple and white colour, (F., = L., = Gk.) M. E. porphúrie, Chaucer, C. T. 16243. = O. F. porphyrie* (?), not found; Cotgrave has only porphyre, 'porphiry;' but the E. form appears fuller and older. Abbreviated from Lat. porphyrites, porphyry. = Gk. πορφυρίτηε, porphyry; so named from its purple colour. Formed with suffix -ιτηε, signifying 'resemblance' from πορφυρα, πορφυρά, the purple-fish, purple-dve: csemblance, from πορφυρ-, πορφύρα, the purple-fish, purple-dye; cf. πορφύρεοs, purple; see Purple. Der. porphyritic, from Lat. por-

F. porpeis, a porpoise (Roquefort), spelt porpeys, A.D. 1410 (Ducange); a term utterly obsolete, and supplanted by the name marsouin (lit. mere-swine), borrowed from G. meerschwein. Put for porc-peis. - Lat. porcum, acc. of porcus, a pig; and piscem, acc. of piscis, a fish, cognate with E. fish. See Pork and Fish. So also O. Ital. pesce-porco, 'a sea-hogge, a hogge-fish;' Florio. The mod.

Ital. name is porce marino, marine pig; Span. puerco marino.

PORRIDGE, a kind of broth. (F., = L.) In Shak. Temp. ii. I.

10. The M. E. name was porree, or poré, sometimes puree; the suffix -idge (=-age) is clearly due to confusion with pottage, M. E. potage, for which see Pottage. We find, Porré, or purré, potage, Prompt. Parv.; and Way's note gives the spelling porray. Way adds: 'this term implies generally pease-pottage, still called in $\mathbb{P}$1027.

French puree; .. according to the Ortus, it seems to have denoted a pottage of leeks, poratum est cibus de poris factus, Anglicé porray; he also notes the Low Lat. form porrata.—O.F. porée, porrée, beets, also pot-herbs, and thence also, pottage made of beets or with other herbs; Cot.-Low Lat. porrata (also porreta), broth made with leeks; Ducange. Cf. Ital. porrata, leek-soup. Formed, with Lat. pp. fem. suffix -ata, from Lat. porr-um or porr-us, a leek. B. Porrum stands for an older form porsum (parsum), as shewn by the PORRINGER, a small dish for porridge. (F., -L.; with E. suffix.) In Shak. Tam. Shrew, iv. 3. 64; Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 31. Formed from porrige (= porridge), with suffix -er, and inserted n before soft g, as in messenger for messager, passenger for passager. Sugested by pottanger (Palsgrave), a dish for pottage. See Porridge.

PORT (1), demeanour, carriage of the body. (F.,-L.) M. E. port, Chaucer, C. T. 69, 138.-F. port, 'the carriage, behaviour, or demeanor of a man; 'Cot. Cf. Ital. porto, carriage; Span. porte, deportment. Ash, due to the verb porter, to carry.—Lat. porter, to carry.—V PAR, to bring over; cf. Vedic Skt. pri, to bring over; whence also E. fare, to travel; see Fare. Der. port, verb, to carry, little used except in the phr. 'to port arms,' and in Milton's expression 'ported spears,' P. L. iv. 980. Also port-able, Mach. iv. 3. 89, from Lat. portabilis, that can be carried or borne; port-able-ness; port-age, Prompt. Parv., from F. portage, 'portage, carriage,' Cot. Also port-er, in the sense of 'carrier of a burden' (Phillips, ed. 1706), substituted for M. E. portour (Prompt. Parv.), from F. porteur, carrier,' Cot. And hence porter, the name of malt-liquor, so called because it was a favourite drink with London porters, supposed to be not older than A.D. 1750, see Todd's Johnson; also porter-age, a coined word. Port-folio, a case large enough to carry folio paper in, a coined word, with which cf. F. portefeuille. Port-manteau, from F. portmanteau (Cot.), lit. that which carries a mantle (see Mantle); but we also find port-mantua, Dryden, Kind Keeper, Act i. sc. 1, and portmantue, used by Cot to translate F. portmanteau; the latter is not quite the same word, but is derived from F. port-er and Mantua, q. v. Also port-ly, Merch. of Ven. i. 1. 9; port-li-ness. From the Lat. portare we also have com-port, de-port, de-port-ment, dis-port (and sport), ex-port, im-port, im-port-ant, pur-port, re-port, sup-port, rans-port, And see port (2), port (3), port-cullis, porch, portico, &c.

speaks of 'the fif portes,' now called the Cinque Ports, p. 51, l. 3.

The pl. porz (for ports) occurs in Layamon, 24413.—A. S. port; 'to dam porte'=to the haven, Ælfred, tr. of Beda, b. iv. c. I, near the end. And still preserved in Portsmouth (mouth of the port), Porchester (Port-chester), &c.; so that the word was in very early usc. β. Closely allied to Lat. porta, a gate; Lat. portus, a harbour.

B. Formed with suffix -ta from the base por-E. Formed with still x-ta from the base porseen in Gk. πόρος, a ford, way; from ✓ PAR, to pass through, fare, travel; see Fare. ¶ Though port does not seem to be used in M. E., there is an A. S. form porte (Grein), borrowed directly from Lat. porta. Der. port-er, M. E. porter, Floriz and Blauncheffur, ed. Lumby, l. 138, from O. F. portier, Lat. portarius (White); whence (with fem. suffix -ess = F. -esse = Lat. -issa, Gk. -100a), porter-ess, or shortly port-r-ess, Milton, P. L. ii. 746. Also port-al. Hamlet, iii. 4. 136, from O.F. portal (Burguy), Lat. portale, a vestibule, porch. Also port-hole, Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, st. 188. Also port-cullis, q. v., port-ic-o, q. v., porch, q. v. It is 'a perverted F. translation of Babi All, lit. the high gate, the chief office of the Ottoman government; Wedgwood. Cf. Arab. bdb, a gate, 'aliy, high; Rich. Dict. pp. 224, 21027.

2.113; Spenser, F. Q. v. 7. 4 - Lat. portendere, to foretell, predict. -Lat. por-, for O. Lat. port, towards; and tendere, to stretch forth; so Lat. por., for O. PORTESSE, PORTOS, PORTOUS, a breviary. (F.,-L.)

Spelt portesse in Spenser, F. Q. i. 4. 19. 'Poortos, booke, portiforium, breviarium;' Prompt. Parv. M. E. portous, portos, porthos, porthors, P. Plowman, B. xv. 122, and footnotes; and see note to the line for further examples. All various corruptions of O. F. porte hors, i.e. that which one carries abroad, a word compounded as the F. equivalent of Lat. portiforium, a breviary. I cannot give a quotation for F. portehors, but the M. E. spelling porthors is sufficient evidence. Compounded of F. porter, from Lat. portare, to carry; and F. hors, older form fors, out of doors, abroad, from Lat. foris, abroad, adv., due to sb. pl. fores, doors. See Port (1) and Door.

PORTICO, a porch. (Ital.,-1.) In Chapman, tr. of Homer, Od. iv. 405, 410.—Ital. portico.—Lat. porticum, acc. of porticus, a porch; see Porch. Doublet, porch.

PORTRAIT, a picture of a person. (F. -L.) In Shak. Merch. of Ven. ii. 9. 54; spelt pourtraict, Spenser, F.Q. ii. 1. 39. - O. F. pourtraict, 'a pourtrait;' Cot. - O. F. pourtraict, pourtrait, pp. of pourtrait PORTRAY, to draw, depict. (F.,-L.) M. E. pourtraien, Chaucer, C. T. 96; purtreyen, King Alisaunder, l. 1520. - O. F. portraire, later pourtraire, 'to pourtray, draw,' Cot.; mod. F. portraire. - Low Lat. protrahere, to paint, depict; Lat. protrahere, to drag or bring forward, expose, reveal. - Lat. pro-, forward; and trahere, to draw; see Pro- and Trace. Der. portrait, q.v.; whence portrait-ure, M. E. portreture, Gower, C. A. ii. 83, from O. F. pourtraicture, a pourtraiture, Cot., as if from Lat. protractura. And see protract. POSE (1), a position, attitude. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) We speak of 'the pose of an actor;' see Webster. Quite modern; not in Todd's Johnson; but the word is of importance. - F. pose, 'attitude, posjoinison; but the word is of importance. — F. pose, 'attitude, posture,' Hamilton; O. F. pose, 'a pawse, intermission, stop, ceasing, repose, resting;' Cot. — F. poser, 'to place, set, put,' Hamilton; 'to put, pitch, place, to seat, settle, plant, to stay, or lean on, to set, or lay down;' Cot. — Low Lat. pausare, to cease; also, to cause to rest, and hence used in the sense of Lat. ponere, to place (Ducange); Lat. pausare, to halt, cease, pause, to repose (in the grave), as in the phr. pausat in pace = (here) rests in peace (White). - Lat. pausa, a pause; a word of Greek origin; see Pause. Cf. Ital. posare, to put, lay down, rest, from posa, rest; Span. posar, to lodge, posada, an inn. to lodge, posada, an inn. F. etymology is the extraordinary substitution whereby the Low Lat. pausare came to mean 'to make to rest, to set,' and so usurped the place of the Lat. ponere, to place, set, with which it has no etymological connection. And this it did so effectually as to restrict the F. pondre, the true equivalent of Lat. ponere, to the sense of 'laying eggs;' whilst in all compounds it completely thrust it aside, so that compausare (i. e. F. composer) took the place of Lat. componere, and so on throughout. 2. Hence the extraordinary result, that whilst the E. verbs compose, depose, impose, propose, &c. exactly represent in sense the Lat. componere, deponere, imponere, proponere, &c., we cannot derive the E. verbs from the Lat. ones, since they have (as was said) no real etymological connection. Indeed, these words are not even of Lat. origin, but Greek.

3. The true derivatives from the Lat. ponere appear only in the substantives, such as position, composition, deposition; see under Position. Der. pose, verb, to assume an attitude, merely an E. formation from the sb. pose, an attitude, and quite modern. Also (from F. poser) the compounds ap-pose,

PORTEND, to betoken, presage, signify. (L.) In K. Lear, i. 2 dropped off; the older form of the verb was commonly to appose, a. 113; Spenser, F. Q. v. 7. 4.— Lat. portendere, to foretell, predict.—

Lat. port, for O. Lat. port, towards; and tendere, to stretch forth; so appose was to question, esp. in a puzzling way, to examine. 'When appose was to question, esp. in a puzzling way, to examine. When Nicholas Clifforde sawe himselfe so sore aposed [posed, questioned], he was shamfast; Berners, Froissart's Chron. c. 373 (R.) 'She would appose mee touching my learning and lesson; Stow's Chronicle, an. 1043. And see Chaucer, C. T. 7179, 15831; P. Plowman, B. i. 47, iii. 5, vii. 138, xv. 376. B. The word appears at first sight to answer to F. apposer, but that verb is not used in any such sense; and it is really nothing but a corruption of oppose, which was used convertibly with it. Thus we find 'Aposen, or oposyn, Opponere,' Prompt. Park. p. 12. 'Lottons one I make a tryall of Opponere,' Prompt. Parv., p. 13. 'I oppose one, I make a tryall of his lernyng, or I laye a thyng to his charge, Ie apose. I am nat to lerne nowe to oppose a felowe, à apposer ung gallant; 'Palsgrave. [Here the O. F. aposer, apposer, is, in the same way, a corruption of F. opposer.] 'But she, whiche al honour supposeth, The false prestes than opposeth [questions], And axeth [asks], &c.; Gower, C. y. The word A. i. 71, l. 21. See another example in Halliwell. arose in the schools; the method of examination was by argument, and the examiner was the umpire as to questions put by an opponent; hence to examine was also to oppose, or pose. Opponere, in philosophicis vel theologicis disputationibus contra argumentari; argumenter contre quelqu'un; Ducange, ed. Migne. For the etymology, see Oppose.

5. Lastly, the confusion can be accounted for, viz. by confusion of opponere, to question, argue, with the word apposite, applied to a neat answer; see Apposite, which really answers to Lat. appositus. Der. pos-er, Bacon, Essay 32; on which Mr. Aldis Wright says: 'an examiner, one who poses or puts questions; still in use at Eton and Winchester.' Hence also M. E. posen, to put a case, Chaucer, C. T. 1164. Der. puzzle, q. v.

POSE (3), a cold in the head. (E.?) Probably obsolete. M.E. pose, Chaucer, C. T. 4150, 17011. — A. S. ge-posu, a cough, 'wiò geposu, ad tussim gravem;' A. S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, i. 148.

POSITION, a situation, attitude, state, place. (F., – L.) In Shak, Tw. Nt. ii. 5, 130. [In Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. v. pr. 4, 1. 4685, the right reading seems to be possession, not position.] - F. position, 'a position;' Cot. - Lat. positionem, acc. of positio, a putting, placing. - Lat. positus, pp. of ponere, to place, put. \(\beta \). Lat. ponere (pp. positus) is generally thought to stand for po-sinere, where po- is β. Lat. ponere (pp. situs) is to let, allow, on which see Site.

Y. Following Corsen's explanation (Beitrage, 87) we may regard port (Umbrian pur) as the Latin representative of Gk. προτί (πρόs), Skt. prati, against, occurring with different phonetic modifications in pol-lingo, por-ricio, possideo, po-no for posino; Curtius, i. 355. POSITIVE, actual, undoubted, decisive certain. (F., -L.) The lit. sense is 'settled;' hence, certain. M. E. positif, Chaucer, C. T. 1169. - F. positif, omitted by Colgrave, but in use in the 14th century (Littre). - Lat. positions, settled, esp. by agreement. - Lat. positus, pp. of ponere, to place; see Position. Der. positive-ly, -ness. Also positiv-ism, due to Comte, born about 1795, died 1852

POSSE, power. (L.) 'Posse comitatus, or power of the county; Blount's Nomo-lexicon, ed. 1691. - Lat. posse, to be able; used as sb.

POSSESS, to own, seize, have, hold. (L.) The verb is probably due to the sb. possession, which was in earlier use, occurring in Chaucer, C. T. 2244, and in Robert of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 239, l. 19. Possess is extremely common in Shak.; see L. L. L. v. 2.383, &c. — Lat. possessus, pp. of possidere, to possess, to have in possession. B. Prob. derived from Lat. port.* or porti-*, towards, a conjectural form of the prefix; and sedere, to sit, remain, continue; a conjectural form of the preix; and seaser, to sit, remain, continue, as if the sense were 'to remain near, hence to have in possession. See Position, § \(\gamma\), and Sit. Der. possessed, Much Ado, i. 1. 193; possess-or, Merch. Ven. i. 3. 75, from Lat. possessor; possess-ive, from Lat. possessius; possess-ive-ly. Cot. - Lat. possibilis, that may be done, possible. formed; it should rather have been potibilis *; the form possibilis is due to the influence of possum, I am able. Both poti-bilis * and possum (short for potis-sum or poti-sum) are due to poti-, crude form of potis, powerful, properly 'a lord.' cognate with Skt. pati, a master, owner, governor, lord, husband, Lithuan. patis, a husband (Nesselmann), Russ. -pode as seen in gos-pode, the Lord. y. Skt. pati is lit. 'a feeder,' from & PA, to feed; see Father, to which it is nearly related. See Potent. And see Host (1). Der. possibl-y; possibil-i-ty, M. E. possibilitee, Chaucer, C. 'A post, runner, Veredarius;' Levins, ed. 1570. Post 'originally signified a fixed place, as a military post; then, a fixed place on a line of road where horses are kept for trathen, a fixed place on a line of road where horses are kept for travelling, a stage, or station; thence it was transferred to the person who travelled in this way, using relays of horses, and finally to any quick traveller; 'Eastwood and Wright, Bible Wordbook. See Job, ix. 25; Jer. li. 31. – F. poste, masc. 'a post, carrier, speedy messenger,' Cot.; fem. 'post, posting, the riding post, as also, the furniture that belongs unto posting;' id. Cf. Ital. posta, a post, station; Span. posta, post, sentinel, post-house, post-horses. – Low Lat. posta, a station, site; fem. of postus, a shortened form (used by Lucretius) of postus placed and of course to place. See Position, and of positus, placed, pp. of ponere, to place. See Position, and Post (1). Der. post, vb., L. L. L. iv. 3. 188; post, adv., in the phr. 'to travel post;' post-boy, chaise, -haste, -horse, -man, -mark, -master -office, -paid, -town. Also post-al, a modern coined word, from F. postal, also modern. Also post-age, an E. coinage, not used in French, but used by Dryden, according to Todd's Johnson, where no reference is given. And see post-ilion.

POST-, prefix, after, behind. (L.) Lat. post, prep., after, behind. Allied to Skt. pagehát, behind, abl. sing. of the Vedic. adj. pageha, behind; see Benfey, p. 535.

POST-DATE, to date a thing after the right time. (L.) 'Those. whose post-dated loyalty now consists only in decrying that action;' South, vol. iii. ser. 2 (R.) From Post- and Date. Similarly are formed post-diluvial, post-diluvian, &c.

¶ Bacon, Nat. Hist., end of § 115, has posteriour, answering to F. posterieur, 'posterior, hinder,' Cot., from the Lat. acc. posteriorem. Der. posterior-s, s. pl., put for posterior parts; posterior-ly, posterior-i-ty. And sec suffix -la from posteru-s, behind; see Posterior.

POSTHUMOUS (better POSTUMOUS), born after the father's death, published after the author's decease. (L.) The spelling with & is false; see below. Shak. has Posthumus as a name in Cymb. i. 1. 41, &c. Sir T. Browne has 'posthumous memory;' Um-burial, c. v. § 12. — Lat. postumus, the last; esp. of youngest children, the last-born; hence, late-born, and, as sb., a posthumous child. S. In accordance with a popular etymology, the word was also written posthumus, as if derived from post humum, lit. after the ground, which was forced into the meaning 'after the father is laid in the ground or buried;' and, in accordance with this notion, the sense of the word was at last chiefly confined to such a usage. Hence also the F. spelling posthume, Port. posthumo; but Span. and Ital. have postumo; all in the usual sense attached to E. posthumous. γ. The Lat. postumus = post-tu-mus, a superlative formed (with Aryan suffix -ta-ma) from post, behind. See Posterior. Der. post-

β. The usual derivation. and probably the correct one, is that of Ducange, viz. ginal note in a bible, in use A.D. 1228; Ducange. B. The usual derivation, and probably the correct one, is that of Ducange, viz. from Lat. post illa, i.e. post illa verba, after those words; because the glosses were added afterwards. Cf. Ital. and Port. postilla, Span. postila, a marginal note. Der. postil, verb, to write marginal notes, to comment on, annotate, Bacon, Life of Hen. VII, ed. Lumby, p. 193,

And in Cotgrave. - F. postillon, 'a postillon, guide, posts-boy;' Cot. Introduced in the 16th cent. from Ital. postiglions, 'a postillon,' Florio (and see Brachet). Formed with suffix iglions (= Lat. -il-i-onem) from Ital.

POST-MERIDIAN, POMERIDIAN, belonging to the afternoon. (L.) Howell uses the form pomeridian, speaking of his privat pomeridian devotions; Famil. Letters, vol. i. sect. 6. let. 32. - Lat. pomeridianus, also postmeridianus, belonging to the afternoon. - Lat. post, after; and meridianus, belonging to midday. See Postand Meridian.

POSTPONE, to put off, delay. (L.) Postponed is in Blount's Nomolexicon, ed. 1691, q. v. 'Postpone, to let behind or esteem less, to leave or neglect;' Phillips, ed. 1706. [Formerly, the form used was postpose, which occurs in Howell, Famil. Letters, vol. i. sect. 4. lct. 15, cited by Richardson with the spelling postpone. This is from F. postposer, 'to set or leave behind;' Cot. He also has: 'Postpose', postposed.'] - Lat. postponere, to put after. - Lat. post, after; and ponere, to put; see Post- and Position. POSTULATE, a proposition assumed without proof, as being self-evident. (L.) *Postulates and entreated maxims; Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. vi. c. 6. § 6. - Lat. postulatum, a thing demanded; hence also, a thing granted; neut. of postulatus, pp. of postulare, to demand.

3. It seems probable that postulare stands for pose-tulare, formed as a frequentative verb from pose-tum*, unused supine of poscere, to ask. γ . It is further proposed to assume for poscere an older form porse-ere, thus bringing it into alliance with \checkmark PRAK, to pray, whence Skt. praceh, to ask, Lat. precari, to pray; see Pray. Der. postulate, verb, Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors,

b. ii. c. 3 [not 4], last section; postulat-or-y, id. b. ii. c. 6. 5. 2.

POSTURE, position, attitude. (F., -L.) In Shak. Wint. Tale,
v. 3. 23. - F. posture, 'posture;' Cot. - Lat. positura, position, arrangement; from positurus, fut. part. of ponere, to place; see

Position. Der. posture-master; posture, verb. POSY, a verse of poetry, a motto, a bouquet or nosegay. (F., L., - Gk.) The word, in all its senses, is merely a contraction of Poesy, q. v. 1. It was usual to engrave short mottoes on knives and on rings; and as these were frequently in verse, they were called posies. Thus, in Shak. Merch. Ven. v. 148, we have: 'a ring ... whose posy was ... like cutler's poetry Upon a knife, Love me, and leave me not; see note to the line in Wright's edition. So also in Hamlet, 'the posy of a ring;' iii, 2. 162. See Chambers, Book of Days, i. 221, for examples, such as 'In thee, my choice, I do rejoice; &c. As these inscriptions were necessarily brief, any short inscription was also called a posy, even though neither in verse nor poetically expressed. Thus, Udall, on St. Luke, c. 23, speaking of the handwriting above the cross, calls it 'a superscription or poisse written on the toppe of the crosse' (R.) So also in the following: 'And the tente was replenyshed and decked with this posie, After busic labour commeth victorious rest;' Hall's Chron, Hen. V, an. 7. Rumous-ly.

[The still older name for a motto was a reason; see Fabyan's Chron.

Another form is potter; 'To potter, is still common in the East. Among the tracts mentioned in the Catalogue of Heber's MSS., no. 1442, is "A new yeares guifte, or a posie made upon certen flowers presented to the Countess of Pembrooke; by the author of Chloris, &c.;" see Notes and Queries, Dec. 19, 1868 (4 S. ii. 577). So also in Beaum. and Fletcher, Philaster, Act i. sc. 1 [sc. 2 in Darley's ed.]; "Then took he up his garland, and did shew What every flower, as country people hold Did signify;" and see Hamlet, iv. 5. 172. To this L may add that a poxy was even. did shew What every flower, as country people hold Did signify;" and see Hamlet, iv. 5. 175.' To this I may add, that a posy was even sometimes expressed by precious stones; see Chambers, as above. The line 'And a thousand fragrant posies' is by Marlowe; The Passionate Shepherd, st. 3. They are also mentioned by Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, Act ii. sc. 1. - Span. patata, a potato; also batata, which is the true form. - Hayti batata. Navagerio, who was in the Indies at the same time, writes in 1526, "Io ho vedute molte cose dell' Indie ed ho avuto di quelle radice che chiamano batatas, e le ho mangiate; sono di sapor di castagno." Doubtless these were sweet potatoes or yams, which are still known by this name in Spanish.'—Wedgwood.

Der. fotenc-y, Hamlet, iii. 4, 170, a coined word, due to Lat. potentia, power; potential, M. E. potencial, Chaucer, House of Fame, b. iii. l. 5, from F. potentiel, 'strong, forcible,' Cot., which from Lat. potentialis, forcible (only found in the derived adverb potentialiter), formed with suffix -alis from the sb. potentia; whence potential-ly, potential-i-ty. Also potent-ae, L. L. L. v. 2. 684, from F. potentat, 'a potentate, great lord,' Cot., which from Low Lat. potentatus, a supreme prince (Ducange), from potentare, to exercise authority (id.) sense 'to stir about' seems the orig. one; hence that of 'turmoil' as the result of stirring. ¶ Not connected with bother, though perhaps some confusion with Irish buaidhirt changed the M. E. form

'Potter, to go about doing nothing, to saunter idly; to work badly, do anything inefficiently; also, to stir, poke, North; also, to confuse, disturb, Yorksh.;' Halliwell. 'To stir or disorder anything;' Bailey's Dict., vol. i. ed. 1735. It is the frequentative form, with the usual suffix -er, of pote, to poke about, explained 'push, kick,' in Halliwell. - W. pwtie, to push, poke, Gael. put, Corn. poot; see further under Put. From the same Celtic source is Swed. dial. påta, to poke, esp. with a stick (Rietz); O. Du. poteren, 'to search one throughly' (Hexham), from the notion of poking a stick into every corner; also Cleveland paut, pote, to push at anything; &c. See Pother.

POULTICE, a soft plaister applied to sores. (L.) In Shak. Romeo, ii. 5. 65. Gascoigne, Steel Glas, 997 (ed. Arber, p. 77), has the pl. form pullesses. The F. word is pulle, and it would appear that the pol. form puttesses. The F. word is putte, and it would appear that the word was not taken from the F., but (being a medical term) directly from the Latin; the spelling with -ce being given to it to make it look like French. The F. putte is from Lat. acc. puttem, but the E. puttesses is a double plural, from a form puttes which is simply the Latin plural. — Lat. puttes, pl. of puts, a thick pap, or pap-like substance. +Gk. πόλτος, porridge.

¶ Otherwise poulties (if a F. form) must answer to a Low Lat. form putticius*; I find no trace of it.

Der. poultice, verb.

POUNCE (1), to seize with the claws, as a bird, to dart upon suddenly. (F., - L.) Orig. a term in hawking. A hawk's claws were called pounces, as in Spenser, F. Q. i. 11. 19; hence to pounce were called pounces, as in Spenser, r. Q. 1.11.19; nence to pounce upon, to seize with the claws, strike or pierce with the talons. The orig. sense of the verb was 'to pierce,' to prick, to adorn with pierced work. A pounce is also a punch, or stamp; see Nares. In Chaucer, Pers. Tale, De Ira, Group I, l. 421, we read of 'pounsoned and dagged clothynge' in three MSS, whilst two others have 'pounsed and dagged clothyng.' B. Here pounsoned has the same sense, but is a derivative word, being made from the sb. pounson or sense, but is a derivative word, being made from the sb. pounson or punsoun, a bodkin or dagger; for which see Barbour's Bruce, i. 545, and my note on the line. The form pounson answers to Low Lat. poother in old edd. of Shak. Cor. ii. 1. 234; pudder in K. Lear, iii. 2. acc. punctionem, whence the mod. F. poingon, a punch or puncheon for 50. M. E. puderen, apparently in the sense 'to poke about;' see piercing holes. We must refer the verb pounsen to an O. F. poncer*, to pierce, now lost, and perhaps not recorded. [The mod. F. poncer & POVERTY, the state of being poor. (F., =L.) In early use, is related to Pounce (2).] γ . We have, however, parallel forms in other languages, viz. Span. punckar, to prick, punch, puncka, a thorn, line. =0. F. poverte, later poverte, 'poverty,' Cot. Mod. F. pawvete, prickle, sharp point, exactly equivalent to the pounce or talon of the hawk; Ital. punzecchiare, to prick slightly (which presupposes a form punzare, to prick); punzone, a puncher.

POUNCE (2), fine powder. (F., -L.) Merely a doublet of pumice, and orig. used for powdered pumice-stone, but afterwards extended to other kinds of fine powder, and to various uses of it. tended to other kinds of nne powder, and to various uses of it.

'Long effeminate pouldred [powdered] pounced haire;' Prynne, Histrio-Mastix, pt. i. Act vi [iv?] sc. 5 (R.) 'Pounce, a sort of powder strew'd upon paper to bear ink, or to soak up a blot;'
Phillips, ed. 1706. — F. ponce; 'pierre ponce, a punis stone,' Cot.

'Ponce, punice;' Hamilton. — Lat. punicem, acc. of punex, punice; whence ponce (= pom'ce) is regularly formed.

B. There is little doubt that punex stands for spunex, and that the stone is named from its lightness and general reports by the resemblance to form in from from its lightness and general remarkable resemblance to foam; from Lat. spuma, foam; which from Lat. spuere, to spit, throw up; see Spume, Spew. Der. pounce, to sprinkle with pounce (F. poncer); pounce-box; pounce-et-box, I Hen. IV, i. 3, 38. Doublet, punice.
POUND(1), a weight, a sovereign. (L.) The sense of weight is the orig. one. M. E. pund, later pound, frequently with the pl. the same as the singular, whence the mod. phrase 'a five-pound note.' 'An hundred pund' = a hundred pounds, Havelok, 1633. = A.S. pund, pl. pund, a weight, a pound; see Luke, xix. 16, John, xii. 3. = Lat. pondo, a pound, used as an indeclinable sb., though orig. meaning 'by weight;' allied to pondus, a weight. Hence also were borrowed G. pfund, &c. - Lat. pendëre, to weigh; closely allied to pendëre, to hang; see Pendant. Der. pound-age; see Blount's Nomolexicon, ed. 1691. And see ponder.

POUND (2), an enclosure for strayed animals. (E.) The same word as pond. 'Which thus in pound was pent;' Gascoigne, A Deuise for Viscount Mountacute; see Gascoigne's Works, ed. Hazlitt, i. 84, l. 1. Rich. has the reading pond. M. E. pond; in the comp. pond-folde (other readings ponfolde, punfolde, pounfolde, pynfold), P. Plowman, B. v. 633; with the sense 'pinfold' or 'pound.' - A. S. pund, an enclosure; the compound pund-breche, explained by infractura parci = the breaking into an enclosure, occurs in the Laws infractura parci = the breaking into an enclosure, occurs in the Laws of Hen. I., c. 40; see Thorpe's Ancient Laws, vol. i. p. 540. Hence A. S. forpyndan, to shut in, repress; Grein, i. 320. Cf. Icel. pynda, to shut in, torment; O. H. G. piunta, an enclosure, cited by Grein, ii. 362; Irish pont, a pound for cattle, a pond. Der. pound, verb, Cor. i. 4. 17; im-pound. Also pin-fold, K. Lear, ii. 2. 9, for pind-fold = pound-fold, as shewn by M. E. pynfold cited above, the vowel i being due to the y in the derived A. S. pyndan; as also in pind-ar, a. Powhlet. cond.

q. v. Doublet, pond.

POUND (3), to beat, bruise in a mortar. (E.) Here the d is excrescent; it stands for poun, from an older form pun. Cf. soun-d for M. E. soun, gown-d, vulgar form of gown. M. E. pounen, to bruise, Wyclif, Matt. xxi. 44, earlier version. - A.S. punian, to pound; the pp. gepunod occurs as a various reading for geenucud (= knocked, pounded) in Cockayne's Leechdoms, i. 176, footnote 4. Der. pound-er.

POUR, to cause to flow, send forth, utter, flow. (C.) M. E. pouren, P. Plowman, B. v. 220; often used with out, Gower, C. A. i. 302, l. 9. The orig. sense was prob. 'to jerk' or 'throw' water out of a vessel, and it is almost certainly of Celtic origin. It is commonly referred to W. bwrw, to cast, to throw, to strike, to rain; whence bwrw gwlaw, to cast rain, i.e. to rain (from gwlaw, rain). I suspect that an older and truer form occurs in Irish purraim, I push, jerk, thrust; Gael. purr, to push, thrust, drive, urge. improbably ultimately identical with Pore (2), q. v.

POURTRAY, the same as Portray, q. v.

POUT (1), to look sulky or displeased, to puff out the lips or cheeks, (C.) In Shak. Cor. v. 1. 52. M. E. pouten, in Reliquiæ Antiquæ, ii. 211 (Stratmann). Of Celtic origin; cf. W. pwdu, to pout, to be sullen, which I suppose to stand for an older form puts. Cf. W. cad, battle, where the O. Welsh form is cat (Rhys); and cf. W. pwdr., rotten, with Lat. putris.

B. Perhaps further related to W. putio, to push, thrust; see Put.

Cf. also W. poten, a paunch; potenu, to form a paunch.

May not the W. pwdu account for F. bouder, to pout? See Boudoir.

POUT (2), a kind of fish. (C.) 'It has the power of inflating a membrane which covers the eyes and neighboring parts of the head; Webster. 'Powt. or eel-powt; Minsheu. We find A. Of Celtic origin; see Pout (1); from its pouting Vectoria, vectoria, in Alfric's Colloquy (Fisherman), in Wright's (E.) Hence power, where the w is used to avoid the appearance of an hiatus; Prick of Conscience, power; mod. F. power; cf. also Span. poder, power.

B. The word is merely due to a substantival use of an infinitive mood, as in the case of leisure, pleasure; the Ital. potere, Span. poder, are both infinitives as well as sbs., with the sense 'to be able.' - Low I.at. potere, to be able, which (as shewn by Diez) took the place of Lat. posse in the 8th century. The Lat posse is itself a contraction for pot-esse, used by Plautus and Lucretius; and pot-esse. again, stands for potis esse, to be powerful; from potis, powerful, and esse, to be. See Possible and Essence. Der. power-ful, Spenser, F. Q. iv. 10. 36; power-ful-ly, power-ful-ness; power-less, power-less-ly, power-less-ness. Doublet, posse.

PRESS (2), to hire men for service, to engage men by earnest-money for the public service, to carry men off forcibly to become sailors or soldiers. (F,,-L.) The Dictionaries do not explain this word at all well; the only adequate explanation is in Wedgwood. It is quite certain, as he shews, that press is here a corruption of the old word prest, ready, because it was customary to give carnestmoney to a soldier on entering service, just as to this day a recruit receives a shilling. This earnest-money was called prest-money, i. c. ready money advanced, and to give a man such money was to imprest him, now corruptly written impress. At a later period, the practice of taking men for the public service by compulsion made the word to be ginal reference to earnest-money was quite lost sight of; Wedgwood.

B. Prest was once a common world. understood as if it signified to force men into the service, and the oriβ. Prest was once a common word for ready money advanced, or ready money on loan. 'And he sent thyder iii. somers [sumpterhorses] laden with nobles of Castel [Castile] and floreyns, to gyve in prest [as ready money] to knyghtes and squyers, for he knewe well otherwyse he sholde not have them come out of theyr houses; Berners, tr. of Froissart, vol. ii. c. 64 (R.) See also Skelton, Colin Clout, 350-354, and Dyce's note; North's Plutarch, ed. 1594, p. 638. Both prest-money and imprest-money are in Minsheu, ed. 1627; and Cotgrave explains O. F. imprestance by 'prest, or imprest money, received and to be imployed for another.' — O. F. prester, 'to lend, also, to trust out [advance] or sell unto daies' [unto an appointed time], Cot. Cf. O. F. prest, ple aire, being preternatur' prest, ready, full dight, furnished, . . . prompt, nere at hand,' id. PRESS-GANG, a gang of men employed to 'press' sailors into the public service. (F.-L.; and E.) In Johnson's Dict. This word seems to be of rather late formation, and also to be associated word seems to be of rather late formation, and also to be associated with the notion of compulsion or pressing; at the same time, it certainly took its origin from the verb press, in the sense of 'to hire men for service;' see therefore Press (2), as orig. quite distinct from Press (1). And see Gang.

PRESTIGE, a delusion; also, influence due to former fame or excellence. (F.,-L.) This word is in the very rare position of having achieved a good meaning in place of a bad one; the reverse is more usual as noted in Trench, Study of Words. (If mod F.

is more usual, as noted in Trench, Study of Words. Cf. mod. F. prestige, 'fascination, magic spell, magic power, prestige,' Hamilton. In some authors, it had a bad sense, in E. as well as in F., but it is not an old word with us. F. pretendre, to pretend, lay claim to; Cot.—Lat. prætendere, to spread before, hold out as an excuse, allege, pretend.—Lat. præ, before; and tendere, to stretch, spread; see Pre- and Tend. Der. pretender, esp. used of the Old and Young Pretenders, so called because they laid claim to the crown. Also pretence, Mach. ii. 3, 137 (first folio), a mistaken spelling for pretense, from late Lat. prætensus, pp. of prætendere (the usual Lat. pp. is prætentum, but tendere gives both tensum and tentum); the right spelling pretense is in Spenser, F. Q. iv. 5. 23, with which cf. pretensed, i. e. intended, in Robinson's tr. of More's Utopia, ed. Arber, p. 20, l. 7. PRETTY, pleasing, tasteful, neat, beautiful. (C.) Spelt pretie in Minsheu and Levins. M. E. prati, praty, Prompt. Parv.; Destruction of Troy, ed. Panton and Donaldson, 2622, 10815, 13634. The old senses are 'comely' and 'clever,' as used in the above passages; but the true sense was rather 'tricky,' 'cunning,' or 'full of wiles,' though the word has acquired a better sense, it has never quite lost a sort of association with pettiness.—A.S. pratig, pratig, tricky, deceitful; 'Wille ge beón prattige,' tr. of Lat. 'Vulus esse versipelles,' Ælfric's Colloquy, in Wright's Voc. i. 12. A rare word; formed with the usual suffix -ig (as in stán-ig, E. ston-y) from a sb. præt, prætt, deceit, trickery; see prattas, as a gloss to Lat. artes (in a bad sense), Mone, Quellen, p. 347, col. 1. So also we have Lowland Scotch pratty, pretty, tricky, from prat, a trick, used by G. Douglas (Jamieson). + Icel. prettugr, tricky; from prettr, a trick, pretta, to cheat, deceive. + Norweg. pretten, prettevis, tricky, roguish; from pretta, a trick, piece of roguery, pretta, to play a trick (Aasen).

B. The word is probably of Celtic origin; as appears from O. Corn. prat, an act or deed, a cunning trick, connected (according to Williams) with W. pratih, as is clear from the absence of the guttural in the E., Icel., Dan., and Cornish forms, and by the difference in sense. Der. pretti-ly, spelt pretily, Court of Love, 420; pretti-ness, Hamlet, iv. 5. 189; also pretty, adv.

Cf. Lat. Uarus as a proper name, orig. a nickname. B. It is supposed by some that Lat. uarus is cognate with G. quer, v. 6. 20. = O. F. pretexte, m. 'a pretext,' Cot. = Lat. prætextum, a pretext; orig. neut. of prætextus, pp. of prætexere, lit. 'to weave in front.' = Lat. præ, before; and texere, to weave; see Pre- and Text.

Text.

The pretext of pretext, a pretextus, pp. of prætexere, lit. 'to weave in front.' = Lat. præ, before; and texere, to weave; see Pre- and pretext, pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretext a pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretext a pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretext a pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the same pretextus, price, from perku, I sell (Nesselman), from the stem per-, but with a different suffix; also Gk. πέρ-νημι, I sell, πρί-αμαι, I buy. In the Skt. pana, wages, hire, reward, expense, price, aμαι, I buy. In the Skt. pana, wages, hire, reward, expense, price, the lingual n marks the loss of r, so that pana = par-na; Curtius, i. 339. - √ PAR, to buy; whence Skt. pan (=parnā), to buy. Der. price-less; preci-ous, prize (2), verb. Doublet, praise.

PRICK, a sharp point, puncture, sting, remorse. (E.) M. E. prike, pricke, prikke, Ancren Riwle, p. 228, last line. - A. S. pricu, a point, dot, Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, b. ii. pr. 7, cap. xviii. § 1; prica, a point, jot, tittle, Matt. v. 18. + O. Du. prick, a prickle, whence mod. Du. prikkel; see Kilian. + Dan. prik, a dot; whence prikke, to mark with dots. + Swed. prick, a point, dot, prick, tittle; whence prika, to point, to mark with pricks. Cf. also W. pric, a stick, a broach; Irish pricadh. a goad, prioca, a sting; Skt. pricni, of variegated colour (spotted, dotted), Gk. πέρκ-νοs, spotted.

β. It is clear that the orig. sense is 'a dot' or 'spot;' and there is very little doubt that an initial s has been lost, which appears in Irish sprichar, a sting. Cf. also Skt. prish, to sprinkle, prishata, speckled, also a spot, drop; all related to a √ SPARK, to sprinkle, whence also a spot, drop; all related to a VSPARK, to sprinkle, whence Lat. spargere (for sparc-ere), to scatter, sprinkle, Irish spreighim, I scatter, M. H. G. sprengen, to sprinkle, and E. sprinkle (nasalised form of sprikle or sprikle); see Sprinkle. Curtius, i. 340; Fick, i. 669.

y. The notion of 'puncturing' or 'goading' is unoriginal, and the verb to prick is a mere derivative from the sb., as shewn by and the vero to prick is a mere derivative from the so., as snewn by the forms. Der. prick, verb, M. E. priken, prikien, Havelok, 2639, P. Plowman, B. xviii. 11 (the A.S. pricine being unauthorised); hence prick-er. Also prick-le, O. Northumb. pricle, Matt. v. 18 (Lindisfarne MS.), a dimin. form, with the orig. sense 'a little dot' or 'speck.' Hence prick-l-y, which seems to be formed from prickle rather than from prick with suffix -ly; prick-l-i-ness.

PRIDE, the feeling of being proud. (E.) M. E. pride, pryde, Plowman R. v. L. Stell traide id A. v. L. trude id C. vi.

P. Plowman, B. v. 15; spelt praide, id. A. v. 15; prude, id. C. vi. 118, Ancren Riwle, p. 140, l. 6. - A. S. pryte, pride, Ælfric's Homilies, A.S. prite is regularly formed from the adj. prit, proud, by the change of \hat{u} to \hat{y} ; see Proud We find the first \hat{y} . change of u to y; see Proud. We find also A.S. prutung, pride; Mone, Quellen, p. 355, col. 1. Cf. Icel $pry\delta i$, an ornament, from $pru\delta r$, proud; both borrowed from E., but they exhibit the length of prior, proud; both borrowed from E., but they exhibit the length of the vowel. Der. pride, vb. reflexive.

PRIEST, a presbyter, one in holy orders, above a deacon and below a bishop. (L.,-Gk.) M. E. preest, Chaucer, C. T. 505; preost, Ancren Riwle, p. 16, l. 25.—A. S. preost, Laws of K. Edgar, i. 2 (see Thorpe's Ancient Laws, p. 263); and, earlier, in the Laws of Ethelbert, § 1 (id. p. 3). Contracted from Lat. presbyter (= Gk. πρεσβύτεροs), as clearly shown by the O. F. prestre (13th cent.), mod. F. prêtre. Cf. Prester John in Mandeville's Travels, where prester = trestbyter.

Reflections is comp. of mode. Supplied the prior mode. pres(by)ter. β. Πρεσβύτεροι is comp. of πρέσ-βυι, Doric πρέσ-γυι, old; where πρεσ- = pris- in Lat. pris-cus, pris-tinus, old, and -yes is (probably) from (GA, to beget, produce; Curtius, ii. 82. See Pristine. Der. priest-ess (with F. suffix); priest-hood, A. S. preost-houl, Ælfred, tr. of Beda, b. i. c. 7 (near beginning); priest-craft; priest-ly, Pericles, iii. 1. 70; priest-li-ness; priest-ridden. Doublet, presbyter. PRIM, precise, affectedly neat or nice. (F., -L.) Bailey (vol. i. ed.

1735) has: 'to prim, to set the mouth conceitedly, to be full of affected ways.' Phillips, ed. 1706, has: 'to prim, to be full of affected ways, to be much conceited.' The oldest example is prym, sb. a neat girl, in Barclay's Fifth Eclogue, cited by Nares. From the E. word are derived the Lowland Scotch primp (with excrescent p), to assume prudish or self-important airs, to deck oneself in a stiff and affected manner (Jamieson); and primzie, demure, in Burns, Hallowe'en, st. 9.] Halliwell also cites the word prin as meaning 'prim, affectedly neat,' but in the quotation adduced from Fletcher's Poems, p. 140, the word obviously means 'thin, gaunt, slender,' &c. β. The sense of 'slender' or 'delicate' is the orig. one, as shewn in Cotgrave. - O. F. prim, masc., prime, fem., 'prime, forward;' also prin, 'thin, subtill, piercing, sharp;' also prime, both masc. and prin, 'thin, subtil, piercing, sharp;' also prime, both masc. and fem, 'thin, slender, exile, small; as cheveux primes, smooth or delicate hair;' Cot. This last example comes sufficiently near to the E. use. y. The O.F. prim (corrupter form prin) is from the Lat. masc. acc. primum; the form prime answers to the Lat. fem. prima. The nom case is primus, first, chief; see Prime (1). Cf. also prov. E. prime, to trim trees; and the phrase 'to prime a gun;' see Prime (2). The sense of 'thin' as derived from that of 'first' or 'foremost' is hard to account for: perhaps there is an allusion to the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of the end of t is hard to account for; perhaps there is an allusion to the end of a weapon, which is tapered to a point; cf. filer prim, 'to run thin, or by little and little;' Cot. In E., it is probable that the sense of PRICE, value, excellence, recompence. (F., -L.) M. E. pris, prim was affected by some confusion with the old verb prink, to prickmaleerie, stiff and precise, prickmedainty, finical (Jamieson). Der.

PRIME (1), first, chief, excellent. (F., -L.) M. E. prime, properly an adj. (as in Temp. i. 2. 72), but almost always used of 'prime,' the first canonical hour, as in Ancren Riwle, p. 20, Chaucer, C. T. 12596, &c. -F. prime, 'the first houre of the day,' Cot. [A fem. form, the O. F. masc. being prim.] - Lat. prima, i. e. prima hora, the first hour; fem. of primus, first. β. Pri-mus is a superl. form, and stands for pro-i-mus, whence the long i. The suffix is the same as in mini-mus (where mus is the Aryan superl. suffix -ma, appearing also in A.S. for-ma, Goth. fru-ma, first, which are cognate words); Curtius, i. 354. The Skt. pra-ta-ma, first, exhibits a double suffix; cf. also Gk. πρω-τος. See Prior, Former, and Pro-. Der. prime, sb., as already explained; prime-number, prime-minister; prim-ar-y, Phillips, ed. 1706, from Lat. primarius; prim-ar-i-ly. Also prim-ate, M. E. primat, Layamon, 29736, from O. F. primat, 'a primat or metropolitan,' Cot., which from Lat. primatem, acc. of primas, a principal or chief man; primate-ship; primace-y, from O. F. primace, 'primacy,' Cot. Also primer, P. Plowman, C. vi. 46, formed (apparently) from E. prime by help of the E. suffix -er, and meaning 'a book of prime,' i. e. a book of 'hours;' and hence, an elementary book. Also prima-donna, from Ital. prima, first, chief, and donna, lady, Lat. domina; see Dame. Also prim-al, Hamlet, iii. 3. 37; prim-y, id. i. 3. 7; prim-er-o, q. v. And see prim-eval, prim-it-ive, primo-geniture, prim-ordial, prim-rose, prince, prior, pristine, priest, presbyter, premier, and prime (2).

PRIME (2), to put powder on the nipple of a fire-arm, to make a gun quite ready. (F.,-L.) 'Neither had any [of us] one piece of ordinance primed;' Hackluyt's Voyages, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 61. It is not quite clear how the word came into use; the F. prime sometimes means 'the first position in fencing' (Littré), which may have suggested the use of the word in preparing a gun. Or, again, we may look upon prime as expressing 'to put into prime order,' to make quite ready; from prime in the sense of 'ready;' see Narcs. But whatever the exact history may be, we may be sure that the etymology is from the E. adj. prime. Cf. prov. E. prime, to trim trees (Halliwell). See Prime (1), and Prim. Der. prim-ing, prim-age, an allowance to the captain of a vessel for loading the same.

PRIMERO, an old game at cards. (Span.,—L.) Cotgrave translates O.F. prime by 'primero at cards, '&c.; and see Shak. Merry Wives, iv. 5. 104.—Span. primero, first; the Span. primera (fem. form) is still given as the name of a game at cards. But the game is obsolete, and little is known about it; it probably derives its name from some chief or principal card.—Lat. primarius, primary; from primus, first; see Prime (1).

PRIMEVAL, original, lit. belonging to the first age. (L.) Also spelt primæval. In Pope, Dunciad, iv. 630. A coined word; the older form was primevous, in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - Lat. primauus, primeval. - Lat. prim, for primus, first; and auum, an age. See so called because it comes early in the spring. — Lat. prima rosa; see Prime (1) and Rose. B. The above is the popular and obvious Prime (1) and Rose. etymology of the word as it stands; but primrose is, historically, a corruption (due to popular etymology) of M. E. primerole, a primrose, Chaucer, C. T. 3268. This answers to a Low Lat. form primerula*, a regular dimin. of Low Lat. primula, a primrose (see Primerula*, a regular dimin. of Low Lat. primuta, a primited (ac-Prompt. PROLEPSIS, anticipation. (L., - Gk.) A rhetorical term; in Phillips, ed. 1706. [Blount, ed. 1674, gives prolepsie, from O. F. prolepsie in Cotgrave.] – Lat. prolepsis. – Gk. πρόληψιε, an anticipation or anticipatory allusion. – Gk. πρό, before; and ληψιε, a scizing, catching, taking, from λήψ-υμαι, fut. of λαμβάνειν, to seize. See Pro- and Catalepsy. Der. prolep-t-ic, as in 'proleptick disease, a disease that always anticipates, as if an ague come today at 4 o'clock, tomorrow an hour sooner,' Phillips, ed. 1706, from Gk. προληπτικόε, anticipating; prolep-t-ic-al, Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674; prolep-t-ic derivatives prolificatio and prolifications; it means 'producing offspring.'

PROLIX, tedious, lengthy. (F., -L.) 'A long and prolize exhortacion;' Hall's Chron., Hen. VII, an. 5. G. Douglas has the corrupt form prolize, Palace of Honour, pt. ii. st. 18, ed. Small. [The sb. prolizity, M. E. prolizitee, is in Chaucer, C. T. 10719, and Trollus, b. ii. 1. 1564.]—F. prolize, 'prolix,' Cot.—Lat. prolizus, extended, prolix.

B. The usual derivation from pro- and laxus cannot be sustained; the verb laxare shews that laxus keeps its vowel in derivatives; and the change of vowel from a to i has no support. Prolixus must be compared with elixus, soaked, boiled, allied to O. Lat. lixa, water, and liqui, liquere, to flow. We then get the true sense; pro-lizus means that which has flowed beyond its bounds, and the usual issue means that which has nowed beyond as bounds, and the assumence of 'broad' or 'extended' is clearly due to the common phenomenon of the enlargement of a pond by rain. — Lat. pro., forward; and lieus*, supplying the place of the unrecorded pp. of liqui, to flow. See Pro- and Liquid. Der. prolix-i-ty (see above), from O. F. prolimite, not in Cotgrave, but in use in the 13th cent. (Littré); from Lat. acc. prolixitatem.

Ital. protocollo, 'a booke wherein seriveners register all their writings, anything that is first made, and needeth correction; 'Florio.]—Low Lat. protocollum.— Late Gk. πρωτόκολλον, not in Liddell and Scott, but explained by Scheler. It meant, in Byzantine authors, orig. the first leaf glued on to MSS., in order to register under whose administration, and by whom, the MS. was written; it was afterwards particularly applied to documents drawn up by notarics, because, by a decree of Justinian, such documents were always to be accompanied by such a first leaf or fly-leaf. It means 'first glued-on,' i.e. glued on at the beginning. - Gk. πρῶτο-, crude form of πρῶτος, first; and κολλαν, to glue, from Older form prut (with long u), Ancren Riwle, p. 276, l. 19; Layamon, 8828 (earlier text; later text, prout).—A.S. prút, proud; a word of which the traces are slight; the various reading pritine for ranene in the A.S. Chron. an. 1006, is only found in MS. F, of the 12th century; see Earle, Two A.S. Chronicles, notes, p. 336. Yet its earlier existence may be safely inferred from the occurrence of the derived words priting, pride, Mone, Quellen, p. 355, and prite in Ælfric's Homilies, ii. 220, formed by the usual vowel-change from ú to ý; see Pride.

B. Moreover, we find Icel. prúðr, proud, borrowed from A.S.; with which cf. Dan. prud, stately, magnificent. Root unknown.

PROVE, to test, demonstrate, experience. (F., -L.) In old authors, it commonly means 'to test,' as in the proverb, 'the exception proves the rule' = Lat. 'exception probat regulam;' a phrase often foolishly used to signify that 'an exception demonstrates a rule,' which is plainly absurd. M. E. prouen, preuen (with u for v), P. Plowman, B. viii. 120, A. ix. 115. Older spelling preouen, Ancren Riwle, p. 390, l. 22. = O. From the Lat. probare are also derived, not only Port. provar, Span. probar, Ital. provare, but also A.S. prófan, Laws of Ine, § 20, in Thorpe's Ancient Laws, i. 116, Du. proeven, Icel. prófa, Swed. pröfua, Dan. prove, G. proben, probiren. The mod. E. prove seems to have been taken from the F. rather than from Lat. directly. PROVOST, a principal or chief, esp. a principal of a college or chief magistrate of a Scottish town, a prefect. (F.,=L.) M. E. provost (with u=v), Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. i. pr. 4, l. 293; provest, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 268, l. 7.—O. F. provost (Burguy), variant of prevost, 'the provost or president of a college;' Cot.—Lat. præpositum, acc. of præpositus, a prefect; lit. 'one who is set over,' pp. of præponere, to set over.—Lat. præ, before; and ponere, to place. See Pre- and Position.

B. Ducange gives propositor as equivalent to præpositus; it is certain that the prefix pro- is due to confusion of the Lat. prefix pro- with præ; the mod. F. prévôt keeps the correct form.

The A. S. práfost is formed directly from the Latin. In Italian we find both prevosto and preposto; shewing that is due to the older of Decentramental constraints.

v is due to the older p. Der. provost-marshal, provost-ship. PROW, the fore-part of a ship. (F., -L., -Gk.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. -O. F. prouë (mod. F. proue), 'the prow, or forepart of a ship;' Cot. Cf. Ital: proda, prua. -L at. prova, the prow of a ship; the second r disappearing in order to avoid the double trill. -Gk. $\pi\rho\hat{\varphi}\rho\alpha$ (for $\pi\rho\hat{\omega}r_{\rho}$), the prow; extended from $\pi\rho\omega\hat{r}$, in front (usually early), an old locative form connected with $\pi\rho\hat{\phi}$, before; see Pro-.

PROWESS, bravery, valour. (F., -L.) Originally 'excellence.' M. E. prowes, prowesse, Rob. of Glouc. p. 12, l. 20; p. 112, l. 2; pruesse, King Horn, ed. Lumby, l. 556. -O. F. prouesse, 'prowesse,' Cot.; formed with suffix -esse (= Lat. -itia) from O. F. prou, brave, mod. F. preux, 'hardy, doughty, valiant, full of prowess;' Cot. β. The etym. of O. F. prou is much disputed; it occurs also in the forms prod, prud, pros, proz, &c., fem. prode, prude; we also find Prov. proz, Ital. prode. Y. But, besides the adj. prou, we also find a sh. prou, formerly prod, in the sense of 'advantage;' thus bon prou leur face = much good may it do them. This is the common M.E. prow, meaning profit, advantage, benefit, as in Chaucer, C.T. 12234, 13338. 8. It is certain that prouesse was used to translate Lat. probitas, and that prou was used to translate probus, but the sense of the words was, nevertheless, not quite the same, and they seem to have been drawn together by the influence of a popular etymology which supposed prou to represent probus, but which is prob. wrong. For example, we cannot explain the fem. prode or prude as = Lat. proba, which would rather have given a form prove. The d is very persistent; we still find the fem. prude even in mod. E., and we must observe that Ital. prode means both 'advantage' and 'valiant,' whilst the F. prud'homme simply meant, at first, 'brave man.'

e. It seems best to accept the suggestion that the word is due to the Lat. prep. pro, often used in the sense of 'in favour of 'or 'for the benefit of;' and to explain (with Scheler) the d as due to the occasional form prod-, appearing in Lat. prod-esse, to be useful to, to do good, to benefit. • This would also explain the use of O.F. prod, prou, as an adverb. Cot. has: 'Prou, much, greatly, enough;' which seems to be nothing but the Lat. prod- (without its accompanying -esse) in the sense of 'sufficient.' See Pro-, and Prude.

PROWL, to rove in search of plunder or prey. (C.?) 'To proule for fishe, percontari; To proule for riches, omnia appetere; Levins. M. E. prollen, to search about; Chaucer, C. T. 16880. 'Prollyn, as ratchys [dogs that hunt by scent], Scrutor, Prompt. Parv. 'Prollynge, or sekynge, Perscrutacio, investigacio, scrutinium; id. 'Purlyn, idem quod Prollyn;' id. 'I prolle, I go here and there to seke a thyng, ie tracasse. Prolyng for a promocyon, ambition; Palsgrave. Wedgwood well says: 'The derivation from a supposed F. proieler*, to seek one's prey, is extremely doubtful.' I will go further, and say that it is impossible; there is no such F. word, nor any reason why there should be; if there were, it would surely have given us a form preyle rather than prolle; and lastly, the notion of prey' is by no means inseparably connected with the use of M. E. prollen. β. It means rather 'to keep poking about,' and I suspect it to be a contracted frequentative form, standing for progle, weakened form of prokle; where progle is the frequentative of progue or prog, to search about, esp. for provisions, and proke is an old verb meaning to thrust or poke. See prog or progue, to go a hegging, to procure by a beggarly trick, in Todd's Johnson and Nares. 'And that man in the gown, in my opinion, Looks like a proguing Ist ed. proaging] knave; Beaum. and Fletcher, Span. Curate, iii. 3 (Ascanio). 'We travel sea and soil, we pry, we prowl, We progress and we prog from pole to pole;' Quarles, Emblems (Nares). 'Proke, to stir or poke about; proking about, a familiar term applied to a person who is busily locking for something and examining. as to a person who is busily looking for something, and examining, as we say, every hole and corner; profile, to search or prowl about, to rob, poll, or steal, to plunder; 'Halliwell. See two more exx. of proke, to poke, in Nares, ed. Halliwell. 'Proker, a poker;' Jamie-Y. If this be right, the derivation is plainly from W. procio, beg. Thus we have: 'Prokkyn, or stifly askyn, Procor, Procito;' Prompt. Parv. This last form is related to Dan prakke, explained by 'to prog' in Ferrall and Repp, though probably orig. of different origin; also to Swed. pracka, to go begging, G. prachern, prachen, to origin; also to Swed. praesa, to go begging, G. praesen, praesa, to solicit earnestly, to beg. Moreover, the Dan and G. words may be mere adaptations from Lat. procare, to ask, rather than cognate forms from the same root PARK, to pray, to ask, noticed under Pray. But the whole of the words here noticed are somewhat obscure. ¶ The common vulgar word prog, provisions, is a mere derivative of the verb to prog, to search for odds and ends.

PROXIMITY, nearness. (F.,-L.) Spelt proximitie in Minsheu, ed. 1627.-F. proximité, 'proximity;' Cot.-Lat. proximitatem, acc. of proximitas; formed with suffix -tas from proximi-=proximo, crude form of proximus, very near, which is a superl. form from prope, near; see Propinquity. Der. Also proxim ate, rather a late word, see exx. in R. and Todd's Johnson, from Lat. proximatus, pp. of proximare, to approach, from proximus, very near; proxim-ate-ly.

PROXY, the agency of one who acts for another; also an agent (Low Lat., - L.) 'Vnles the King would send a proxie;' Fox, Martyrs, p. 978, an. 1536 (R.) Proxy is merely a vulgar contraction for procuracy, which is properly an agency, not an agent. 'Procurator, is used for him that gathereth the fruits of a benefice for another man; An. 3 Rich. II, stat. 1. cap. 2. And procuracy is used for the specialtic whereby he is authorized, ibid; Minsheu, ed. 1627. Procuracy is Englished from Low Lat. procuratia, a late form used as requivalent to Lat. procuratio, a management. Similarly, proctor is a contraction for procurator, a manager; see Proctor, Procure. The contracted forms, proctor and proxy, seem to have come into use at the close of the 14th century. Cf. Prokecye, procuracia; Proketowre, Procurator; Prompt. Parv. Also prockesy, Palsgrave. It thus appears that the syllable -ra- was dropped, whilst u was first weakened to e and afterwards disappeared.

PRUDE, a woman of affected modesty. (F., -L.) In Pope, Rape PRUDE, a woman of affected modesty. (F., -L.) In Pope, Rape of the Lock, i. 63, iv. 74, v. 36; Tatler, no. 102, Dec. 3, 1709.—F. prude, orig. used in a good sense, excellent, as in 'preude frame, a chast, honest modest matron,' Cot. O.F. prode; fem. form of O.F. prod, prud, excellent; the ctymology of which is discussed under Prowess, q. v. Der. prud-ish; prud-ish-ly, Pope, Dunciad, iv. 194; prud-e-ry, Pope, Answer to Mrs. Howe, I. 1, from F. pruderie.

PRUDENT, discreet, sagacious, frugal. (F., -L.) M. E. prudent, Chaucer, C. T. 1244.—F. prudent, 'prudent,' Cot.—Lat. prudent-em, acc. of prudens, prudent.

B. Prūdens is a contracted form of prouidens; see Provident.

Der. prudent-ly; prudence, M. E. prudence, Wyclif, 1 Cor. i. 19, from F. prudence — Lat. prudentia; prudenti-al, Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, coined from Lat. prudentia.

PRUNE (1), to trim trees, divest of what is superfluous. (F.?—

PRUNE (1), to trim trees, divest of what is superfluous. (F.?-FRUNE (1), to trim trees, divest of what is superfluous. (F.?—L.?) The old form is proine, proin; see exx. of proin in Nares and Jamieson. In Chaucer, C. T. 9885, it is said of Damian, when dressing himself up smartly: '11c kembeth him [combs himself], he proineth him and piketh,' where the Harl. MS. has pruneth. It here means to trim, trick out, adorn. Gascoigne speaks of imps, i. e. scions of trees, which 'growe crookt, bycause they be not proynd,' i. e. pruned; Steel Glas, 458. It was esp. used of birds, in the sense 'to pick out damaged feathers and arrange the plumage with the bill' (Schmidt), Cymb. v. 4. 118; cf. L. L. L. v. 3. 183. I. Tyrwhitt, with reference to proinen in Chaucer, says: 'It seems to have signified, originally, to take cuttings from vines, in order to plant them out. From hence it has been used for the cutting away of the superfluous shoots of all trees, which we now call pruning; and for that operation, which birds, and particularly hawks, perform upon themselves, of picking out their superfluous or damaged feathers. Gower, speaking of an eagle, says: "For there he pruneth him and piketh As do than hauke, whan him wel liketh;" Conf. Amant. iii. 75. γ . If this be right, the etymology is from F. provigner, to plant or set a stocke, staulke, slip, or sucker, for increase; hence to propagate, multiply, &c.; Cot. This may have been shortened to progner, thus giving M. E. proinen; and, in fact, Littré gives the Berry forms of provigner as preigner, progner, prominer. This verb is from the F. sb. provin, 'a slip or sucker planted,' Cot.; O.F. provain; cf. Ital. propaggine, a vine-sucker laid in the ground. - Lat. propaginem, acc. of propago, a layer, sucker. See Propagate. ¶ There is a slight difficulty, owing to the want of full proof of the transfer of sense from 'setting suckers' to that of 'trimming trees.' Hence Wedgwood, noting the occasional form preen, to dress feathers, used of a bird, refers us to Gael. prin, a pin, Icel. prjón. But the Icel. word seems to be merely borrowed from Gaelic, and the change of vowel from i in prin to u in prune is not explained. Der. prun-er.

PRUNE (2), a plum. (F., -L., -Gk.) In Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 7. -F. prune, 'a plum,' Cot. -Lat. prunum, a plum. - Gk. προῦνον, shorter form of προῦμνον, a plum; προῦνον, shorter form of προῦμνον, a plum-tree. Root unknown. Der. prun-ella, or burd, and in bird, M. E. brid. See Poor (2), which is a doublet.

E. piren, to peer, used in precisely the same sense; we have numerous instances of a shifting of the letter r, as in bride, M. E.

PSALM, a sacred song. (L., - Gk.) M. E. psalm, frequently salm, in very early use, Layamon, 23754. A. S. sealm; see Sweet's A. S. Reader. - Lat. psalmus. - Gk. ψαλμός, a touching, a feeling, esp. the twitching of the strings of a harp; hence, the sound of the harp, a song, psalm. — Gk. ψάλλειν, to touch, twitch, twang; from base PSAL, put for SPAL. — SPAR, to struggle, throb; whence also Skt. sphur, sphar, to tremble, throb, struggle, Gk. doπaípes, to pant, G. sich sperren, to struggle. Der. psalmist, Levins, F. psalmiste (Cot.), from Lat. psalmista, late Gk. ψαλμιστής; psalm-ody, spelt psalmodie in Minsheu, F. psalmodie (Cot.), from late Lat. psalmodia, from Gk. ψαλμφδία, a singing to the harp, which from ψαλμ-, stem of ψαλμόs, and ζδή, a song, ode (see Ode); psalmodi-c-al, psalmod-ist.

Also psaltery, q.v.

F. form. - Lat. psalterium. - Gk. ψαλτήριον, a stringed instrument. — Gk. ψαλτήρι, a harper; formed from ψαλ-, base of ψάλλειν, to harp; with suffix answering to Aryan -tar, and denoting the agent. See Psalm. Dor. psalter, M. E. sauter. Holi Meidenhad. agent. See Psalm. Dor. psalter, M. E. sauter, Holi Meidenhad, ed. Cockayne, p. 3, from O. F. psaltier, 'a psaulter, book of psalms,' Cot., from Lat. psalterium, (1) a psaltery, (2) a song sung to the psaltery, the Psalter.

PSEUDONYM, a fictitious name. (F., -Gk.) Modern; not in Todd's Johnson. Borrowed from F. seudonyme, used by Voltaire, A.D. 1772 (Littré). — Gk. ψευδώνυμος, adj., called by a false name. — Gk. ψευδο-, put for ψευδος, a falschood (cf. ψευδής, false); and ὄνυμα, $\delta v_0 \mu_0$, a name. [The ω results from the coalescence of the double o.] β. The Gk. ψεῦδοs is allied to ψυδρός, ψυδνός (base ψυδ-), false; and to ψύθ-os, a lie, orig. a whisper; cf. ψυθίζειν, to whisper. This is from a base ψυθ = SPUT, an extension of the imitative \checkmark SPU, to blow, whence also ψύ-χειν, to blow, and Skt. phút, the imitative sound of blowing. γ. For the Gk. ὅνομα, see Name. Der.

PSHAW, interjection of disdain. (E.) 'A peevish fellow... disturbs all with pishes and pshaws;' Spectator (cited by Todd). An imitative word, like pish; from the sound of blowing. Cf. also PSYCHICAL, pertaining to the soul. (L., -Gk.) Modern; formed with suffix -al from psychic-us, the Latinised form of Gk. ψυχικόs, belonging to the soul or life. - Gk. ψυχ.ή, the soul, life, orig. breath. – Gk. ψύχ-ειν, to blow; extended from the base ψυ = ✓ SPU, to blow; see Pseudonym. Der. psycho-logy, where the suffix -logy = Gk. suffix -λογία, from λογόs, discourse, which from λέγειν, to speak; hence, psycholog-i-c-al, -al-ly; psycholog-ist.

prosection of the process of grouse. (Gaelic.) 'The ptarmigan grous' is mentioned in an E. translation of Buffon's Nat. Hist., London, 1792, vol. ii. p. 48. The singular spelling ptarmigan, with a needless initial p, seems to be French, and appears in Littre's Dict. - Gael. tarmachan, 'the bird ptarmigan;' Irish tarmachan, 'the bird called the termagant (!).' I do not know the sense of the word; the Gael. verb tarmaich means 'to originate, be the source of, gather, collect, dwell, settle, produce, beget.

PUBERTY, the age of full developement, early manhood. [F., -L.] Spelt pubertie in Minsheu, ed. 1627. – F. puberté, 'youth,' Cot. – Lat. pubertatem, acc. of pubertas, the age of maturity. – Lat. pubes, the signs of manhood, hair.

β. Allied to pu-pus, a boy, pu-pa, a girl; from γ PU, to beget; see Puppet, Pupil. Der. pub-esc-ent, arriving at puberty, from pubescent-, pres. part. of pubescere, inceptive verb formed from sb. pub-es; pubescence.

PUBLIC, belonging to the people, general, common to all. (F.,-L.) 'Publyke toke his [its] begynnynge of people;' Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, b. i. c. 1. And in Palsgrave.-F. public, masc., publique, fem., 'publick,' Cot.-Lat. publicus, public; O. Lat. poblicus, poplicus.

revenue. Extended from publicus, public; see FUDIIC.

PUBLICATION, a publishing, that which is published. (F., =

lischen. 'He was rigtful, and wolde not puplische hir;' Wyclif, Matt. i. 19. Also publishen, Chaucer, C. T. 8291. This is a quite irregular formation, due perhaps to some confusion with O. F. peupler, to people, and conformed to other E. verbs in -isk, which are usually to people, and conformed to other E. verbs in -ish, which are usually formed from F. verbs in -ir making the pres. part. in -issant. It is founded on F. publier, 'to publish,' Cot. — Lat. publicare, to make public. — Lat. publicus, public. See Public. Der. publish-er.

PUCE, the name of a colour. (F., — L.) 'Puce, of a dark brown colour;' Todd's Johnson. — F. puce, a flea; couleur puce, puce-coloured; Hamilton. Thus it is lit. 'flea-coloured.' The O. F. spelling of puce is pulce (Cotgrave). — Lat. pulicem, acc. of pulcex, a flea. + Gk. $\psi \lambda \lambda \lambda \alpha$ (= $\psi \lambda \lambda$ -ja), a flea.

(= $\sigma \pi \nu \lambda$ -ja) and Lat. pul-ex (=spul-ex) are to be connected with Skt. sphur, to move quickly, from \checkmark SPAR, to throb. The orig. sense is 'quick jumper' or 'jerker,' from its motion.

¶ Todd says that The same of pulse is the same as E. pulse, an old word occurring in Shak. in the phrase pulse-stocking, I Hen. IV, ii. 4.78. Todd also cites 'Cloths... pulse, brown-blue, blacks' from Stat. 5 and 6 Edw. VI, c. vi. But the true sense of pulse is uncertain, and the origin of the word unknown. It cannot be the same word as pulse.

PUCK, a goblin, mischievous sprite. (C.) In Shak. Mids. Nt. Dr. ii. 1. 40. M. E. pouke, P. Plowman, C. xvi. 164, on which passage see my note. It first appears in Richard Coer de Lion, 1, 566, in Weber, Met. Romances, ii. 25. Of Celtic origin. - Irish puca, an elf. sprite, hobgoblin; W. pwca, pwci, a hobgoblin. Cf. Gael. and Irish bosan, a spectre, apparition; Corn. bucca, a hobgoblin, bugbear, scare-crow; W. bug, a hobgoblin. + Icel. púki, a wee devil, an imp. +G. spuk, an apparition, hobgoblin, ghost. B. The G. form shews that an initial s has been lost; and the root takes the form SPU, possibly to blow, inflate; but this is doubtful. The Dan. pog, Swed. pojke, a boy, are unrelated; cf. Finn. poica, a son (E. Müller.) y. It is clear that E. bug, as in bug-bear, hum-bug, is nothing but a weakened form of puck; see Bug (1). Thus puck is a more original form, and it is not possible to connect bug with Lithuan. baugus, roini, and it is not possible to connect our with Lithian. ourgus, terrific, as erroneously suggested under Bug (1). The whole of section β in that article is wrong. Doublets, pug, bug.

PUCKER, to gather into folds, to wrinkle. (C.) 'Pucker, to shrink up or lie uneven, as some clothes are apt to do;' Phillips. ed.

1706. 'Saccolare, to pucker, or gather, or cockle, as some stuffes do being wet;' Florio, ed. 1598. 'He fell down; and not being able to rise again, had his belly puckered together like a sachel, before the chamberlain could come to help him; Junius, Sin Stigmatised (1639), p. 19; in Todd's Johnson. The allusion is here to the top of a poke or bag, when drawn closely together by means of the string; cf. 'to purse up the brows, from purse, sb., and Ital. saccolare from sacco. It is a frequentative form from the base puck-, which appears to be of Celtic origin. Cf. Irish pucadh, a swelling or puffing up; Gaelpoc, to put up in a bag or sack, to become like a bag; connected with Gaelpoca, a bag. See Poke (1), Pock. Der. pucker, sb. PUDDING, an intestine filled with meat, a sausage; a soft kind of meat, of flour, milk, eggs, &c. (C. ?) M. E. pudding, P. Plowner P. Fill role.

man, B. xiii. 106. It is probable that this word belongs to that class of homely domestic words which are of Celtic origin. The suffix -ing is probably an E. substitute for an older suffix which was not understood. = Irish putog, a pudding, the numbles of a deer; Gael. putog, a pudding; W. poten, a paunch, a pudding; Corn. pot, a bag, a pudding.

$\beta$. The older sense was doubtless 'bag,' and these words point back to a root PUT, 'to swell out, be inflated,' preserved in Swed. dial. puta, to be inflated, bulge out (Rietz). Though this root has not been noted, it will explain several other words, such as prov. E. puddle, short and fat, poddy, round and stout in the belly, pod, a large protuberant belly (Halliwell); W. putyn, a short round body, putan, a squat female; Gael. put, a large buoy, an inflated skin, put, the cheek (from its inflated appearance). Cf. also E. pad, pod; see Pad, Pod.

y. Perhaps the same root appears in Lat.
botulus, a sausage, which certainly seems to be a closely related word, and in F. boudin, a black-pudding.

8. The Low G. 8. The Low G. pudding has much the same sense as E. pudding; and is clearly possens* (stem possent-), substituted for the true form potens, powerful;

from F. publicité, coined as if from a Lat. acc. publicitatem*. And related to Low G. pudde-wurst, a thick black-pudding, and to see public-an, public-at-ion, public-at-ion, publish.

puddig, thick, stumpy; see Poodle. And perhaps Pout and Put belong to the same family.

PUDDLE (1), a small pool of muddy water. (C.) Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 54, l. 5. Like pool, it is of Celtic origin; but this is obscured by the loss of l after p, as in the case of patch. M. E. podel stands for plodel, and the loss of l was due to the recurrence of the letter in the suffix; just as in the case of bubble, put for blubble, the dimin. of blob; see Bubble. for blubble, the dimin. of blob; see Bubble. B. Again, the suffix -el is an E. suffix, put in place of the Celtic suffix -an or -ach, which was not so well understood.—Irish plodach, puddle, mire; plodan, a small pool; Gael. plodan, a small pool. Dimin. of Irish and Gael. plod, a pool, standing water. Cf. Skt. pluta, bathed, wet; Irish plodaim, I float. The orig, sense of plod is 'flooded water.'—PLU, to swim; see Plod, Flood, Float. Der. puddle (2). β. Again, the PUDDLE (2), to make muddy; to make thick or close with clay, so as to render impervious to water; to work iron. (C.) Shak. has puddle, to make muddy or thick, Com. Err. v. 173; Oth. iii. 4. 143. Hence the various technical uses. From Puddle (1). Cf. Irish and Gael. plodanachd, paddling in water; from plodan, a small pool. Dor. puddl-er, puddl-ing.

PUERILE, childish. (F.,-L.)

In Phillips, ed. 1706. [The sh. puerility is in much earlier use, occurring in Minsheu, ed. 1627.] -O.F. pueril, omitted by Cotgrave, but in use in the 16th cent. (Littré); mod. F. puéril. - Lat. puerilis, boyish. - Lat. puer, a boy, lit. 'one begotten.' - ✓ PU, to beget; cf. Skt. pota, the young of any animal, putra, a son. And see Foal. Der. pueril-i-ty, from F puerilité, 'puerility,' Cot. So also puer-peral, relating to child-birth, from Lat. puerpera, fem. adj., child-bearing; from puer-, stem of puer, a child, and parere, to bear, produce, for which see Parent.

Not found in A. S., but of imitative origin, and may be claimed as E. to cours not only in G. puffen, to puff, pop, strike, Dan. puffe, to pop, Swed. puffa, to crack, to push, but in W. puff, a puff, a sharp blast, puffio, to come in puffs. Cf. G. puff, a puff; puff interjection, &c. \(\beta \). All from a base PU or BU, expressive of the act of blowing, which is variously expanded in Skt. bukk, to sound, to bark, Lithuan. pukszti, to pant, &c. And see Buffer (1), Buffet (1). y. The form pop is a mere variant; see Pop. And see Pooh. Der.

puff-er, puff-er-y, puff-y, puff-i-ly, puff-i-ness. Also puff-in, q.v. PUFFIN, the name of a bird. (E.) 'Puffin, a fowle so called;' Minsheu, ed. 1627. 'Puffin, a sort of coot or sea-gull, a bird supposed to be so called from its round belly, as it were swelling and puffing out; Phillips, ed. 1706. And in Skelton, Phylyp Sparowe, 454. (The F. puffin is borrowed from E.) Puffin Island, near Anglesca, abounds with these birds, or formerly did so; but the W. name for the bird is pal. The reason assigned by Phillips is prob. the right one; Webster thinks it is named from its peculiar swelling beak, which somewhat resembles that of the parrot. But it comes to the same thing. Thus the etym. is from Puff, q.v. The suffix is diminutival, answering to E. -en in kitt-en, chick-en PUG, a monkey, small kind of dog. (C.) The orig. sense is 'imp' or 'little demon,' as in Butler, Hudibras, pt. ii. c. 3, 1. 635, and in Ben Jonson's play The Devil is an Ass, in which 'Pug, the lesser devil' is one of the characters. A weakened form of Puck, q.v.

'A pug-dog is a dog with a short monkey-like face; 'Wedgwood.

PUGILISM, the art of boxing. (L.) Pugilism and pugilist are late words, added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. Coined from Lat. pugil, a boxer. From the base PUG, weakened form of PUK, with the sense of 'close;' cf. Gk. πύγ-μη, the first, πυκυός, close, compact. Perhaps allied to A PAK, to fasten; see Pact. β. Allied to E. fist; see Fist. And see pugnacious.

PUGNACIOUS, combative, fond of fighting. (L.) Rather a late word. R. quotes 'a furious, pugnacious pope like Julius II, from Barrow, On the Pope's Supremacy. [The sb. pugnacity is earlier, occurring in Minsheu, ed. 1627.] A coined word (with suffix ous = Lat. -osus) from Lat. pugnaci-, crude form of pugnax, combative. -Lat. pugna-re, to fight. - Lat. pugnus, the fist; allied to E. Fist, q.v. Der. pugnacious-ly; also pugnacity, from Lat. acc. pugnacitatem. And see ex-pugn, im-pugn, op-pugn, re-pugn-ant, pug-il-ist, poni-ard.
PUISNE, inferior in rank, applied to certain judges in England.

(F.,-L.) A law term. 'Puisse or punie, vsed in our common law-bookes.. for the younger; as in Oxford and Cambridge they call Junior and Senior, so at Innes of Court they say Puisse and Ancient;' Minsheu, ed. 1627. The same word as Puny, q.v.

PUISSANT, powerful, strong. (F., -L.) In Skelton, ed. Dyce, i. 203, l. 3 from bottom. 'This is so puyssant an enemy to nature;' Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 12. -F. puissant, 'puissant, mighty,' Cot. Cf. Ital. possente, powerful.

As an initial s occasionally is lost before p, it is most likely that puke stands for spuke or spewk. an extension from the verb to spew, with the same meaning. Cf. G. spucken, to spit. See Spew.

PUKE (2), the name of a colour; obsolete. (Unknown.) Explained by Baret as a colour between russet and black. See Narcs and Halliwell, and see further under Puce, which must be a different word, since puke could never have come out of puce, and indeed it occurs earlier. Origin unknown.

PULE, to chirp as a bird, whine like an infant, whimper. (F.-L.) In Shak. Cor. iv. 2. 52; Romeo, iii. 5. 185. - F. piauler, 'to peep, or cheep, as a young bird; also, to pule or howle, as a young whelp; Cot. Cf. Ital. pigolare, to chirp, moan, complain. These are imitative words; and are formed, like Lat. pipilare, to chirp, from the imitative of PI, to chirp, appearing in Lat. pipare, to chirp.

See Peep (1), and Pipe.

PULL, to draw, try to draw forcibly, to pluck. (E.) M. E. pullen, P. Plowman, B. xvi. 73; Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 68.

And let him there in pulle = and caused him to be thrust into it; lit. and caused (men) to thrust him into it; Legends of the Holy Rood, ed. Morris, p. 60. Prob. an E. word; the A.S. pullian and the pp. apullod, given in Somner's Dict., are correct forms; apullod is in A.S. Leechdoms. i. 362, l. 10. B. We find, also, Low G. pulen, to pick, pinch, pluck, pull, tear, which is the same word; Rrom Winterh iii 272. And if we suppose a loss of an Brem. Wörterb. iii. 372. Brem. Wörterb. iii. 372. Y. And, if we suppose a loss of an initial s, we may compare it with Irish spioladh, a snatching, Gael. spiol, to pluck, snatch, G. sich sperren, to struggle against; also with Lat. pellere (for spellere), to drive, pl. t. pe-pul-i, GR. πάλλειν (for σπάλλειν), to brandish, cast; all from SPAR, to tremble, throb, struggle, of which the Skt. forms are sphar and sphur, the latter containing the same vowel as the E. word. ¶ We also find O. Du. pullen, to drink; this agrees with the E. phrase 'to take a long pull at a cup' in drinking. Der. pull, sb., Chaucer, Parl. of Fowls, l. 164. And see pulsate.

P. Plowman, B. vi. 282. - O. F. polete (13th cent., Littré), later poulette, 'a young hen,' Cot. Fem. form of F. poulet, a chicken, dimin. of poule, a hen. - Low Lat. pulla, a hen; fem. of pullus, a young animal, cognate with F. Foal, q. v. Doublet, foult, q. v.

PULLEY, a wheel turning on an axis, over which a cord is passed for raising weights. (F., -L.; or F., -O. Low G.) Spelt pulley in Minsheu, cd. 1627; polley in Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox, ed. Arber, p. 96, l. 6 from bottom. But, in the Prompt. Parv., we have the form poleyne; and in Chaucer, C. T. 10498, we find poliuè (polivè), riming with driuè (drivè). The last form is difficult to explain; but we may derive poleyne from F. poulain, 'a fole, or colt, also the rope wherewith wine is let down into a seller, a pulley-rope, Cot. 'Par le poulain on descend le vin en cave;' Rabelais, Garg. i. 5 (Littré). The mod. E. pulley answers to F. poulie, 'a pulley,' Cot.

B. If we take F. poulain to be the origin of the E. word, the derivation is from Low Lat. pullanus, a colt, extended from Lat. pullus, the young of any animal, cognate with E. Foal, q.v. γ . The transference of sense causes no difficulty, as the words for 'horse' or 'goat' are applied in other cases to contrivances for the exertion of force or bearing a strain; thus F. poutre, a filly, also means 'a beam' (Cot.); and F. chèvre, a goat, also means a kind of crane. The Low Lat. words for 'colt' are remarkably numerous, including (besides pullanus) the forms pulinus, pullenus, pulletrum, polassus, poledrus, polenus, poletus; also poleria, polina, a filly.

8. The Low Lat. forms polea, polegia, polegium, a pulley, filly. do not much help us, since these may have been adapted from F.; as may also be the case with O. Du. poleye, 'a pullie' (Hexham), Span. polea, Ital. puleggia. We may note, however, Low Lat. polanus, a pulley or a pulley-rope, which also has the sense of 'sledge.'

Diez, however, derives E. pulley from F. poulie, but F. poulie from the E. verb to pull, though I would rather take it from the Low G.

pulen, with the same sense; see Pull.

PULMONARY, affecting the lungs. (L.) Blount, Gloss., ed.

1674, has pulmonarious, diseased in the lungs. Englished from Lat.

pulmonarius, belonging to the lungs, diseased in the lungs. — Lat. β. The Lat. pulmo is cognate pulmon-, stem of pulmo, a lung. with Gk. πλεύμων, more commonly πνεύμων, a lung; and is derived from a base PLU-PNU (Gk. πνν-), to breathe hard; see Pneumonia, Pneumatic. Der. pulmon-i-c, from Lat. pulmoni-, crude

Y. This barbarism is due to confusion between the a of plants; Cot. - Lat. pulpa, the fleshy portion of animal bodies, pulp of fruit, pith of wood.

B. Prob. named from the feel, and connected with palpare, to touch softly; see Palpable.

Der. pulp-y,

pulp-i-ness; pulp-ous, pulp-ous-ness.

PULPIT, a platform for speaking from. (F., -L.) M. E. pulpit, P. Plowman's Crede, ed. Skeat, 1. 661; pulpet, Chaucer, C. T. 12325.

O. F. pulpite, 'a pulpit,' Cot. — Lat. pulpitum, a scaffold, platform, esp. a stage for actors. Root unknown.

pulsatus, pp. of pulsare, to beat. It is no doubt due to the use of the pulsation, pp. of pulsare, to beat. It is no doubt due to the use of the sb. pulsation, in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, from F. pulsation = Lat. pulsationem, acc. of pulsatio, a beating; from the same verb. β. The orig. sense of pulsare was simply 'to beat;' it is a frequentative verb, formed from puls-us, pp. of pellere, to drive, which is prob. from the Δ SPAR, to vibrate, throb, struggle; cf. Skt. sphar, sphur, to throb; see Pull. Der. pulsat-ion, as above; pulsat-ive, pulsat-ory splus (1), a.y. From the Lat pellere, we have also extend to splus the specific pulsation. pulse (1), q. v. From the Lat. pellere we have also ap-peal, peal, com-pel, dis-pel, ex-pel, im-pel, inter-pell-at-ion, pro-pel, im-pulse, re-pulse; and see pell, pull, pal-estra, pal-p-able, psalm, poplar, ball, &c.

PULSE (1), a throb, vibration. (F., -L.) M. E. pous (in which the l is dropped), P. Plowman, B. xvii. 66. - F. pouls, 'the pulse,'

Cot. - Lat. pulsum, acc. of pulsus, a beating; also the beating of the pulse, a pulse.—Lat. pulsus, pp. of pellere, to drive; see Pulsate.
PULSE (2), grain or seed of beans, pease, &c. (L.) M. E. puls.
'All maner puls is goode, the fitche outetake' = every kind of pulse is good, except the vetch; Palladius on Husbandry, b. i. l. 723. -Lat. puls, a thick pap or pottage made of meal, pulse, &c., the primitive food of the Romans before they became acquainted with bread (White). Cf. Gk. πόλτος, porridge. ¶ I think this etymology is sufficient and satisfactory. Wedgwood takes it to be the pl. of a form pull, a husk, supposed to be connected with O. Du. peule, 'a shale, a husk, or a pill [pccl];' Hexham. But pulse is rather the contents of the husks than the husks themselves. Cf. pulls,

PULVERISE, to pound to dust. (F.,-L.) 'To pulverate or to pulverize, to beate into dust;' Minsheu, ed. 1627.—F. pulverizer, 'to pulverize,' Cot.— Late Lat. pulverizere, to pulverise; Lat. pulverare, to pulverize dust. to scatter dust, also to pulverise. - Lat. puluer-, stem of puluis, dust. β. Prob. connected with pul-sus, pp. of pellere, to beat, drive; from the notion of beating to dust, or of driving about as dust; see Pulsate. The suffix -ise answers to the usual F. -iser (occasional -izer), late Lat. -izare, imitated from Gk. -ιζειν. Dor. pulveris-at-ion.

PUMA, a large carnivorous animal. (Peruvian.) 'The American animal, which the natives of Peru call puma, and to which the Europeans have given the denomination of lion, has no mane; 'tr. of Buffon's Nat. Hist., London, 1792. - l'eruvian puma.

PUMICE, a hard, spongy, volcanic mineral. (L.) M. E. pomeys, pomyce, Prompt. Parv. — A. S. pumic-stún, pumice-stone; Wright's Vocab., i. 38, col. 1. Thus pumice is directly from Lat. pumic, stem β. So named of pumex, pumice; not from the F. form ponce. from its light, spongy nature, resembling sea-foam. Put for spumen*; from Lat. spuma, foam; see Spume. Doublet, pounce (2).

PUMMEL, the same as Pommel, q. v.

PUMP(1), a machine for raising water. (F., - Teut., -L.?) M. E. pumpe, Prompt. Parv. - F. pompe, 'a pump;' Cot. Of Teut. origin. -G. pumpe, a pump; of which a fuller form is plumpe, shewing that an l has been lost. Cf. prov. G. plumpen, to pump. The G. plumpen. also means to plump, to fall plump, to move suddenly but clumsily, to blunder out with a thing; so that the sense of 'pumping' arose from the plunging action of the piston or, as it is sometimes called, the plunger, esp. when made solid, as in the force-pump. I have shewn, s. v. Plump, that the word plump, however expressive as an imitative word, probably took its form from the Lat. plumbum, lead; so that 'to fall plump' meant to fall like lead. Hence I would refer pump (or plump) to the same Lat. origin. Y. Even in English, we find prov. E. plump, a pump, plump, to pump (Cornwall), which appears to be taken directly from F. plomber, to lead, to soulder, . . also to sound the depth of a place with a plummet;' the change of idea from 'sounding with a plummet' to that of 'letting down a piston into water is not a violent one. ¶ The word is one of some difficulty. The Span. and Port. bomba, a pump, appear to be weakened forms from pompa, borrowed from F. pompe; we can hardly (with Webster) regard them as the oldest forms. We find also Du. pomp, Swed. pump, Dan. pompe, and even Russ. pompa, a pump; all borrowed words. Der. pump, verb.

PUMP (2), a thin-soled shoe. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) In Shak. Mids.

Nt. Dr. iv. 2. 37; explained by Schmidt to mean 'a light shoe, often worn with ribbons formed into the shape of flowers.' So called (as form of pulmo.

PULP, the soft fleshy part of bodies, any soft mass. (F., -L.)

ticularly with the foot and its ornament. See further under Pomp. PUMPION, PUMPKIN, a kind of gourd. (F.,-L,-Gk.) The mod, form pumpkin is a corruption from the older word pompon or pumpion, in which the suffix, not being understood, has been replaced by the E. dimin. suffix-kin. Pumpion is in Shak. Merry Wives, iii. 3. 43. Better pompon, as in Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xix. c. 5. - F. pompon, a pumpion, or melon; Cot. Formed, with inserted m, from Lat. peponem, acc. of pepo, a large melon, pumpkin. - Gk. πέπων, a kind of melon, not eaten till quite ripe. - Gk. πέπων, cooked by the sun, ripe, mellow; from the base πεπ-, seen in πέπτειν, to cook; see

PUN, to play upon words. (E.) 'A corporation of dull punning drolls;' Dryden, Art of Poetry, 1, 358. The older sense of pun was to pound, to beat; hence to pun is to pound words, to beat them into new senses, to hammer at forced similes. 'He would pun thee into shivers with his fist; 'Shak. Troil. ii. 1. 42; and see Nares. Pun is an older form of pound, to bruise; see Pound (3). Der. pun, sb., Spectator, no. 61; punn-ing; pun-ster, a coined word, like trick-ster.
PUNCH (1), to pierce or perforate with a sharp instrument. (F., - L.) 'Punch, or Punching-iron, a shoemaker's tool to make holes with; Phillips, ed. 1706. In Shak. Rich. III, v. 3. 125. M.E. punchen, to prick; see Prompt. Parv. This verb is a mere coinage from the oldersb. punchion or punchon, spelt punchon in Prompt. Parv., denoting the kind of awl used for punching or perforating. See further under Puncheon (1). Der. punch, a kind of awl, as above. Distinct from punch (2), q. v.

PUNCH (2), to beat, bruise. (F., -L.) In the phrase 'to punch one's head,' the word is not the same as punch (1), but is a mere abbreviation of punish. In fact, 'to punish a man about the head' has still the same meaning. This is clearly shewn by the entries in the Prompt. Parv., p. 416. 'Punchyn, or chastysyn, punysshen, Punio, castigo;' and again, 'Punchynge, punysshinge, Punicio.' See Punish. For the suppression of the i in punish, cf. M. E. pulshen, to polish, P. Plowman, A. v. 257, foot-notes; and vanshen, to vanish, id. C. xv. 217. In the present instance, punchen was readily suggested by the like-sounding word bunchen, with much the same sense. Hence the entry: 'Punchyn, or bunchyn, Trudo, tundo;' Prompt. Parv.

PÚNCH (3), a beverage composed of spirit, water, lemon-juice, sugar, and spice. (Hindi, -Skt.) 'Punch, a strong drink made of brandy, water, lime-juice, sugar, spice, &c.;' Phillips, ed. 1706. Wedgwood cites two most interesting quotations. 'At Nerule is made the best arrack or Nepo da Goa, with which the English on His coast make that enervating liquor called pounche (which is Hindostan for five) from five ingredients; 'Fryer, New Account of East India and Persia, 1697. 'Or to drink palepuntz (at Goa) which is a kind of drink consisting of aqua-vitæ, rose-water, juice of citrons, and current.' Olerating Travels to the Grand Pulse of Management. and sugar;' Olearius, Travels to the Grand Duke of Muscovy and Persia, 1669. It was introduced from India, and apparently by the way of Goa; and is named from consisting of five ingredients. -Hindi panch, five; Bate's Dict., 1875, p. 304.—Skt. panchan, five, cognate with E. five; see Five. Perhaps it is interesting to observe that, whereas we used to speak of four elements, the number of elements in Sanskrit is five; see Benfey, p. 658, col. 2, l. 5; cf. Skt. paūchatva, the five elements; paūchaka, consisting of five. It is, at any rate, necessary to add that the Hindi and Skt. short a is pronounced like E. u in mud or punch; hence the E. spelling.

PUNCH (4), a short, hump-backed fellow in a puppet-show. (Ital., -L.) In this sense, Punch is a contraction of Punchinello. In the Spectator, no. 14, the puppet is first called Punchinello, and afterwards Punch. 'Punch, or Punchinello, a fellow of a short and thick size, a fool in a play, a stage-puppet;' Phillips. ed. 1706. The pl. Punchinellos occurs twice in Butler, Sat. on our Imitation of the French. 11. 26, 99; it occurs as early as A.D. 1666 (Nares). β. Punchinello is a corruption of Ital. pulcinello, by the change of l to n (cf. Palermo from Lat. Panormus); and the E. sound of chi corresponds to Ital. ci. Pulcinello was a character in Neapolitan comedy representing a foolish peasant who utters droll truths (Scheler); Meadows only gives the fem. pulcinella, 'punch, buffoon of a puppet-show.' These are dimin. forms of Ital. pulcino, 'a yoong chicken,' Florio; fem. pulcina. The latter form is a mere variant (with a different suffix) of Ital. pulcella, a girl, maiden (F. pucelle), and all the words are from Lat. pullus, the young of any animal, whence also F. poule (=Low Lat. pulla), a young hen. The change in sense from 'chicken to 'little child' is due to the common habit of using the word 'chicken' as a term of endearment. Thus the lit. sense of Ital. pulcinello is 'little chicken;' whence it meant (2) a little boy, and (3) a puppet. See further under Pullet. It is clear that the E. form is due to confusion with prov. E. punch, short, fat, punchy, potbellied (Halliwell); words which are prob. closely connected with scholar.—Skt. pand, to heap up or t Bunch, q.v. 'Did hear them call their fat child Punch, . . . a word sents Skt. short a, as in Punch (3).

[gait]; Cot. The use of this O. F. proverb connects the word par- of common use for all that is thick and short; Pepys' Diary, Apr. ticularly with the foot and its ornament. See further under Pomp. 30, 1669. In the phrase 'Punch and Judy,' I suppose Judy to be the usual abbreviation from Judith, once common as a female name. Judy no more stands for Judei or Judas than Punch for Pontius!

PUNCHEON (1), a steel tool for stamping or perforating; a punch. (F., -L.) Our mod. sb. punch is a familiar contraction of puncheon, which occurs rather early. M. E. punchon, Prompt. Parv. Punsoune, a dagger, occurs in Barbour's Bruce, i. 545; see my note on the line. — O. F. poinson, 'a bodkin, also a puncheon, also a stamp, mark, print, or seale; also, a wine-vessell; 'Cot. Mod. F. poinson; cf. Span. punzon, a punch; Ital. punzone, 'a bodkin, or any sharp pointed thing, also a piece [wine-vessel], a barell,' Florio. — Lat. bunctionem, acc. of punctio, a pricking, puncture; Diez remarks that this sb., which in Lat. is feminine, changes its gender to mase, in F., &c., whilst changing its sense from 'pricking' to the concrete 'pricking-instrument.'- Lat. punctus, pp. of pungere, to prick; see Pungent. Der. punch (1).

PUNCHEON (2), a cask, a liquid measure of 84 gallons. (F., -L.?) Butte, pipe, puncheon, whole barrell, halfe barrell, firken, or any other caske; Hackluyt's Voyages, vol. i. p. 273. - O. F. poinson, any other case; Interthyts voyages, vol. I. p. 273.—O. F. poinson, 'a bodkin, also a puncheon [steel tool]; also, a stamp, mark, print, or scale; also, a wine-vessell; 'Cot. β. It is certain that the E. puncheon, a cask, is the O. F. poinson, mod. F. poinçon, a wine-vessel. But it is not certain that O. F. poinson, a bodkin, and poinson, a cask, with the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control are the same word. It is gen. supposed that they are quite distinct, owing to the wide difference in sense. For the latter, we also find the O.F. form ponçon, explained by Cot. to mean 'half a tunne, or the same as poinson;' and this latter form comes still closer to E. puncheon. Y. Cot. also has O. F. pogon, posson, 'the quarter of a chopine [large half-pint], a little measure for milk, verjuice, and vinegar, not altogether so big as the quarter of our pint.' These forms are regarded by Scheler as variants of poinson or ponçon, and the etymology is admitted to be doubtful. 8. It seems to me that it is not necessary to take posson into account, as the content of that small vessel is so widely different; and, at the same time, I am inclined to think that O. F. poinson remains the same word in all its senses, the wine-vessel being so named from the 'stamp, mark, print, or scale' upon it, the stamp being produced by a punchion or stamping-instrument. That is, I regard Puncheon (2) as identical with Puncheon (1). Cf. O. Ital. punzone, 'a bodkin, barell, goldsmiths pouncer, little stamp;' Florio. In the same way, our word hogshead (formerly oxhead, as shewn under the word) must orig. have meant a mark or brand, though now only used in the sense of cask. a. The Bavarian punzen, ponzen, a cask (Schmeller), may be of F. origin.
PUNCHINELLO, the same as Punch (4), q.v.
PUNCTATE, PUNCTATED, punctured. (L.) A botanical term. Coined with suffix -ate (= Lat. -atus) from Lat. punctum, a point, dot. See Puncture, Pungent.

PUNCTILIO, a nice point in behaviour. (Span.,-L.) courtier practic, is he that is yet in his path, his course, his way, and hath not touched the punctilio or point of his hopes;' Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, Act ii. sc. 1 (Amorphus). Rather from Span. puntillo, a nice point of honour, than from the equivalent Ital. puntiglio. In fact, the word is spelt punctillo in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. The c is an E. insertion, due to confusion with punctuate, &c. The li represents the sound of the Span. ll. B. Span. puntillo is a dimin. of punto, a point. - Lat. punctum, a point; see Point. Der.

PUNCTUAL, exact in observing appointed times. (F.,-L.) Minsheu, ed. 1627, has punctuall and the sb. punctualitie. See Trench, Select Glossary.—F. ponctuel, 'punctuall,' Cot.—Low Lat. punctualis*, not recorded; but the adv. punctualiter, exactly, occurs A.D. 1440; Ducange.—Lat. punctur, for punctum, a point; with suffix -alis. (Perhaps punctalis, from the stem punct, would have been more correct.) See Point. Der. punctual-ly, punctual-i-ty.

PUNCTUATE, to divide sentences by marks. (I..) A modern word; added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. Suggested by F. punctuer, 'to point, . . mark, or distinguish by points;' Cot. - Low Lat. punctuare, to determine, define. Formed from Lat. punctu-, for punctum, a point; see Point. (Perhaps punctate, from the stem punct, would have been a more correct form.) Der. punctuation, from F. punctua-

Also punish-er; and (from Lat. punire) im-punity. And see penance, penitence, punch (2).

PUNKAH, a large fan. (Hindi, -Skt.) Hind. pankhú, a fan; allied to pankhú, a wing, feather, paksha, a wing; Bate's Dict., 1875, pp. 394, 397.—Skt. paksha, a wing. Cf. Pers. pankan, 'a sieve, a fan; 'Rich. Dict. p. 338.

PUNT (1), a ferry-boat, a flat-bottomed boat. (L.) Added by Todd to Johnson. I find no modern quotation; yet it is in very early use.—A. S. punt; 'Caudex, punt,' Wright's Vocab. i. 56, col. 1. (Caudex means a boat hollowed out of a tree.) Abbreviated from Lat. ponto, a punt, Casar, Bellum Civile, iii. 29; also, a pontoon. See Pontoon.

PUNT (2), to play at the game of cards called basset, (F., Span., – Ital.) 'Punter, a term used at the game of cards called basset;' Phillips, ed. 1706. – F. ponte, 'a punter; a punt;' also, ponter, 'to punt;' Hamilton. – Span. punto, a point, also, a pip at cards. – Lat. punctum, a point; see Point.

PUNY, small, feeble, inferior in size or strength. (F., -L.) In Shak. Rich. II, iii. 2.86; also puisny, As You Like It, iii. 4.46. And see Trench, Select Glossary. -O. F. puisné, 'puny, younger, born after,' Cot. Mod. F. puiné, younger. Thus the lit. sense is 'born after;' hence, younger, junior, inferior. -Lat. post natus, born after.

See Posterior and Natal. Doublet, puisne, q. v. PUPA, a chrysalis. (L.) A scientific term. - Lat. pupa, a girl, doll, puppet; hence, the sense of undeveloped insect. Fem. of pupus, a boy, child. Allied to pu-tus, pu-sus, pu-er, a boy; from \checkmark PU, to

8. 7. -O. F. pupile, 'a pupill, ward;' Cot. Mod. F. pupille. Properly a mase. sb. - Lat. pupillus, an orphan-boy, orphan, a ward; dimin. from pupus, a boy; see Pupa. Der. pupil-age, Spenser, Verses to Lord Grey, 1. 2; pupill-ar-y, from F. pupilaire, 'pupillary,' Cot. Lat. pupillusis, belonging to a pupil.

Cot., Lat. pupillaris, belonging to a pupil. Also pupil (2).

PUPIL (2), the central spot of the eye. (F., -L.) Spelt pupill in Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 868. - F. pupille, the pupil (not in Cotgrave). A fem. sb.; which distinguishes it from the word above. - Lat. pupilla, a little girl; also, the apple of the eye, or pupil. Fem. of pupillus; see Pupil (1).

The name seems to be due to the small images seen in the pupil; cf. the old E. phrase 'to look babies in the girl; in the eyes little baby, puppet; 'Cot. Dimin. from Lat. pupa; see Pupa. PUPPY, (1) a whelp; (2) a dandy. (F.,-L.) 1. In Shak. Oth. i. 3. 341; a puppy-dog, K. John, ii. 460. Here (as in lev-y, jur-y) the final-y answers to F. -ce. -F. poupee, 'a baby, a puppet;' Cot. Here, by 'baby.' Cotgrave means a doll; but it is clear that in E. the word was made to mean the young of an animal, esp. of a dog. The F. poupée (as if = Lat. pupata*) is due to Lat. pupa; see Pupa.

2. In the sense of 'dandy.' puppy occurs in the Guardian (Todd's Johnson). This is not quite the same word; but rather represents the O. F. poupin or popin, 'spruce, neat, trimme, fine,' Cot. Cf. se popiner, 'to trimme or trick up himself,' id.; mod. F. Jaire le poupin, to play the fop (Hamilton). This word answers to a Low Lat. form pupinus* (not found), and is merely a derivative from Low Lat. form pupinus* (not found), and is merely a derivative from Lat. pupus, a boy. Thus the result is much the same either way. Der. puppy-ism. Also pup, which is merely an abbreviation for puppy; whence pup, verb, formerly puppy, as in Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xxx. c. 14.

PUR-, prefix. (F., -L.) E. pur- answers to O. F. pur-, F. pour-, prefix, which is the F. prep. pour, for, a curious variation of Lat. pro, for. Thus pur- and pro- are equivalent; and words like purvey and provide are mere doublets.
¶ In the word pur-blind, the prefix has a different value.

PURBLIND, nearly blind. (Hybrid; F.,-L., and E.) word has suffered a considerable change of sense, almost parallel to Phillips, ed. 1706. But I suppose the spelling to be a mistaken one,

PUNGENT, acrid to taste or smell, keen, sarcastic. (L.) In the strange change in the case of Parboil, q.v. The orig. sense was Phillips, ed. 1706. Pungency occurs earlier, in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1706. Pungent-y stem of pres. part. of pungere, to prick, pt. t. topic-pug-i, pp. punctus; from the base PUG or PUK, to prick. See Point. Der. pungent-y, pungenc-y. From the Lat. pungere we last have point, with its derivatives; also punct-iito, q.v., punct-y-al, p. v. punctus; and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus and punctus earlier version has pure blynde, where the later has oon ised (i.e. onecyed), and the Vulgate has luscos. So also 'purblynde, luscus;' Prompt. Parv. Even in Shak. we have both senses: (1) wholly blind, L. L. iii. 181, Romeo, ii. 1. 12; and (2) partly blind, Venus, 679, 1 Hen. VI, ii. 4. 21. β. It is clear that 'wholly blind' is the orig. sense, and that which alone needs an etymology; whilst 'partly blind is a secondary sense, due perhaps to some confusion with the verb to pore, as shewn by the spelling poreblind. Purblind = pure-blind, i. e. wholly blind; see Pure and Blind. For the use of pure as an adv., cf. 'pure for his love' = merely for his love, Tw. Nt. v. 86. Der.

PURCHASE, to acquire, obtain by labour, obtain by payment. (F.,-L.) M. E. purchasen, purchacen, Rob. of Glouc, p. 16, l. 3; Chaucer, C. T. 610. The usual sense is 'to acquire.'-O. F. purchacer, later pourchasser, 'eagerly to pursue, . . purchase, procure,' Cot. = O. F. pur, F. pour, for; and chasser, to chase. Formed after the analogy of F. poursuivre (Scheler). T. 1281. - F. pur, masc., pure, fem., 'pure,' Cot. - Lat. purum, acc. of purus, pure, clean. - PU, to purify, cleanse; cf. Skt. pû, to purify; see Fire. E. purifien, Wyclif, Deeds [Acts], xxi. 26. - F. purifier, 'to purifie,' Cot. - Lat. purificare, to make pure. - Lat. puri- puro-, crude form of purus, pure; and fic-, put for fac- (facere), to make. PURITAN, one who pretends to great purity of life. (L.) The name was first given, about A.D. 1564, to persons who aimed at greater purity of life, &c., than others (Haydn). Frequently in Shak, All's Well, i. 3. 56, 98; Tw. Nt. ii. 3. 152, 155, 159; Wint. Tale, iv. 3. 46; Pericles, iv. 6. 9. A barbarous E. formation, with suffix -an (= Lat. -anus), from the word purit-y or the Lat. purit-as. See Purity. Der. Puritan-i-c-al, Puritan-ism. ¶ The F. puritain is borrowed from E.

PURITY, the condition of being pure, pureness. (F., -L.) M. E. puretè, Ancren Riwle, p. 4, l. 21; the e (after r) was afterwards altered to i, to bring the word nearer to the Lat. spelling. - F. pureté, 'purity,' Cot. - Lat. puritatem, acc. of puritas, purity; formed with suffix -tas from puri- (= puro-), crude form of purus, pure; see PURL (1), to flow with a murmuring sound. (Scand.) 'A pipe, a little moistened, . . maketh a more solemne sound, than if the pipe were dry; but yet with a sweet degree of sibillation, or purling were dry; but yet with a sweet degree of sinitation, or puring; Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 230. Allied to M. E. prille (also pirle), a child's whirligig; Prompt. Parv. p. 413, note 2. The word is rather Scand. than E., being preserved in O. Swed. porla (Ihre), Swed. porla, to purl, bubble as a stream. B. But it is merely a frequentative form, with the usual suffixed -1, from the imitative word pirr or purr, for which see Purr, Pirouette. Cf. Irish and Gael. bururus, a purling noise, a gurgling. bururus, a purling noise, a gurgling. ¶ 1407, is from the rippling of a purling stream.

PURL (2), spiced or medicated beer or ale. (F.,-L.) sort of drink made of ale mingled with the juice of wormwood; perle, a pearl; see Pearl. See perle, adj., and perler, verl, in Litté. The word was a term in cookery; thus sucre perle is sugar boiled twice; bouillon perle, jelly-broth (Hamilton). So also G. perlen, to rise in small bubbles like pearls, to pearl (Flügel); perle, a pearl, drop, bubble. Hence purl, a drink with bubbles on the surface.

PURL (3), to form an edging on lace, to form an embroidered border, to invert stitches in knitting. (F.-L.) Just as the word above should be spelt pearl, it is found, conversely, that the present word is often misspelt pearl; by the same confusion. It is a contraction of the old word to purfle, to embroider on an edge. 'Pur fled with gold and pearl of rich assay; 'Spenser, F. Q. i. 2. 13. M.E.

purfilen, Chaucer, C. T. 193. — O. F. porfiler, later prufiler. 'Pourfiler d'or, to purfle, tinsell, or overcast with gold thread, &c.;' Cot.

— O. F. por, F. pour, from Lat. pro, from (which is often confused. as Scheler remarks, with F. par. Lat. per, throughout, and such seems to be the case here); and F. filer, to twist threads, from fil, a thread. See Pur- and File (1).

Cotgrave also gives O. F. pourfil in the sense of profile; profile and purl (3) are really the same word, the difference in sense being due to the peculiar use of the F. prefix pour- as if it were = Lat. per. To purl is 'to work along an edge,' or 'to overcast all along with thread.' Doublet, profile.

PURL (4), to upset. (E.) A slang term; a huntsman who is thrown off his horse is purled or spilt. Purl should rather be pirl; from M. E. pirle, a whirligig, formed by the frequentative suffix -l from the imitative word pirr, to whirl. So also O. Ital. pirla, a whipping-top; pirlare, 'to twirle round;' Florio. Allied to Purl (1).

PURLIEU, the borders or environs of any place (orig. only of a forest); esp. when used, as is usual, in the plural. (F., -L.) 'In the purlieus of this forest;' AS You Like It, iv. 3, 77. 'Purlieu, or Purlue, is all that ground neere any forest, which being made forest by Henry II., Rich. I., or King John, were, by perambulations granted by Henry III., seucred again from the same; Manwood, par. 2 of his Forest Lawes, cap. 20. And he calleth this ground pourallee, i. c perambulationem, or purlieu and purluy, which he saith, be but abusively taken for pourallee; Minsheu, ed. 1627. Manwood's definition is: 'Purlieu is a certain territorie of ground adjoyning unto the forest, meared [marked] and bounded with immoveable marks, meeres, and boundaries; 'Reed's note on As You Like It. 'Purlieu: land which having once been part of the royal forest has been severed from it by perambulationem (pourallie, O.F. puralee) granted by the crown. The preamble of 33 Edw. I. c. 5 runs: "Cume aucune gentz que sount mys hors de forest par la puralee . . . aient requis a cest parlement quils soient quites . . . des choses que les foresters lour demandent." In the course of the statute mention is made of "terres et tenements deaforestes par la puralee." These [lands] would constitute the purlieu. A purlieu-man or purlie-man is a man owning land within the purlieu, licensed to hunt on his own land; Wedgwood.

B. It is thus clear that purlies is a corruption of O.F. puralee, as if it had something to do with F. lies (Lat. locus), a place. The intermediate form was purley, of which see examples in Nares. This O. F. puralee appears to be a mere translation of Lat. perambulationem, by that confusion whereby O. F. pur (F. pour), though really answering to Lat. pro, is made to do duty for the Lat. per, as in several instances noted by Scheler. y. Hence the etymology is from O. F. pur = Lat. pro; and O. F. alee, a going, for which see Alley.

PURLOIN, to steal, plagiarise. (F., - L.) In Shak. Lucrece, 1651. M. E. purlongen. Purlongyn, or prolongyn, or put fer awey, Prolongo, alieno; Prompt. Parv. Thus the orig. sense is simply to prolong, put away, keep back, or remove. Cf. O. F. esloigner (= Lat. elongare), 'to remove, banish, drive, set, put, far away;' Cot. - O. F. porloignier, purloignier, to prolong, retard, delay: Burguy. - Lat. prolongare, to prolong; see Prolong. Der. purloin-er.

Doublet, prolong.

PURPLE, a very dark-red colour. (F., -L., -Gk.) In Spenser, F. Q. i. 2. 7. Put for M. E. purpre, by change of r to l, as in M. E. marbre, now marble, and in Molly, Dolly, for Mary, Dorothy. The M. E. purpre is in early use, occurring in Layamon, l. 5928. — O. F. porpre (13th cent., Littré), later pourpre, 'purple,' Cot. Cf. Ital. porpora, Span. purpura.—Lat. purpura, the purple-fish, purple dye.—Gk. πορφύρα, the purple-fish; cf. Gk. πορφύρα, purple. β. The orig. sense of Gk. πορφύρεοs, as an epithet of the sea, seems to have been 'troubled' or 'raging,' hence dark, and lastly purple. The sea dark with storms was also called oivow, wine-coloured, wine-dark; apparently from the dark shade of brooding clouds. Hence the etymology is from Gk. πορφύρεων, to grow dark, used of the surging sea; a reduplicated form (=φορ-φύρ-εων = φυρ-φύρ-εων) of Gk. φύρεων, to mix up, mingle, confound, orig. to stir violently. = ✓ BHUR, to move about quickly; whence also Skt. buranya, to be active, Lat. furere, to rage; see Fury.

The A.S. purpur is borrowed palagrave. = O.F. poursuit, press, a letaund extraordinary, to young network, the control of poursuitive.

PURSY, short-winded. (F., - L.) In Shak. Timon, v. 4. 12. Spelt pursy and pursif in Levins. M. E. purcy (for pursy), Prompt. Parv. pursy, shorte-wynded, or stuffed aboute the stomacke, pourcif; palagrave. = O.F. pourcif, in Palsgrave, as just cited; which is a due to confusion with Purl (1). It should surely be pearl, from F. & directly from Latin. So also G. purpur, &c. Der. purple, adj., purple, verb. And see porphyry.

PURPORT, to imply, mean, intend. (F., = L.) In Bacon, Life of Hen. VII, ed. Lumby, p. 146, l. 27. (And prob. a much older word.) = O. F. purporter, pourporter, to intend, whence the sb. purporter, but Requision of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the con port, tenour. F. pur, F. pour, from Lat. pro, according to; and F. porter, to bear, carry, from Lat. portare, to carry. A similar application of F. porter occurs in E. import. See Pur- and Port (1). Der. purport, sb., used by Spenser with the sense of 'disguise,' F. Q. iii. 1. 52, the lit. sense being rather 'declaration' or 'pretext.'

M. E. purposen, Gower, C. A. i. 5, l. 5. - O. F. purposer (Burguy), a variant of proposer, to propose. Thus purpose and propose are doublets; see Propose, which is strictly from Lat. pausare, of Gk. origin, though there has been confusion with Lat. ponere. tinct in origin from Purpose (2), though completely confounded with it in association. Doublet, propose.

PURPOSE (2), intention. (F., - L.) Though from a different origin, this sh. has become altogether associated with the verb to purpose, owing to the extraordinary confusion, in French, of the derivatives of pausare and ponere. M. E. purpos, Chaucer, C. T. 3979; spelt purpos, Rob. of Glouc. p. 121, l. 6. - O. F. pourpos (of which another form would have been purpos), a resolution, design (Roquefort); a variant of F. propos, 'a purpose, drift, end,' Cot. - Lat. propositum, a thing proposed, design, resolution. - Lat. propositus, pp. of proponere, to propose; see Propound. PURSE, a small bag for money. (F., -L., -Gk.) M. E. purs, burs; Prompt. Parv. p. 417. Spelt pors, P. Plowman, A. v. 110. In early use; the pl. porses occurs in the later text of Layamon, l. 5927. -O. F. borse (Burguy), later bourse, 'a purse,' Cot. -Low Lat. bursa, a purse; Ducange. -Gk. βύρση, a hide, skin; of which purses were made. Root unknown.

The change from initial b to p is rare and contrary to the usual change (from a to h): still we find text. and contrary to the usual change (from p to b); still we find peat =(Devoushire) beat, and somewhat similar examples in E. apricot as compared with F. abricot, and mod. PURSUE, to follow after, chase, prosecute. (F.,-L.) M. E. pursuen, Wyclif, John, xv. 20, where the A. V. has persecute; also in P. Plowman, B. xix. 158.—O. F. porsuir, poursuir; mod. F. poursuire, to pursue, prosecute, persecute, Cot. Cotgrave gives the spellings poursuir, poursuyr, and poursuivre.—O. F. pur, por, mod. F. pour, answering to Lat. pro; and sequi, to follow; so that poursuir = Lat. prosequi, to prosecute. See Prosecute; also Pur- and Suc. β. Owing to the confusion between the F. prefixes pour (pro) and par (per), the verb poursuivre also had the sense of persecute; we even find in O. F. (11th cent.) the expression à persuir son apel = to pursue his appeal (Littré). See Persecute. Der. pursu-er, which in Scots law means 'a plaintiff,' lit. a prosecutor. Also pursu-ant, 'following, according, or agreeable to,' Phillips, ed. 1706, formed with the F. pres. part. suffix -ant from O. Formed, with suffix -if (= Lat. -iuus), from O. F. poulser (mod. F. pousser), 'to push,' Cot. Cotgrave also gives the form pousser, which he explains not only by 'to push,' but also by 'to breathe or fetch wind.' = Lat. pulsare, to beat, push; see Push. The word has reference to the pantings or quick pulsations of breath made by a pursy purson. The received of the pulsations also in Dan putter to put which is of similar origin. B. Apparently PURTENANCE, that which belongs to: the intestines of a beast. (F., -L.) In Exod. xii. 9; the usual translation of the same Heb. word being 'inwards.' Spelt pertenaunce in Coverdale's translation. F. apurtenaunse, variant of apartenance (Burguy), from O. F. apartenir, to appertain. Cotgrave has 'appartenance, an appurtenance, an appendant.' β . The variation in the syllable pur, par, is due to the frequent confusion between O. F. pur (Lat. pro), and par (Lat. per). In the present case, the syllable is due to Lat. per. The E. spelling -vey answers to O. F. veier; cf. E. sur-vey. Der. purvey-ance, M. E. porueance, Rob. of Glouc. p. 457, l. 18, from an O. F. form answering to later pourvoyance, 'providence, forecast,' Cot.; and therefore a doublet of providence. Also purvey-or, M. E. purveour, P. Plowman, B. xix. 255, footnote, from an O. F. form answering to later F. pourvoyeur, 'a provider or purveyor,' Cot. Doublet, provide.

pur-is), matter. + Gk. πῦ-ον, matter. + Skt. púya, pus; from púy, to stink. - V PU, to be corrupt, stink; whence also pu-trid, &c. Der. pur-u-lent, from F. purulent, 'mattary, corrupt,' Cot., from Lat. purulentus, full of matter, from the stem pur- and suffix -lentus. Hence

PUSH, to thrust against, urge, drive forward. (F., -L.) M. E. possen, pussen; infin. posse, K. Horn, ed. Lumby, l. 1011; pt. t. puste, K. Horn, ed. Ritson, l. 1079; possed, P. Plowman, B. prol. 151. At a later time puss became push, by change of final double s to sh, as in anguish from anguisse, brush from F. brosse, embellish from F. embelliss., &c. = O. F. pousser, poulser, 'to push, thrust,' Cot. = Lat. pulsare, to beat, strike, thrust; frequentative form of pellere (pp. pulsus), to drive. See Pulse (1), Pulsate. Der. push, sb., Spenser, F. Q. i. 3.35; push-ing; push-pin, L. L. L. iv. 3.169. F.Q. i. 3. 35; push-ing; push-pin, L. L. L. iv. 3. 169. The prov. E. push, a pustule, is prob. from F. poche, with the same sense (Hamilton). See Pouch.

PUSILLANIMOUS, mean-spirited. (L.) 'Womanish and pusillanimous,' Chapman, tr. of Homer, b. i. Commentary, note 7. From Lat. pusillanimus, mean-spirited, by change of -us to -ous, as frequently; the more usual form is pusillanimis. - Lat. pusill-, stem of pusillus, very small; and animus, mind, soul. \(\beta\). Pusillus is a dimin. of pusus, small, an adjectival use of sb. pu-sus, a little boy, allied to pu-er, a boy; see Puerile. For Lat. animus, see Animosity. Der. pusillanimous-ly, -ness. Also pusillanimi-i-ty, M. E. pusillanimitee, Gower, C. A. ii. 12, from F. pusillanimité = Lat. acc. pusillanimitatem. PUSS, a cat, a hare. (E.) Spelt pusse in Minsheu, ed. 1627. This may be called an E. word, though it is widely spread. Prob. initative, from the sound made by a cat spitting (Wedgwood). So also Du. poes, Low G. puus, puus-katte, a puss, puss-cat; Swed. dial. pus, a cat (Rietz), &c.; Irish and Gael. pus, a cat.

β. That the word is imitative, appears from its occurrence in Tamil. 'Pusei, a cat, esp. in the S. Tamil idiom. In the Cashgar dialect of the Affghan, pusha signifies a cat;' Caldwell, Comp. Grammar of Draviding Languages. dian Languages, p. 465; cited in N. and Q. 3 S. ix. 288. Lithuan. puz, a word to call a cat.

PUSTULE, a small pimple. (F.,-L.) 'A pustule, wheale, or blister;' Minsheu, ed. 1627.-F. pustule, 'a push, blain, wheale, small blister;' Cot.-Lat. pustula, longer form of pusula, a blister, pimple. Allied to Lith. puslö, a bladder, pimple; pússi (1 pers. sing. puttu), to blow; Gk. φυσαλίς, φύσκη, a bladder, pustule, φυσάω, I blow, ψύχω, I blow, Skt. pupphusa, phupphusa, the lungs; all from SPU, to blow, puff, breathe hard. Hence also Dan. puss, to swell up, puste, to blow, puff; and see Psychichal. The root SPU is obviously of imitative origin. ¶ Note that pustule has nothing to do with pus, with which it is associated by Richardson, and even in Der. pustul-ous, pustul-ate, pustul-ar.

PUT, to push, thrust, cast, set, lay, place, &c. (C.) M. E. putten, & solder of mettall; 'id.

origin.—Gael. put, to push, thrust; W. puno, to push, to poke; Corn. poot, to kick like a horse. The orig. scnse seems to have been to push, cast, cf. 'to put a stone;' the sense of laying or placing occurs also in Dan. putte, to put, which is of similar origin. B. Apparently a collateral form with Gael. pue, to push, jostle; cf. Irish poe, a blow, kick; Corn. poe, a push, shove; see Poke (2). Stratmann further cites Brct. pouta, bouta, to push, but I cannot find the word in Legonidec's Dict. Diez derives F. bouter, to thrust, from M.H.G. hózan. to beat. see Butt. (1): it would seem simpler to suppose bouter bózen, to beat, see Butt (1); it would seem simpler to suppose bouter to be from the same Celtic source as E. put. In that case, E. butt (1) is also of Celtic origin, which would further affect the origin of buttock, button, and abut. Der. pott-er, verb, q. v.

PUTATIVE, reputed, supposed. (F., -L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627.
-F. putatif, 'putative,' Cot. - Lat. putativus, imaginary, presumptive. Formed with suffix -iuus from Lat. putatus, pp. of putare, to think, suppose; for which see Compute.

PUTREFY, to make or become corrupt. (F., -L.) 'Grosse meate... makyth putrifyed matter;' Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 1. 'Apt to receive putrifaction;' id. b. ii. c. 1. (The spelling with i was prob. due to confusion with putrid.) - F. putrefier, 'to putrifie,' Cot. Formed by analogy with other verbs in -fier as if from Lat. putrificare*; but the true Lat. forms are putrefacere, to make putrid; and putrefieri, to become putrid.—Lat. putre-, as seen in putrere, to be rotten, with which cf. puter, putris, rotten; and facere, to make, or fieri, to become. See Putrid. Der. putrefact-ion, from F. putrefaction = Lat. acc. putrefactionem*, not in White's Dict., but regularly formed from the pp. putrefactus. Also putrefact-ive. Also putrescent, becoming putrid, from Lat. putrescent, stem of pres. part.

PUTRID, stinking, rotten, corrupt. (F., -L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674; and in Cotgrave. - F. putride, 'putride,' Cot. - Lat. putridus, putrid. Extended from Lat. putri-, crude form of put-er, put-ris, rotten; allied to putrere, to be rotten. Formed (with suffix -ra) from out-ere, to stink; from VPU, to stink. Cf. Skt. púy, to stink; see Pus and Foul.

PUTTOCK, a kite, kind of hawk. (F., -L.; and E.) In Shak. Cymb. i. I. 140; see Narcs and Palsgrave. Just as a sparrow-hawk is named from sparrows, I suppose that the puttock is named from the poots or pouts, i. e. small birds on which it preys. 'Poot, a chicken, or pullet, Cheshire' (Halliwell); and again, 'Pout, the young of a or punet, Chesture (Hallwell); and again, Pout, the young of a pheasant; Florio, s. v. fasanello, has a pheasant-pout; id. β. Pout stands for poult = pullet; the Gael. put, the young of moor-fowl, a young grouse, is merely from Lowland Sc. pout, a young partridge or moor-fowl; see Jamieson, and see Poult.

γ. The suffix -ock may be the usual E. dimin. suffix -ock, used adjectivally, or, if we should suppose puttock to be a corruption of poot-hawk, this is not a violent nor unlikely change.

PUTTY, an oxide of tin, or lead and tin, for polishing glass; more commonly a cement of whiting and oil, for windows. (F, -C.) 'Putty, a powder made of calcin'd tin;' Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674. 'Putty, pottain, and pot-brass... seem all to mean the same thing;' Rich. Dict.; this opinion is supported by extracts from Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xxxiv. c. 9, and Boyle, Works, i. 721. Pliny explains that in brass-founding, it was often found desirable to add to the ore collectaneum, i.e. bits of old vessels, called by Holland 'pottain or old metall,' or ollaria, called by Holland 'pot-brasse;' shewing that pottain simply means the metal of old pots. Similarly, putty simply means potty, or belonging to old pots. Similarly, putty simply means tory of the word rather than in its etymology. The old sense of it was 'powder made of calcin'd tin,' as in Blount, resembling what is now called putty powder. Putty powder, a pulverised oxide of tin sometimes mixed with oxide of lead; extensively used in glass and marble works, and the best kinds are used for polishing plate; Weale's Dict. of Terms used in the Arts. 4th ed. 1873. The same work tells us that putty is 'composed of whiting and linseed oil, with or without white lead.' It thus appears that the successive senses are (1) calcin'd tin or oxide of tin, (2) oxide of lead, (3) white lead, (4) a preparation containing white lead, the name being continued even after the white lead was omitted. The result is that the mixture now called putty is remarkable for frequently containing nothing that could be called putty in the older sense. Y. This once perceived, could be called putty in the older sense. Y. This once perceived, the etymology is easy. O. F. potée, 'brasse, copper, tin, pewter, &c., burnt or calcinated; also, a pot-full of anything;' Cot. The mod. F. potée means 'putty,' shewing a similar change of meaning. 'Potée d'étain, tin-putty;' Hamilton. The mod. F. potée also means (as formerly), a potful. Cf. also O. F. pottein, 'broken pieces of metall, or of old vessels, mingled one with another;' Cot. Also O. F. pottin, β. Potee is formed with suffix -ée (= Lat.

PUZZIE, a difficult question, embarrassment, problem, perplexity. (F., -L. and Gk.) As a verb in Shak. Hamlet, iii. 1. 80; and it was prob. regarded as a frequentative form of pose, with suffix -le. But this was not at all the way in which the word arose; and, in fact, the suffix -le is not usually added to words of F. origin. It was orig. a sb., and stands for opposal, which is used in the ordinary sense of opposition in Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 81 (R.) It has sense of 'opposition' in Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 81 (R.) It has been shewn, s. v. Pose, that pose is short for appose, which again is a corruption of oppose. From the F. opposer was formed M. E. opposaile, a question for solution; whence mod. E. puzzle. 'And to pouert she put this opposayle' [question], Lydgate, Fall of Princes, ed. Wayland, sig. B. iii, leaf lxvi; cited in Dyce's Skelton, ii. 304. Hence corruptly, apposaile. 'Made vnto her this vncouth apposayle, Why wepe so?' id., sig. B. v, leaf exxviii (Dyce). 'Madame, your apposelle is wele inferrid,' i. e. your question is well put; Skelton, Garl. of Laurel, l. 141; where the MS. copy has opposelle (Dyce). The M. E. opposaile seems to have been a coined word, like deni-al, refus-al. &c. The loss of the first syllable is due to the loss of the refus-al, &c. The loss of the first syllable is due to the loss of the same in pose. For the etymology, see Oppose, Pose. Der. puzzle, verb.

PYGMY, a very diminutive person or thing. (F., -L., - Gk.) M. E. pigmey, Trevisa, i. 11, 1, 7. - F. pygme, adj., 'dwarfie, short, low, of a small stature;' Cot. - Lat. pygmæus, adj., dwarfish, pygmy-like; from pl. Pymæi, the race of Pygmies, - Gk. B. The Gk. πύλη is perhaps allied to Gk. πύρος, a way, passage through, from γ PAR, to fare, whence also Lat. porta, a gate; see Fare. γ. The Gk. οδρος is from δρο-μαι (= Γύρομαι), I heed, guard, from γWAR, to guard; see Wary. Der. pylor-ic.

PYRAMID, a solid figure with triangular sides meeting in an ever worse triangular scarge or polygogal base. (I — Ch.) The apex, upon a triangular, square, or polygonal base. (L., -Gk.) The word was rather taken directly from the Latin than from the French. Thus Shak, has the sing pyramis, 1 Hen, VI, i. 6. 21; pl. pyramides (four syllables), Antony, v. 2. 61; as well as pyramid, Mach. iv. 1. 57. Cotgrave strangely translates F. piramide by 'a pyramides.' — Lat. pyramid, stem of pyramis. — Gk. πυραμίε (gen. πυραμίδου), a pyramide Poot μπρομένου, το deuble of Figurities σχίτιος. pyramid. Root unknown; no doubt of Egyptian origin.

PYROTECHNIC, pertaining to fireworks. (Gk.) Pyrotechnick, adj., and pyrotechny are given in Phillips, ed. 1706. Coined from Gk. πυρο-, used in compounds in place of the crude form of πυρ, fire, cognate with E. fire; and τεχνικόs, artistic, technical, from τέχνη, an art, craft. See Fire and Technical. Der. pyrotechnic-s, pyro-techny (short for pyrotechnic art); pyro-technist. So also pyro-meter, a fire-measurer (see Metre); pyro-gen-ous, produced by fire, from Gk. base $\gamma \epsilon \nu$, to produce (see Genus).

PYX, the sacred box in which the host is kept after consecration; at the mint, the box containing sample coins. (L., -Gk.) Spelt pine in Minsheu, ed. 1627. Abbreviated from Lat. pyxis, a box. -Gk. nvfls, a box; so called because orig. made of box-wood. -Gk. πύξος, box-wood; so called from its dense, close grain. - Gk. πύκ-νος, dense; from γ PAK, to fasten, make firm; see Pact. QUADRILLE, 1. the name of a game at cards; 2. the name of a dance. (F., -Span., -L.) The name of the dance is late; it is added by Todd to Johnson; so called because danced by 4 persons, or by sets of four. Not improbably suggested by the game at cards, which was a game for 4 persons with 40 cards; see Pope, Moral Essays, iii. 76; Sat. i. 38.

B. I dissent from Littre's arrangement of the F. word quadrille; he gives quadrille (1), fem. a troop of horses for a tournament; also mase. a dance. And again, quadrille (2), mase. a game at cards. Obviously the right arrangement is: quadrille (1), fem. a troop of horses; and quadrille (2), mase. a game at cards, a dance. This brings the genders together, and accords with chronology.

7. And it makes a difference; for quadrills, fem., is of Italian origin, from Ital. quadriglia, short for O. Ital. squadriglia, 'a route, a troop, a crue, a band of men.' Florio; which is connected with Squadron, q. v.

The true form is quach (ch as in German), meaning to drink out of a quach or cup, called quaich, quech, or queff in Lowland Scotch; see quaich in Jamieson. 'I quanght, I drink all out;' Palsgrave. Thus to quaff is to cup; 'Cup us till the world go round;' Antony, ii. 7.

The spelling is not quite exact, it should rather have been queel or queal; but it was prob. affected by some confusion with the word quaile, to curdle, used of milk; for which see Prompt. Parv. p. 418, and Way's note. We also find confusion between quail, to die, and quell, to kill, as in 'to quait and shake the orb,' Antony, v. 2.85. Cf. Devonshire queal, to faint away; Halliwell.] M. E. quelen, to die; not common. A strong verb, with pt. t. qual, pl. quelen; the pl. quelen = they died, occurs 10 times in Layamon, Il. 31825 to 31834. 'Men quela' on hungre' = men die of hunger, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, i. 111, l. 10. - A. S. cwelan, to die, in comp. dewelan, to die utterly, Exod. vii. 18. + Du. quelen, to pine away. + O. H. G. quelan, to suffer torment.

B. From a Teut. base KWAL, to suffer torment or pain, to choke; whence also A. S. cwalu, destruction (Grein), Icel. kvöl, Dan. and Swed. qval, G. qual, torment, agony; cognate with Lithuan. géla, torment, anguish. Fick, iii. 54. So also M. E. querken, to choke, is from the equivalent base KWAR. Der. quell, q.v., qualm, q. v. The M. E. quailen, to curdle, coagulate, is from O. F. coniller, later cailler, to curdle (see Littré); from Lat. coagulare; see Coagulate.

QUAIL (2), a migratory bird. (F.,—Low Lat.,—Low G.) M. E. quaille, Chaucer, C. T. 9082; quayle, Wright's Vocab. i. 177, l. 13.—O. F. quaille (13th cent., Littré), mod. F. caille. Cf. QUAINT, neat, odd, whimsical. (F.,—L.) M. E. queint, Chaucer, C. T. 10553; commonly with the sense of 'famous, excellent.' Also spelt quoynt, Rob. of Glouc. p. 72, l. 18; p. 157, l. 14. Also cwoint, Ancren Riwle, p. 140, l. 21; coint, coynt, Will. of Palerne, 653, 1981; koynt, 4090. — O. F. coint, 'quaint, compt, neat, fine, spruce, brisk, trim;' Cot. Cf. Ital. conto, 'known, noted, counted;' Florio. Certainly derived from Lat. cognitus, known, well-known, famous; though confused (more in F. than in E.) with Lat. comptus, neat, adorned, pp. of comere, to arrange, adorn.

B. Cognitus is used as the pp. of cognoscere, to know, and is compounded of co- (for com = cum, with) and gnitus (for gnitus = gnitus), known, used as pp. of gnoscere, noscere, to know; see Cognition.

y. I may add that Lat.

meant famous, remarkable, curious, strange, &c. Der. quaint-ly, quain!-ness, ac-quaint.

QUAKE, to shake, tremble. (E.) M. E. quaken, Chaucer, C. T. 11172; earlier cwakien, Ancren Riwle, p. 116, l. 20. — A. S. cwacian, to quake; Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, b. ii. c. 6. § 3. Cf. A. S. cwecton, to wag, Mark, xv. 29. β. The orig, sense is 'to give life to,' to set in motion; the verb being derived from a base KWAK, allied to KWIK, alive; see Quick. The author of P. Plowman has the the right idea when, in describing an earth-quake, he says that the earth 'quook [quaked] as hit quyke were,' i. e. as if it were alive, P. Pl. C. xxi. 64. Der. quak-er, q. v.

QUAKER, one of the Society of Friends. (E.) called Seekers, from their seeking the truth, afterward Friends. Justice Bennet, of Derby, gave the Society the name of Quakers in 1650, because G. Fox (the founder) admonished him, and those present, to quake at the word of the Lord; Haydn, Dict. of Dates. Others take Quaker, like Shaker, to be a name given in derision, from the quaking which is supposed to exhibit their enthusiasm. Either way, the etym. is the same; see Quake. Der. Quaker-ism.

QUALIFY, to render suitable, limit, abate. (F., - L.) Frequent in Shak. Meas. i. 1. 66, &c.; and in Levins. - F. qualifier, 'to qualifie; Cot. - Low Lat. qualificare, to endue with a quality. - Lat. quali-, crude form of qualis, of what sort; and fic-, for fuc-ere, to make. See Quality and Fact. Der. qualific-at-ion, due to Low Lat. qualificat-us, pp. of qualificare.

QUALITY, property, condition, sort, title. (F., - L.) M. E. qualite, qualitee, Ayenbite of lnwyt, p. 153. l. 11. - F. qualité, 'a quality;' Cot. - Lat. qualitatem, acc. of qualitats, sort, kind. - Lat. quali-, crude form of qualis, of what sort, cognate with E. Which, q. v. Der. qualit-at-ive, a coined word.

S. cwealm (for cwalm), pestilence, Luke, xxi. 11. + Du. kwalm, only in the sense 'thick vapour,' from its suffocating properties. + Dan. qvalm, suffocating air; qvalme, qualm, nausea. + Swed. qualm, sultriness. + G. qualm, vapour.

QUANDARY, an evil plight. (Scand.) In Beaum, and Fletcher,

This environs Knight of the Burning Pestle, Act i. sc. 1 (Humphrey). This curious word is almost certainly a corruption of the M. E. wandreth, wandrethe, used in just the same sense of evil plight, peril, adversity. The use of qu for w is not confined to this word; we find such spellings as squete for swete (sweet), squilke for swilke (such); Cursor Mundi, 76, 372; and the confusion of quh, wh, qu, and w, at the beginning of words is well known. Thus Halliwell gives quarof for whereof; and quhar for whar (where) is the usual Scottish form, whilst the same word is also written war or wer.

B. Examples are: welthe or wandreth' = prosperity or adversity; Religious Pieces, ed. Perry, E. E. T. S., p. 11, l. 5. 'Al thair wandreth and their wrake' = all their perplexity and misery; Spec. of English, ed. Morris and Skeat, p. 91, l. 59. So also wondrede, Ancren Riwle, p. 214, l. 2, p. 310, l. 25, p. 362, l. 19; &c. Spelt wondrade, Hali Meidenhad, ed. Cockayne, p. 9, l. 5; see further in Cockayne's note to St. Margaret, p.112. - Icel. vandræði; difficulty, trouble. - Icel. vand-r, difficult; with suffix -rædi = E. -red in kind-red, hat-red. Allied to vanda, to elaborate; from vann, pt. t. of vinna, to toil; see Win. + O. Swed. wandräde, difficulty; from wand, difficult, and the like suffix. Thre gives an example in O. Swedish: 'Ther eigh äru i wandrædom' = who are not in peril, i.e. who are not in a quandary.

QUANTITY, size, bulk, large portion. (F., -L.) M. E. quantite, quantitee; Chaucer, C. T. 4662. - F. quantité, 'quantity;' Lat. quantitatem, acc. of quantitas, quantity. - Lat. quanti-, for quanto-, crude form of quantus, how much; with suffix -tas. B. Quantus is cognate with Gk. πύσος (lonic κύσος), how much, from the base KA, who, what; see Who. Der. quantit-at-ive.

QUARANTINE, a space of forty days. (F., -L.) Spelt quarentine in Minsheu, who gives it the old legal sense, viz. a space of forty days during which a widow might dwell unmolested in her husband's house after his decease. Blount gives this form and sense, and derives it from O. F. quarantine. He also gives quarantain, meaning (1) Lent, (2) a forty days' truce or indulgence, (3) 'the forty days which a merchant, coming from an infected port, stays on shipboard for clearing himself; 'the last sense being the usual one in mod. E. -O. F. quarantine (Roquefort), usually quarantaine, 'Lent, a term of forty days, &cc.; Cot. - Low Lat. quarantina*, quarantana*, quarentena* (all of which prob. were in use, though Ducange only mentions quarantenum), a space of forty days, formed as if from quaranta*, forty, answering to F. quarante; this quaranta being nothing but a comere = co-imere, comp. of co- (= com = cum), and emere, to take + shortened form of Lat. quadraginta, forty. See Quadragesima.

keepe fortie daies from company, namely if one come from infected places, as they vae in Italy; Florio. Thus the mod. sense seems to be of Ital. origin.

QUARREL (1), a dispute, brawl. (F., - L.) It should rather be querrel, but has been assimilated in spelling to the word below. M. E. querele (with one r), Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. iii. pr. 3, l. 1932. O. F. querele, later querelle, 'a quarrel;' Cot. (He gives both forms.) - Lat. querela, a complaint. - Lat. queri, to complain, lament. See Querulous. Der. quarrel, verb, Romeo, i. 1. 39, 59, &c.; quarrel-er; quarrel-some, As You Like It, v. 4. 85; quarrel-some-ness; quarrel-ous, Cymb. iii. 4. 162.

QUARREL (2), a square-headed cross-bow bolt. (F.,-L.) Obsolete. In Spenser, F.Q. ii. 11. 24. M. E. quarel, King Alisaunder, ed. Weber, 1594, 2781.—O. F. quarrel, later quarren, 'a diamond at cardes, a square tile, a quarrell or boult for a crossebow;' Cot. Mod. F. carreau. - Low Lat. quadrellum, acc. of quadrellus, a quarrel, a square tile. - Lat. quadr-us, square; with dimin. suffix. See Quadrant.

QUARRY (1), a place where stones are dug, esp. for building purposes. (F., -L.) In Shak. Oth. i. 3. 141. The proper sense is a place where stones are squared for building purposes; hence, a place where stones are procured which are afterwards squared for building; lastly, a place where stones are dug, without any reference to squar ing. Again, the proper form should be quarrer, but it was altered to quarry; perhaps by confusion with quarry, sometimes used as a to quarry; perhaps by confusion with quarry, sometimes used as a variant of quarrel, a square pane of glass (Halliwell). M. E. quarrere, quarrer, Will. of Palerne, 2231, 2281, 2319, 4692; spelt quarere, quarrer, quarry, quar in Prompt. Parv.—O. F. quarriere, 'a quarry of stone;' Cot. Mod. F. carrière.—Low Lat. quadraira, a quarry for squared stones.—Lat. quadrare, to square.—Lat. quadravs, square; see Quadrant. ¶ The sense was suggested by Lat. quadratarius, a stone-squarer, a stone-cutter; from the same source. Der. quarry, who carriers were according to the control of the same source. vb., quarry-m.m, quarri-er.

QUARRY (2), a heap of slaughtered game. (F., -L.) In Shak.

Cor. i. 1. 202; Haml. v. 2. 375. M. E. querré, Sir Gawain and the Grene Knight, 1324. Corrupted from O. F. coree, curee, the intestines of a slain animal (Burguy); the part which was given to the hounds. Cotgrave has: 'Curée, a dogs reward, the hounds fees of, or part in, the game they have killed;' also: 'Corée, a swines gullet, or a hogs haslet.'=Low Lat. corata, the intestines of a slain animal. Cf. O. Ital. corada, 'the plucke, hasselet, or midriff of any beast;' Florio. β. It was a general term for the inwards of the slain animal, and so called from containing the heart.—Lat. cor, the heart; cognate with E. Heart, q. v. ¶ The change of spelling from initial c to qu is easily illustrated by the use of O. F. quer, cuer, the heart

(Burguy). QUART, the fourth part of a gallon (F.,-L.) M. E. quart, quarte, Chaucer, C. T. 651. - F. quarte, 'a French quarte, almost our pottle; 'Cot. = Lat. quarta (i. e. pars), a fourth part; fem. of quartus, fourth. Apparently short for quatur-tus*; from Lat. quatuor, cognate with E. Four, q. v. Der. quart-an, quart-er, quart-ern, quart-ette, Der. quart-an, quart-er, quart-ern, quart-ette, QUARTAN, recurring on the fourth day. (F., -L.) Said of an ague or fever. 'Quartene, fevyr, Quartana;' Prompt. Parv. - F. quartaine, quartan, only used of a fever; in use in the 13th cent.; Littré. -Lat. quartana (febris), a quartan fever; fem. of quartanus, belonging to the fourth; formed with suffix -anus from quart-us,

F. quarteron, a quarter of a pound, also a quarterne; Cot.—Low Lat. quarteronem, acc. of quartero, a fourth part of a pound; extended from Low Lat. quarter-us, which from quartus; see Quarter.

QUARTET, QUARTETTE, a musical composition of four parts. (Ital., -L.) Modern; the spelling quartette is F., but the word is really Italian. - Ital. quartetto, a dimin. form from quarto, fourth;

see Quart, Duet.

QUARTO, having the sheet folded into four leaves. (L.) In Johnson. The word is due to the Lat. phr. in quarto, i.e. in a fourth part of the orig. size; where quarto is the abl. case of quartus, fourth; see Quart. And see Folio. Der. quarto, sb. QUARTZ, a mineral composed of silica. (G.) Added by Todd to QUASH, to crush, annihilate, annul. (F.,-L.) M. E. quaschen; QUASH, to crush, annihilate, annul. (F.,-L.) M. E. quaschen; see 'Quaschyn, quasso' in Prompt. Parv. Properly transitive; but used intransitively in P. Plowman, C. xxi. 64. And see Owl and Nightingale, 1388.—O. F. quasser, later casser, 'to breake, ... quash asunder;' Cot. (He gives both spellings.)—Lat. quassare, to shatter; frequentative of quatere (supine quassam), to shake. Root uncertain.

The O. F. quasser also means 'to abrogate, annul' (Cot.), as in E. to quash an indictment.' The slight likeness to A. S. cwisan, to break, is accidental; see Quessy. Der. (from Lat. quatere) casque, and discress ther cussion. cask. con-cuss-ion, dis-cuss, per-cuss-ion.

QUASSIA, a South-American tree. (Personal name.) Added by Todd to Johnson. Botanical names in -ia are formed by adding the Lat suffix ia to a personal name, as in dahl-ia, fuch-ia. Quassia was named by Linnaus after a negro named Quassi, who first pointed out the use of the hark as a tonic and who was alive in 1755. A negro named Daddy Quashi is mentioned in Waterton's Wanderings in S. America, Journies 3 and 4. Waterton also quotes a Barbadoes song in Journey 4, cap. ii: 'Quasti scrapes the fiddle-string, And Venus plays the flute;' these lines are altered from the finale to G. Colman's Inkle and Yarico. Quassi is, in fact, quite a common negro name.

See Notes and Queries, 6 S. i. 10, 141, 166.

QUATERNARY, consisting of fours. (F., -L.) Rare; see exx. in Richardson. - F. quaternaire, 'every fourth day;' Cot. - Lat. quaternarius, consisting of four each. - Lat. quaterni, pl., four at a QUATRAIN, a stanza of four lines. (F., -L.) Used by Dryden, in his letter to Sir R. Howard, prefixed to Annus Mirabilis, which is written in quatrains. - F. quatrain, 'a staffe or stanzo of 4 verses; Cot. Formed with suffix -ain (Lat. -anus) from F. quatre = Lat. quatuor, four. See Four.

QUAVER, to shake, to speak or sing tremulously. (E.) In Levins; and in Minsheu, ed. 1627. It is the frequentative form, with suffix -er, of quave. M. E. quaven (with u=v), to tremble; Prompt. Parv. And see P. Plowman, B. xviii. 61. It first occurs as a various reading in St. Marharete, ed. Cockayne, p. 48, l. 3 from bottom. Allied to Low G. quabbeln, to tremble (Brem. Wort.), Dan. dial. kveppa, to be shaken (Aasen). Also to M. E. quappen, to palpitate, Chaucer, Troil. iii. 57, Legend of Good Women, 865. B. QUAY, a wharf for vessels. (F., -C.) Spelt quay and kay in Phillips, ed. 1706; key in Cotgrave; keie in Minsheu, ed. 1627. M. E. key, spelt keye, Eng. Gilds, ed. Toulmin Smith, p. 374, l. 23; and see Prompt. Parv. – O.F. quay (F. quai), 'the key of a haven;' Cot. The orig. sense is 'enclosure,' a space set apart for unlouding goods. Of Celtic origin. – Bret. kaé, an enclosure; W. cae, an enclosure, hedge, field, of which the old spelling was cai (Rhys). ¶ Spel confuses it with E. key, for which there appears to be no reason.

QUEAN, a contemptible woman, a hussy. (E.) In Shak. Merry Wives, iv. 2. 180. Absolutely the same word as queen; the orig, sense being 'woman.' The difference in spelling is unoriginal, but may have marked some variation of pronunciation. The best passage to illustrate this word is in P. Plowman, C. ix. 46, where the author says that in the grave all are alike; you cannot there tell a knight from a knave, or a queen from a queen. The MSS have queyne, queene, queene, in the former case, and queene, quene, in the latter; i.e. they make no distinction, none being possible. See Queen QUEASY, sickly, squeamish, causing or feeling nausea. (Scand.) 'His queasy stomach;' Much Ado, ii. 1. 399. 'A queysy mete; Skelton, Magnificence, 2205. 'Quaisy as meate or drinke is, dangereus;' Palsgrave. Quaysy is used as a sb., in the sense of 'nausea,' in Polit., Religious, and Love Poems, ed. Furnivall, p. 215, l. 22. Cf. Swed. kväsa, to bruise, wound; A.S. tôcwisan, to crush, Sweet's A.S. Reader.

B. The orig. sense appears to be 'sore,' as if from a wound or bruise. Allied to Goth. kwistjan, to destroy; perhaps to Skt. ji, to overpower; Fick, iii. 55; i. 570. Der. queasi-ness, 2 Hen.

QUEEN, a woman, a female sovereign. (E.) M. E. queen, queene;

P. Plowman, C. ix. 46. – A. S. cwén (common). + Du. kween, a barren Johnson. - G. quarz, rock-crystal; the G. z being sounded as ts. woman, barren cow (cf. E. quean as a term of contempt). + Icel.

+ Swed. quinna, a female; kona, a quean, strumpet. + Goth. kwens, kweins, a woman, wife; also kwino. + M. H. G. kone, O. H. G. quenú, a woman. + Gk. γυνή. + Russ. jend (with j as in French), a wife. + Skt. jáni, used in the latter part of compound adjectives; jani, a wife. β. All from ✓ GAN, to produce; cf. Goth. keinan, to germinate; see Curtius, and Fick, iii. 30. See Gonus, Kin. Der. queen-ly, queen-mother. Doublet, quean.

QUEER, strange, odd. (O. Low G.) 'A queer fellow;' Spectator (in Todd; no reference). A cant word; and prob. introduced rather from Low than High German.—Low G. queer, across; quere, obliquity. In Awdeley's Fraternity of Vagabonds, ed. Furnivall, p. 4, a quire fellow' is one who has just come out of prison; cf. the slang phrase 'to be in queer street;' and Low G. in der quere liggen, to lie across, lie queerly. + G. quer, transverse; querkopf, a queer fellow.

Prob. allied to the curious Lat. uarus, crooked; see Prevaricate. Der. queer-ly, queer-ness.

QUELL, to crush, subdue, allay. (E.) The causal of quail. M. E. quellen, to kill; Chaucer, C. T. 12788. - A. S. cwellan, to kill, M. E. quellen, to kill; Chaucer, C. T. 12788.—A. S. cweuan, to kill, Grein, i. 174. + O. Sax. quellian, to torment; causal of quelan, to suffer martyrdom; Du. kwellen, to plague, vex. + Icel. kvelja, to torment. + Swed. qvälja, to torment. + Dan. qvæle, to strangle, choke; to plague, torment.

β. The orig. sense was probably 'to choke;' from the primitive KWAL; for which see Quail(1). ¶ Frequently said to be a doublet of kill, but the evidence is strongly against this said to be a doublet of kill, but the evidence is strongly against this unlikely identification; the two words have different vowel-sounds, and have nothing but the final ll in common. The sense of quell is 'to choke,' to torture; that of kill, to 'knock on the head."

QUENCH, to extinguish, check, put out. (E.) M. E. quenchen, Wyclif, Matt. iii. 12. Quench is formed from an obsolete verb quink, to be put out, to be extinguished; just as drench is from drink. - A. S. cwencan, in the comp. acwencan, to extinguish utterly, Mark, ix. 44. Causal of A.S. cwincan; the pt. t. d-cwanc (= was extinguished) occurs in a various reading in Ælfred, tr. of Beda, b. ii. c. 9, ed. Wheelock. β. Further, the verb cwincan is an extension of a shorter form cwinan, to be extinguished (which is a strong verb, with pt. t. cwin, pp. cwinen); hence 'oxt fyr acwinen was and adwasced' = the fire was put out and extinguished; Beda, ii. 9 (as above). Cf. O. Fries. kwinka, to be extinguished. Perhaps allied to Skt. ji, to overpower; Fick, i. 570. Der. quench-able, -le-s.

QUERIMONIOUS, fretful, discontented. (L.) 'Most querimoniously confessing;' Denham, A Dialogue (R.) Formed with suffix -ous (= F. -eux, Lat. -ossus) from querimônia, a complaint.—Lat. queri, to complain; with Aryan suffixes -man-ya. See Querulous. Der. querimonious-ly, -ness.

QUERN, a handmill for grinding grain. (E.) M. E. querne, Chaucer, C. T. 14080.—A.S. cweorn, cwyrn, Matt. xxiv. 41. + Du. kweern. + Icel. kvern. + Dan. qværn. + Swed. qvarn. + Goth. kwairnus. Cf. Gk. γῦρις, fine meal. Orig. 'that which grinds.'—

QUERULOUS, fretful. (L.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. Englished from Lat. querulus, full of complaints.—Lat. queri, to complaints.—Lat. queri, to complaints.—Lat. queri, to complaints.—Skt. queri. The pt. t. questus sum points to an older form quest. + Skt. quas, to pant, to hiss, to sigh. - KWAS, to wheeze; whence also E. Whoeze, q. v. Evidently of imitative origin. Der. querulous-ly,

B. Quærere is for quæsere (=quai-sere); cf.

F. quête.-Lat. quæsita, a thing sought; fem. of quæsitus, pp. of erere, to seek; see Query.

QUESTION, an inquiry. (F., - L.) M. E. questioun, Wyclif, John, iii. 25. - F. question. - Lat. questionem, acc. of questio, a seeking, a question; formed with suffix -tio from ques-, base of ques-ere, old a question; formed with sumx -to from quæs-, base of quæs-ere, old form of quærre, to seek; see Query. Der. question, verb, Hamlet, ii. 2. 244; question-able, id. i. 4. 43; question-able, question-able, id. i. 1. 176; question-able, question-able, old clevins). Also questor (Levins), from Lat. quæstor; questor-ship (id.).

QUIBBLE, an evasion, shift. (C.) 'This is some trick; come. leave your quiblins, Dorothy; Ben Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 4 (Face, & is not in ed. 1598] the O. Ital. quilibetto, 'a quidlibet.' And Cotgrave kván, a wise; kona, a woman. + Dan. qvinde, a woman; kone, a wise. & to Dol). A dimin. of quib, with suffix -le. 'Quib, a taunt or mock,' Coles (Halliwell); but the word is not in ed. 1684 of Coles Dict. However, quib is merely a weakened form of quip, and quibble= quipple, a slight quip or taunt, hence an evasive remark. See Quip, which appears to be of Celtic origin.

β. The peculiar sense of evasion is prob. due to some confusion with quiddity and quillet; see those words. Der. quibble, verb; quibbl-er.

QUICK, living, moving, lively. (E.) M. E. quik, Chaucer, C. T.
1017.—A. S. ewic, sometimes cuc, Grein, i. 175. + Du. kwik. + Icel. kvikr, kykr. + Dan. qvik. + Swed. qvick. + Prov. G. queck, quick, quick, lively (Flügel). β. All from a Teut. base KWIKA, lively, which took the place of an older form KWIWA; this older form occurs in Goth. kwius, living, cognate with Lat. uiuus, Lith.
gywas, Russ. jivoi, alive, living.— of GIW (GIU, GIV), to live; whence Skt. jiv, to live, Lat. uiuere, and Gk. βίοs, life. See Vivid.
Der. quick, sb., quick-ly, quick-ness; quick-lime; quick-sand, 3 Hen. VI, v. 4. 26, quick-silver, Chaucer, C. T. 16240; quick-set, i. e. set or planted alive; quick-sighted. And see quick-en.

The prov. E. planted alive; quick-sighted. And see quick-en. ¶ The prov. E. quitch-grass = quick-grass; it is also spelt couch-grass, where couch answers to the occasional A.S. cuc.

QUICKEN, to make alive, (E.) M. E. quikenen, quiknen, Wycliffe, John, vi. 64; Chaucer, C. T. 15949. The true form is quik-nen, and the suffix -nen = Goth. -nan, which was used only to form intransitive verbs; so that the true sense of quiknen is rather 'to become alive,' as in King Lear, iii. 7.39. But this distinction was early lost, and the suffixes -ien, -nen were used as convertible. The Goth, keeps them distinct, having gakwin-jan, to make alive, gakwiu-nan, to become alive. From A.S. cwic, alive; see Quick.

QUID, a mouthful of tobacco. (E.) A Kentish variety of end; Quid, the cud' (Halliwell). See Cud. It occurs in Bailey's

QUIDDITY, a trifling, nicety, cavil. (L.) schools. 'Their predicamentes, . . quidities, hecsetties, and relatives!'
Tyndal, Works, p. 104, col. 1, l. 8 (and in Spec. of Eng., ed. Skeat, p. 176, l. 318). Englished from Low Lat. quidities, the essence or nature of a thing, concerning which we have to investigate what it is (quid est).—Lat. quid, what, neuter of qui, who; see Who.

QUIESCENT, still, at rest. (L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674.
—Lat. quiescent-, stem of pres. part. of quiescere, to be at rest. See

Der. quiescence.

QUIET, still, at rest, tranquil. (L.) 'A quyet and a pesible lijf;' Wycliffe, 1 Tim. ii. 2; where the Vulgate has quietam. [Rather from Lat. than from F.; the F. form is Coy, q. v.]—Lat. quietus, quiet; orig. pp. of quiere*, only used in the inceptive form quiescere, to rest. β. From a base ki-ά, extended from KI, to lie, to rest, whence Skt. qi, to lie still, Gk. κείμαι, I lie still, rest. See Cemetery, Coy. Der. quiet, sb., M. E. quiete, Chaucer, C. T. 9269; quiet, verb, I Hen. VI, iv. I. 115; quiet-ly, quiet-ness; quiet-ude, from the Late Lat quietyde (White) a contraction for quietited.* Also Late Lat. quietudo (White), a contraction for quietitudo *. Also quiet-us, a final settlement; quiet-ism, quiet-ist. From Lat. quiescere we also have ac-quiesce; and see re-quiem, quit, quite, re-quite, ac-quit, dis-quiet. Doublet, coy.

QUILL (1), a feather of a bird, a pen. (F., -O. H.G.) M. E. puille, quylle. 'Quylle, a stalke, Calamus;' Prompt. Parv. Halliwell quille, quylle. gives: Quill, the stalk of a cane or reed, the faucet of a barrel. This is a difficult and doubtful word; it is most likely that the sense of 'faucet' or 'stalk' is an old one, and that the bird's quill was so named from its tapering shape, like that of the conical-shaped peg or pin used in the old game of kails or kayles. - F. quille, 'a keyle, a big peg or pin of wood, used at ninepins or keyles;' Cot. In use in the 15th cent. (Littré.) [A distinct word from F. quille, a keel.] =
O. H. G. kegil (Littré), or chegil (Scheler), mod. G. kegel, a nine-pin, skittle, cone, bobbin. Sec Kails.

B. There may have been skittle, cone, bobbin. See Kails.

B. There may have been some confusion with O. Du. kiel, a wedge (Kilian); cf. G. keil, a wedge, bolt. Mahn refers quill to Irish cuille, a quill (prob. borrowed from E.), or to Irish cuilc, a reed, which is not very likely. y. Any connection with Lat. calamus, a reed, or caulis, a stalk, is out of the question; see Haulm, Cole.

QUILL (2), to pleat a ruff. (F., -O. H. G. or L.) 'What they called his cravat, was a little piece of white linen quilled with great exactness; Tatler, no. 257, Nov. 30, 1710. 1. Supposed to be so called from being folded as if over quills; perhaps the quills used were rounded splinters of wood. See Quill (1). 2. Wedgwood quoies from Métivier the Guernsey word enquiller, to pleat, gather, wrinkle, which Métivier derives from O. F. cuillir, to gather, collect, cull; whence also E. Cull, q.v. I do not know which is right.

QUILLET, a sly trick in argument. (L.) 'His quiddities, his quillets;' Hamlet, v. 1. 108. Certainly a contraction of quidlibet, notwithstanding the assertion of Nares that quodlibet was the [usual] term in the schools. Wedgwood quotes from a late edition of Florio sit quid libet, which do you choose? lit. which pleases you? See Quiddity and Liberal.

M. E. quilte, quylte. 'Quylte of a bedde, Culcitra;' Prompt. Parv.—

O. F. cuilte (12th cent., Littré, s. v. couette), also spelt cotre (Burguy), and courte paging to quilte (F. a. v. couette). and coutre, as in coutrepoincter, to quilt (Cotgrave). - Lat. culcita (also culcitra, giving O. F. cotre), a cushion, mattress, pillow, quilt. Root uncertain. Der. quilt, verb. And see Counterpane (1). QUINARY, consisting of or arranged in fives. (L.) form quinarius, as a sb., is in Phillips, ed. 1706; quinary is in Cudworth's Intellectual System, p. 625 (k.) - Lat. quinarius, arranged by fives. - Lat. quini, pl. adj., five each. Put for quine-ni.*, where quinc = quinque, five, which is cognate with E. Five, q.v. See Quinquagesima.

QUINCE, a fruit with an acid taste. (F., -L., -Gk.) In Romeo, v. 4. 2. Spelt quence in Prompt. Parv. Probably from O. F. coignasse, 'a female quince, or pear-quince, the greatest kind of quince;' Cot. Cf. O.F. coignacier, 'the great, or pear, quince-tree;' id. In any case the word is certainly an extension of quyne = M. E. coine, or coin, a quince, Rom. of the Rose, 1374. 'Quyne-aple tre, coingz;' Palsgrave, p. 914; he also gives quynce, p. 260. – O. F. coin, mod. F. coing, a quince. Cf. Prov. codoing, Ital. cotogna (Littré). The Ital. form (says Littré) is from Lat. cydonia, the Prov. and F. forms from Lat. cydonium. - Gk. κυδωνία, a quince-tree; κυδώνιον μηλον, a quince, lit. a Cydonian apple. - Gk. Κυδωνία, Κυδωνίε, Cydonia, one of the chief cities of Crete, named from the Kubanes (Cydones), See Smith's Classical Dict.

QUINCUNX, an arrangement by fives. (L.) trees, &c., arranged like the five spots on the side of a die marked 5. See Sir T. Browne, Garden of Cyrus, c. 5. § 12.—Lat. quincunx, an arrangement like five spots on a die.—Lat. quinc-, for quinque, five, cognate with E. Five; and uncia, an ounce, hence a small mark, spot on a die; see Ounce (1).

QUININE, extract of Peruvian bark. (F.,-Peruvian.) rowed from F. quinine, an extension (with suffix -ine = Lat. -ina) from F. quina. - Peruvian kina, or kina-kina, which is said to mean 'bark, and is applied to that which we call Peruvian bark. See Cin-

QUINQUAGESIMA, the second Sunday before Lent. (L.) So called because about 50 days before Easter. - Lat. quinquagesima (dies), fiftieth day; fem. of quinquagesimus, fiftieth. - Lat. quinquafor quinque, five; and -gesimus, for -gensimus*, -censimus*, -censimus*, contracted form of de-centimus*, tenth, from decem, ten. See Five QUINQUANGULAR, having five angles. (L.) Formed from quinque, five, just as quadrangular is from quadrus, fourfold. See Quadrangular.

QUINQUIENNIAL, lasting five years, recurring in five years, Formed from quinque, five, and annus, a year; see Biennial. QUINSY, inflammatory sore throat. (F., -Gk.) 'The throtling quinsey; Dryden, Palamon, 1682. A contraction of squinancy, spelt squinancie in Minsheu, ed. 1627. - O.F. squinancie (16th cent., Littré), mod. F. esquinancie. Cot. gives esquinance, the squincy or squinancy, and squinance, 'the squinancy or squinzie.' β. Formed with prefixed s from Gk. κυνάγχη, lit. 'a dog-throttling,' applied to a bad kind of sore throat. – Gk. κυν-, stem of κύων, a dog, cognate with E.

Hound; and άγχ-ειν, to choke, throttle, from ANGH, nasalised form of AGH, to choke; see Awe.

QUINTAIN, a post with arms, set up for beginners in tilting to run at. (F., -L.?) In As You Like It, i. 2. 263. 'When, if neede were, they could at quintain run; Sidney, Arcadia, b. i (Lamon, l. 55). - F. quintaine, a quintane, or whintane, for country youths to run at; Cot. Cf. Prov. quintana, Ital. quintana (Littre). Origin uncertain but we find Low Lat. quintana, a quintain, also a certain measure of land, also a part of a street where carriages could pass (Ducange). β. The form of the word is so explicit that I cannot see why we should hesitate to connect it with Lat. quintana, a street in the camp, which intersected the tents of the two legions in such a way as to separate the fifth maniple from the sixth, and the fifth turma from the sixth; here was the market and business-place of the camp (White). We can hardly doubt that this public place in the camp was sometimes the scene of athletic exercises and trials of skill, whence it is an easy step to the restriction of the term to one particular kind of exhibition of martial activity. It is further certain that quintana is the fem. of quintanus, formed with suffix -anus from quintus, fifth, which is for quinc-tus*, from quinque, five. See Five.

has: 'Quolibet, a quirk, or quiddity;' evidentiy from quodlibet. A bo 'Twelve pence upon euerie quintall of copper;' Hackluyt's Voyages, quidlibet was probably the same as quodlibet, which Wedgwood explains by 'a question in the schools where the person challenged might choose his side.' Quiddity is a word of the same class. — Lat. Arab. qintar, a weight of 100 pounds of twelve ounces each; Rich.

'Aristoteles... hath put down... for elements, foure; and for a fifth, quintessence, the heavenly body which is immutable;' Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 662 (R.) And see The Book of Quinte Essence or the Fifth Being, about A. D. 1460, ed. Furnivall, 1866 (E. E. T. S.) - F. quintessence, 'a quintessence, the vertue, force, or spirit of a thing extracted;' Cot.—Lat. quinta essentia, fifth essence or nature.—Lat. quinta, fem. of quintus (put for quinc-tus*), from quinque, five; see Five. And see Essence. ¶ The idea is older than Aristotle; cf. the five Skt. bhúta's, or elements, which were earth, air, fire, water, and æther. Thus the fifth essence is æther, the most subtle and highest; see Benfey, Skt. Dict. p. 658, col. 1.

QUINTILLION, the fifth power of a million. (L.) Coined from Lat. quint-us, fifth; and -illion, part of the word million; see Quadrillion, Billion.

QUINTUPLE, fivefold. (F., -L.) In Sir T. Browne, Cyrus' Garden, c. 5. § 3. — F. quintuple, in use in the 16th cent. (Littre). — Lat. quintuplus*, a coined word; formed from quintus, fifth, just as duplus is from duo, two. See Quintessence and Double. Der. quintuple, verb.

QUIP, a taunt, cavil. (C.) 'This was a good quip that he gave unto the Jewes;' Latimer, Sermon on Rom. xiii. an. 1552 (R.) Levins has quip in the sense of whip. Like quirk, the word is of Celtic origin. — W. chwip, a quick flirt or turn; cf. chwipyn, a quick turn; chwipio, to whip, to move briskly. Cf. Gael. cuip, to whip. B. From a Celtic base KWIP, answering to Teut. HWIP, to whip.

See Whip. Der. quibb-le, q. v.

QUIRE(1), a collection of so many sheets of paper, often 24. (F., — L.) In the Ancren Riwle, p. 248, last line but 1, we find the curious form ewaer, in the sense of a small book or pamphlet. - O. F. quaier (13th cent., Littré); spelt quayer, cayer, in Colgrave, who explains it 'a quire of written paper, a peece of a written booke.' Mod. F. cahier. β. Of uncertain origin, but probably Latin. Diez derives it from codicarium*, a dimin. form from codic-, stem of codex, a codex, book; see Code. Y. But it is more usually derived from Low Lat. quaternum, a collection of four leaves, a small quire, from Lat. quaterni, nom. pl., four each, which from quatuor, four, cognate with E. Four. We actually find the O. F. quaer as a gloss to Low Lat. quaternus, Wright's Vocab. i. 116; Ital. quaterno, a quire of paper; and the instance of F. enfer from Lat. infernum shews that the suffix -num might easily be lost. ¶ Not from Lat. quaternio, which could never suffer a loss of the latter syllables.

QUIRE (2), a band of singers. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) Another spelling of Choir, q. v. Der. guir-ister (for chorister); Narcs.

QUIRK, a cavil, subtle question. (C.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627.
The orig, sense seems to have been 'a quick turn.' Formed, with a suffix -k (as in stal-k, verb, from steal, and tal-k from tell), from a base quir-. This base is rather Celtic than E., appearing in W. chwiori, to turn briskly, chwyr, strong impulse, chwyrnu, to whir, whiz, hum; whence chwired, a quirk, a piece of craft, chwiredu, to be crafty, to play tricks. Cf. Gael. cuireid, a turn, wile, trick, referred by Macleod to car, to turn.

B. I suspect the word to be really of imitative origin, from a Celtic base KWIR, answering to Teut. HWIR, as seen in E. whir. See Whir. And see Quip. Der quirk-ish.

This word is sometimes derived from queer, but it appears to have been in use much earlier, and therefore could not have been suggested

QUIT, freed, released, discharged from. (F., -L.) In the phr. 'to be quit,' the word is really an adj., though with the force of a pp. The verb to quit is derived from it, not vice versa; as is easily seen by comparing the F. quitter (O. F. quiter), with F. quitte (O. F. quite). In the phrases 'quit rent' and 'quit claim,' the old adjectival use is retained, and it is unnecessary to insert a hyphen, as in writing quitclaim. Moreover, the adj. was introduced into E. before the verb, appearing as cwite in the Ancren Riwle, p. 6, l. 12. Cf. 'Tho was Wyllam our kyng all quyt of thulke fon,' i. c. all free of those foes; Rob. of Glouc. p. 392. [Hence was derived the verb quyten, to satisfy a claim, pay for. 'He mai quiten hire ale' = he will pay for sausiy a claim, pay tor. 'He mai quiten hire ale '=he will pay for her ale, Old Eng. Miscellany, ed. Morris, p. 190, 1.77; and see Chaucer, C. T. 772.] = O. F. quite, 'discharged, quit, freed, released;' Cot. Mod. F. quitte; Span. quito, quit. = Lat. quietum, acc. of quietus, at rest, hence free, satisfied. Thus quit is a shorter form of quiet. See Quiet. Der. quit, verb, from O. F. quiter, 'to quit,' Cot. (mod. F. quitter). And hence quitt-ance, M. E. quitannee, spelt cwitaunce in Ancren Riwle, p. 126, 1. 7, from O. F. quitance, 'an acquittance,' Cot., and L. quietantia. And see quite. QUINTAL, a hundredweight. (F., - Span., - Arab., - L.) & = Low Lat. quietantia. And see quite.

spelt quit. Thus the sense is 'freely,' hence 'entirely.' See Quit. QUIVER (1), to tremble, shiver. (E.) Possibly allied to quaver, q. v. It does not appear very early, yet is probably old. 'A quiv'ring dart;' Spenser, F. Q. iii. 5.19. 'I quyver, I shake;' Palsgrave.
Allied to the obsolete adj. quiver, full of motion, brisk, Shak. 2 Hen. IV, iii. 2. 301; which occurs, spelt cwiver (= cwiver) in the Ancren Riwle, p. 140, l. 21; also as A. S. cwifer, in the comp. adv. cwiferlice, anxiously, eagerly (Bosworth).

B. The base is KWIF, answering to Aryan GIP, perhaps from & GI, to quicken (Fick, i. 570), and thus ultimately related to Quick; and see Quaver, Quake.

Cf. O. Du. kuiven, kuiveren, to quiver (Kilian).

QUIVER (2), a case for arrows. (F., = O. H. G.) 'Quyver, Pharetra;' Prompt. Parv. = O. F. cuivre, cuevre, older form course, a quiver (Burguy). And see Dicz, s. v. conire. - O. H. G. kohhar (cited by Diez), mod. G. köcher, a quiver. Cognate with A. S. cocur, cocer, Gen. xxvii. 3. Root unknown. Der. quiver-ed.

QUIXOTIC, absurdly chivalrous. (Spanish.) Formed as adj., with suffix -ic, from the name Don Quixote, or Quijote, the hero of the famous novel by Cervantes. (The O. Span. * is now commonly written as j; the sound of the letter is guttural, something like that of G. ch)

QUOIF, a cap or hood. (F., -M. H. G.)

In Shak. Wint. Tale, iv. 4. 226. The same word as Coif, q.v.

QUOIN, a technical term, orig. a wedge. Used in architecture, gunnery, and printing. (F., -L.) The orig. sense is 'wedge;' and, as a verb, 'to wedge up.' 'A printers quoin, Cuneus;' Levins, 215.

17. Merely another spelling of Coin, q.v. A like change of c to qu occurs in quoit. Der. quoin, verb.

QUOIT, COIT, a ring of iron for throwing at a mark in sport.

β. We find W. coetan, a quoit (where W. oe = E. oi nearly); but this is prob. borrowed from E., having no radical, and therefore does not help us.

γ. But it is clear, on the other hand, that the Lowland Scotch coit, to justle or push about, occurring in Fordun's Scotichronicon, ii. 376, is exactly the O. F. coiter. We there read of a woman who 'Gangis coitand' in the curt, hornit like a gait' [goat]. 8. The spelling coit suggests a F. origin; and the word is prob. connected with the curious O. F. coiter, to press, to push, to hasten, incite, instigate (Burguy); the Span. coitarse is to hurry oneself, to hasten. If the O.F. coiter could have had the sense 'to drive,' as seems probable, we may look on a quoit as being a thing driven or whirled.

6. The origin of O. F. coiter is very doubtful; perhaps from Lat. coactare, to force, from coactus, pp. of cogere; see Cogent.

3. The O. Du. kote, 'a huckle-bone' (Hexham), can hardly be related, on account of the diphthong. Der. quoit, verb, 2 Hen. IV, ii. 4. 206.

QUORUM, a number of members of any body sufficient to transact business. (L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. It was usual to enumerate the members forming a committee, of whom (in Lat. quorum) a certain number must be present at a meeting. Lat. quorum is the gen. pl. of qui, cognate with E. who; see Who.

QUOTA, a part or share assigned to each member of a company. (Ital., -L.) Used by Addison (Todd; no reference). -Ital. guota, a share.—Lat. quota (pars), how great (a part), how much; fem. of quotus, how great.—Lat. quot, how many; extended from quo., crude form of qui, cognate with E. Who; with suffix -ta. Der. (from Lat.

quotus) quote, q. v., quoti-dian; (from Lat. quot) quot-ient.

QUOTE, to cite, repeat the words of any one. (F., - L.) In Shak, Hamlet, ii. 1. 112. Sometimes written cote (Schmidt).—O. F. quoter, 'to quote;' Cot. Mod. F. coter, which is also in Cotgrave.—Low Lat. quotare, to mark off into chapters and verses; thus the real sense of quota is to give a reference. The lit. sense of quotare is 'to say how many,' with reference to the numbering of chapters.—Lat. quotus, how much, how many; see Quota. Der. quot-able, quot-er, quot-at-ion.

QUOTH, he says, he said. (E.) Properly a pt. t., though somecuoth, he says, he said. (E.) Properly a pt. t., though sometimes used as a present. The form of the infin. is queath, only used in the comp. bequeath. M. E. quoth, quod; Chaucer, C. T. 790; and common in both forms.—A. S. cweðan, to speak, say; pt. t. kwað, pl. cwédon; pp. cweden; Grein, i. 173. + Icel. kveða; pt. t. kwað, pp. kveðinn. + O. Sax. queðan. + M. H. G. queden, quoden; pt. t. quat, quot.

B. All from a Teut. base KWATH, as if from an Aryan base GAT; but we only find Skt. gad, to speak, Lith. źddas, speech, źadeti, to speak, źodis, a word; all from a common & GA, to make a noise: cf. Skt. gai. to sing.

QUITE, entirely. (F., -L.) M. E. quite, quyte. 'And chaced him & Gower, C. A. ii. 142, last line. -O. F. cotidian (13th cent., Littre); out of Norweie quyte and clene;' Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoff, p. 50. This is merely an adverbial use of the M. E. adj. quyte, now spelt quit. Thus the sense is 'freely,' hence 'entirely.' See Quit.

| Quite, quyte, now from quotus, how many; and di-es, a day; with suffix -anus. Hence spelt quit. Thus the sense is 'freely,' hence 'entirely.' See Quit. quotidianus = on however many a day, on any day, daily. See Quota and Diurnal.

QUOTIENT, the result in arithmetical division. (F., -L.; or L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. [Perhaps directly from Latin.] - F. quotient, the part which, in the division of a thing among many, falls unto every man's share; Cot. - Lat. quotient-*, the imaginary stem of Lat. quotiens, which is really an adv., and indeclinable; it means 'how many times.' - Lat. quot, how many; see Quota.

R.

RABBET, to cut the edges of boards so that they overlap and can be joined together. (F., -L. and G.) M.E. rabet; see Prompt. Parv. 'Many deep rabbotted incisions;' Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 902 (R.) The Halifax gibbet, in Harrison's Decr. of England, b. ii. c, 11, ed. Furnivall, p. 227, is described as having a block of wood 'which dooth ride vp and downe in a slot, rabet, or regall betweene two peeces of timber.' = F. raboter, 'to plane, levell, or laye even;' Cot. He also gives: 'rabot, a joyner's plane, a plaisterer's beater.' The F. adj. raboteux means 'rugged, knotty, rough.' Littré refers these words to O. F. rabouter, to thrust back, compounded of Lat. re, F. a (= Lat. ad), and boter (later bouter), to thrust. This O. F. verb is, in fact, equivalent to E. re-abut. β . The notion of abutting or projecting gives the sense of rugged to the adj. raboteux; whilst the notion of removing the roughness is in the verb. See Re- and Abut. Y. At the same time, it is certain that F. rabot, as shewn by Cotgrave's 2nd definition, was confused with F. rabat, a beater, connected with rabatre (mod. F. rabattre), lit. to re-abate; for which see Re- and Abate. Even in E., the word rabbet is sometimes spelt rehate.

RABBI, RABBIN, sir, a Jewish title. (L., – Gk., – Heb.) 'Rahi, that is to seye maister;' Wyclif, John, i. 38. – Lat. rabbi (Vulgate). – Gk. βαββί; John, i. 38. – Heb. rabí, master, orig. my master; extended from rab, great, or as sb., a master. We also find Rabboni, John, xx. 16; of similar import. 'Rabbi was considered a higher title than Rab; and Rabban higher than Rabbi;' Smith, Dict. of the Bible, q.v. - Heb. root rúbab, to be great. Cf. Arab. rabb, being great; or, as sb., a master: rabbi, my lord; Rich. Dict. p. 719. The form rabbin is French. Der. rabbin-ic-al, rabbin-ist.

RABBIT, a small rodent quadruped. (O. Low G.?) M. E. rabet, Prompt. Parv. The proper E. word is cony. It is a dimin. form from an older word which is only found in O. Du. robbe, 'a rabet;' Hexham. Perhaps cf. F. rable, the back of a rabbit; Span. and Port.

rabo, tail, hind quarters, rabear, to wag the tail. RABBLE, a noisy crowd, mob. (O. Low G.)

rable, rablement. Halliwell has: 'rabble, to speak confusedly,' with an example of M. E. rablen used in the same sense; also: 'rabblement, a crowd, or mob.' So named from the noise which they make; cf. O. Du. rabbelen, 'to chatter, trifle, toy,' Hexham. So also prov. G. rabbeln, to chatter, prattle; Flügel. So also Gk. ballagger, to make a noise; whence $\Delta p \rho \Delta \beta a f$, a dancer, a brawler. $- \checkmark$ RABH, to make a noise; whence Skt. rambh, to sound. rambh a, the lowing of a cow. The suffix -le gives a frequentative force; a rabble is 'that which keeps on making a noise.' And see Rappares. Der. rabble-ment (with F. suffix), Jul. Cæsar, i. 2. 245.

RABID, mad, furious. (L.) 'All the rabid flight Of winds that ruin ships;' Chapman, tr. of Homer, Odyss. b. xii. 1. 418. - Lat. rabidus, furious. - Lat. rabere, to rage; see Rage. Der. rabid-ly, RACA, a term of reproach. (Chaldee.) Matt. v. 22. 'Critics are agreed in deriving it from the Chaldee $r\acute{e}k\acute{a}$, with the sense of worthless;' Smith, Dict. of the Bible.

RACCOON, RACOON, a carnivorous animal of N. America.

(F.,-Teut.) It occurs in a tr. of Buffon, London, 1792. The name of the animal in Buffon is raton; and, in fact, raccoon appears to be not the native name, but only the name applied to the animal by men of European race; and to be merely a singular corruption of the F. name. - F. raton, (1) a little rat, (2) a raccoon (Littré). Dimin. of F. rat; see Rat.

¶ In support of this derivation, it may be added that ratel (also a dimin. of rat) is applied to Mellivora Capensis, another animal of the same genus Ursidæ.

RACE (1), a trial of speed, swift course, swift current. (E.) źadeti, to speak, źodis, a word; all from a common ✔GA, to make a noise; cf. Skt. gai, to sing.

M. E. quotidian, spelt cotidian, ⊕ Conscience, l. 8938. -A. S. rás, a rush, swift course; Luke, viii. 33. 4 Icel. rás, a race, running. β. The form of the root is RAS, RACK (4), another spelling of wrack, i.e. wreck. 'To go to convertible with ARS, whence Skt. risk, to flow; the orig. sense seems to be 'current' of a stream, as in E. mill-race. Der. race, Wrock. verb, A.S. resan; race-course, race-horse, rac-er.

RACE (2), a lineage, family, breed. (F. - O. H. G.) In Spenser, F.Q. i. 10. 60. F. race, 'a race, linnage, family;' Cot. Cf. Port. raça, Span. raza, Ital. razza. O. H. G. reiza, a line, stroke, mark; the notion of 'descent' being represented by that of 'direct line,' as in E. See Diez, who shews that the Romance forms cannot come out of Lat. radix, though it is quite possible that some confusion with radix may have influenced race in some of its usages; see Race (3). B. This O.H.G. reiza is cited by Fick, iii. 309; and is cognate with Icel. reitr, of which the orig. sense was 'a scratch,' der. from rita, to scratch, cognate with E. Write. Der. rac-y, q. v.

RACE (3), a root. (F.-L.) 'A race of ginger;' Wint. Tale, iv. 3. 50; spelt raze, I Hen. IV, ii. 1. 27.—O. F. rais, raiz, a root

RACEME, a cluster. (F., -L.) A botanical term; borrowed from F. racème, a cluster, in botany. - Lat. racemum, acc. of racèmus, a cluster of grapes; allied to Gk. βάξ (gen. βαγ-όε), a berry, esp. a grape. Der. racem-ed. Doublet, raisin.

RACK (1), a grating above a manger for hay, an instrument of torture; as a verb, to extend on a rack, to torture. (E.?) The word rack is used in a great many senses, see Rack (2), &c., below; and, in several of these, the origin is quite different. The word rack, to torture, is prob. E., but it is remarkable that it is scarcely to be found in early literature, either in that or any other sense. The oldest E. word etymologically connected with rack (1) is Reach, B. The radical sense of rack is to extend, stretch out; hence, as a sb., that which is extended or straight, a straight bar (cf. G. rack, a rail, bar; hence, a frame-work, such as the bars in a grating above a manger, a frame-work used as an instrument of torture, a straight bar with teeth in which a cog-wheel can work. Figuratively, to be on the rack is to be in great anxiety; and to rack is to exaggerate (Halliwell). Also a rack-rent is a rent stretched to its full value, or nearly so. Y. For examples, see 'As though I had been racked,' i. e. tortured; Skelton, Phillip Sparrow, 1. 97. 'Galows and racke;' Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox, ed. Arber, p. 24. 'A rekke, Præsepe,' i. e. a rack for hay; Prompt. Parv. 'Rekke and manger' = rack and manger; Romance of Partenay, l. 8. The verb is found in O. Du. racken, 'to rack, to torture;' 6. The verb is found in O. Du. racken, 'to rack, to torture;' Hexham. Related words are Icel. rekja, to stretch, trace, rekkja, to strain, rakkr, straight; O. Du. recken, 'to stretch, reach out, also to racke,' Hexham; Swed. rak, straight; G. rack, a rack, rail, prov. G. reck, a scaffold, wooden horse, reckbank, a rack for torture, recke, a stretcher, recken, to stretch; and esp. Low G. rakk, a shelf, as in E. platerack, &c. ¶ The great dearth of early quotations suggests that rack (for torture) may have been borrowed from Holland; but the word may, in some senses at least, have been English. For the root, see Rank (2). Doublet, ratch.

RACK (2), light vapoury clouds, the clouds generally. (Scand.) Still in use in the Northern counties, and sometimes there applied to a mist;' Halliwell. Used in Shak. of floating vapour; see Hamlet, ii. 2. 506, Antony, iv. 14. 10, Sonnet 33, l. 6. So also (probably) in the disputed passage in the Tempest, iv. 156; where Halliwell hesitates, though he gives instances of its use in earlier English. Thus we find: 'As Phebus doeth at mydday in the southe, Whan every rak and every cloudy sky Is voide clene; 'Lydgate, MS. Ashmole 39, fol. 51. 'The rac dryuez' = the storm-cloud drives; Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 433; a most decisive passage. 'A rak [driving storm] and a royde wynde;' Destruction of Troy, 1985. 'The windes in the vpper region, which move the clouds above (which we call the racke) and are not perceived below;' Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 115. [Frequently confused with reek, but this is quite a different word.] It is rather the same word with wrack, and allied to wreck; but wrack is to be taken in the sense of 'drift,' as rightly explained in Wedgwood.—Icel. rek, drift, motion; given in Vig-fusson only in the sense 'a thing drifted ashore;' but Wedgwood cites isinn er i reki, the ice is driving; skýrek, the rack or drifting clouds; cf. 'racking clouds' = drifting clouds, 3 Hen. VI, ii. 1. 27. From Icel. reka, to drive, toss, thrust, cognate with Swed. urāka, to reject, and E. wreak; see Wreak. Cf. Swed. skeppet urāker, the ship drifts.

BACK (3), to pour off liquor, to subject it to a fermenting process. (F., -L.?) See Halliwell. In Minsheu, ed. 1627, who speaks of 'rackt wines, i.e. wines cleansed and purged.' -O. F. raqué; Cotgrave explains vin raqué as 'small, or corse wine, squeezed from the dregs of the grapes, already drained of all their best moisture.' Perhaps from Latin; I suppose raquer = rasquer*, cognate with Span. rascar, to scrape; see Rascal. Cf. Span. rascon, sour.

RACK (5), a short form of Arrack, q.v. Cf. Span. raque, RACK (6), &c. We find (6) prov. E. rack, a neck of mutton; from A. S. Aracca, neck, according to Somner. Also (7) rack, for reck, to care; see Reck. Also (8) rack, to relate, from A.S. recean; see Reckon. Also (9) rack, a pace of a horse, (Palsgrave). i.e. a rocking pace; see Rock (2). Also (10) rack, a track, cart-rut; cf. Icel. reka, to drive; see Rack (2).

RACKET (1), RAQUET, a bat with net-work in place of a wooden blade. (F., -Span, -Arab.) M. E. raket, in the phrase plaien raket, to play at rackets, Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 461. The game of fives,' with the hands, preceded rackets; to this day, tennis is called in French paume = game of the palm of the hand. - Span. raqueta, a racket, battle-dore. - Arab. rahat, the palm of the hand; pl. rah, the palms; Rich. Dict. p. 714. See Devic, in Supp. to Littré.

RACKET (2), a noise. (C.) One of those homely words which often prove to be of Celtic origin. Lowland Scotch racket, a disturbance, uproar (Jamieson). - Gael. racaid, a noise, disturbance; Irish racan, noise, riot. - Gael. rac, to make a noise like geese or ducks. Of imitative origin. Cf. prov. E. rackle, noisy talk; also rattle, rabble. rapparee.

RACOON; see Raccoon.

RACY, of strong flavour, spirited, rich. (F., -O, H. G.; with E. suffix.) Racy undoubtedly means indicative of its origin, due to its breed, full of the spirit of its race; and so is a derivative from Race (2). 'Fraught with brisk racy verses, in which we The soil from whence they came taste, smell, and see; Cowley, An Answer to a Copy of Verses sent me from Jersey, ll. 7, 8. With respect to a pipe of Canary wine, Greedy asks 'Is it of the right race?; Massinger, New Way to pay Old Debts, i. 3. 10. Der. Probably sometimes used with some notion of reference to Lat. radix; but race (2) is not derived from radix, which appears only in Race (3).

RADIAL, RADIANT; see Radius. RADICAL, RADISH; see Radix.

RADIUS, a ray. (L.) In Phillips, ed. 1710. Chiefly used in mathematics. - Lat. radius, a ray; see Ray. Der. radi-al, from F. radial, 'of, or belonging to, the upper and bigger bone of the arme,' Cot., formed with suffix -alis from Lat. radius, sometimes used to mean the exterior bone of the fore-arm. Also radi-ant, spelt radyaunt in Fisher, On the Seven Psalms, Ps. 130, ed. Mayor, p. 231, last line, from radiant-, stem of pres. part. of Lat. radiare, to radiate, from radius; and hence radi-ant-ly, radi-ance. Also radi-ate, from Lat. radiatus, pp. of radiare. Also radiat-ion, in Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 125, near the end, from F. radiation, 'a radiant brightness,' Cot., which from Lat. radiationem, acc. of radiatio, a shining, from pp. radiatus.

RADIX, a root, a primitive word, base of a system of logarithms. (L.) Lat. radix (stem radic-), a root; chiefly used as a scientific term. + Gk. páðif, a branch, rod. Cognate with E. Wort, q.v. Der. radic-al, spelt radicall in Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, b. i. c. 4 (R.), and in his Castle of Helth, b. iii. c. 3, from F. radical, 'radicall,' Cot., formed with suffix -al (= Lat. -alis) from radic-, stem of radix; radic-al-ly, radic-al-ness; also radic-le, a little root, a dimin. form from the stem radic-. Also radish, called 'radishe rootes' Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 16, from F. radis, 'a raddish root,' Cot.; not a true F. word, but borrowed from Prov. radiz (Littré), from Lat. radicem, acc. of radiz. From Lat. radix we also have e-radic-ate and rash (3). Doublets, radish, race (3). RAFFILE, a kind of lottery. (F.,-G.) M. E. rafte (a game at dice), Chaucer, C. T. Pers. Tale, De Avaritia; Group I, l. 793 (Six-text). - F. rafle (spelt raffle in Cotgrave), 'a game at three dice, wherein he that throwes all three alike, winnes whatsoever is set; also, a rifling; 'Cot. - F. rafter, 'to catch, or seise on violently; also, a fining; Cot. = 1. raper, to catch, or series on violency, Cot. = G. raffeln, to snatch up; frequentative of raffen, to raff, sweep, snatch away, carry off hastily, Flügel. Cognate with Icel. hrapa, to hurry; see Rape (1), Rap (2). Der. raffle, verb.

RAFT, a collection of spars or planks, tied together to serve as a best (Send). W. F. raffle, spale arths, and used in the sense of boat. (Scand.) M. E. raft; spelt rafte, and used in the sense of 'spar' or 'rough beam'; Avowing of Arthur, st. 25, in Robson's Met. Rom, p. 69. The orig. sense is 'rafter.'—Icel. raftr (pron. raftr, in which r is merely the sign of the nom. case), a rafter; Dan. raft, a rafter; see Rafter.

RAFTER, a beam to support a roof. (E.) M. E. rafter, Chaucer, C. T. 992. — A. S. ræfter, Ælfred, tr. of Beda, b. iii. c. 16. An extension (with Aryan suffix -RA) from the base RAFT appearing in Dan. raft, Icel. raptr (raftr), a rafter, beam. Again, Dan. raft is an extension (with suffix -ta) from the base RAF appearing in Icel. raft, rafr, a roof, which is cognate with O. H. G. rafo, M. H. G. ravo, s spar, a ratter. The orig. sense is 'that which covers.'— \(\pi \) RAP, to cover; whence Gk. δροφος, a roof; see Fick, i. 741, iii. 251. Der. rafter, verb. And see raft. It does not seem to be allied to roof, which has an initial k; A. S. kráf.

RAG, a shred of cloth. (E.) M. E. ragge, Gower, C. A. i. 100, l. 7. 'A ragged colt' = a shaggy colt, King Alisaunder, 684. We only find A. S. raggie, adj. rough, shaggy; 'Setosa, raggie,' Mone, Ovellen 1. 256. Swed a raggie respectively. Quellen, p. 436. + Swed. ragg, rough hair; cf. raggig, shaggy; Swed. dial. raggi, having rough hair, slovenly; Dan. dial. ragg, rough, uneven hair (Aasen), also raggad, shaggy; Icel. rögg, shagginess; raggadr, shaggy. Thus the orig sense is that of shagginess, hence of untidiness. See Rug. Root unknown. ¶ 1. There is no reason for connecting it with A.S. hracod, torn, which is one of Somner's unauthorised words. 2. The Gael, rag, a rag, may be borrowed; for the true sense of Gael. and Irish rag is straight, rigid, cognate with Swed. rak, straight, upright, and allied to E. Rigid.

8. The resemblance to Gk. hákos. a shrad of cloth. (from WARK, WRAK, to tear), is also accidental, and proves nothing. Der. ragg-ed, as above, also applied by Gower to a tree, Conf. Amant. ii. 177; ragg-ed-ly, ragg-ed-ness; rag-stone (a rugged stone); rag-wort, spelt rag-wrote in Levins and in a Glossary (in Weber, 980. – F. rage. – Lat. rabiem, acc. of rabies, madness, rage. – Lat. rabere, to rave, to be mad. + Skt. rabh, to desire vehemently, to act inconsiderately; in Vedic Skt., to seize. – & RABH, to seize. RAID, a hostile invasion, inroad. (Scand.) A Northern border word; and merely a doublet of the Southern E. road. Cf. 'That, when they heard my name in any road,' i. e. raid; Greene, Georgea-Greene, ed. Dyce, vol. ii. p. 169.— Icel. reil, a riding, a raid; cf. Dan. red, Swed. redd, a road. See Road, Ride. Doublet, road. RAIL (1), a bar of timber, an iron bar for railways. (O. Low G.) M. E. rail; dat. raile, Gower, C. A. iii. 75, l. 11. Not found in A. S., but regularly contracted from a Low G. form regel; for the loss of g between two vowels, cf. hail (1), nail, rain. - Low G. regel, a rail, a cross-bar; Brem. Wörterbuch; Swed. regel, a bar, bolt; cf. O. Du. richel, rijchel, 'a barre, a let, or a stop, that shutteth a door; 'Hexham. + G. riegel, O. H. G. rigil, a rail, bar, bolt, by which a door is fastened.

B. This G. sb. is from O. H. G. rihan, to fasten, mod. G. reihen, to put into a row, stitch, string together, connect; the primitive bar of a door was prob. a mere latch. The O. Du. rijchel means 'a line or stroke' as well as a bar (Hexham); and is therefore the dimin. of the sb. which appears as G. reihe, a row, stroke. This G. reihe is connected by Fick with Skt. lekha (for rekha), a line, stroke, mark, from likh (= rikh), to scratch, to write. $- \checkmark RIK$, to scratch; mark, from time (=718m), to scratch, to write. = 4 KIR, to scratch; Fick, i. 742. Der. rail, verb, rail-ing, rail-road, rail-way.

RAIL (2), to brawl, to use reviling language. (F., -L.) In Skelton, Poems Against Garnesche; see Skelton, ed. Dyce, i. 130, ll. 119, 137. 'Rayler, a jestar, raillevr;' Palsgrave. = F. railler, 'to jest, deride, mock;' Cot. Cf. Span. railar, to grate, scrape, molest, vex; Port. ralar, to scrape. The change of sense from scraping to vexing is in accordance with the usual course of metaphors. Cf. Lat. railum, an instrument for scraping carth from a slouth which is a contract. an instrument for scraping earth from a plough, which is a contraction for an older form radulum*. The F. railler answers to a low Lat. type radulare*, formed as a dimin. from radere, to scrape. See Rase. (See Littré and Scheler.) Der. raille-er-y = F. raillerie, 'jeasting, merriment, a flowt, or scoff,' Cot. Also rally (2).

RAIL (3), a genus of wading birds. (F., — Teut.) Given by Phillips, ed. 1710, as 'a sort of bird.' Spelt rayle in Levins, and in the Catholicon Anglicon (cited by Wheatley). — O. F. rasle, 'a rattling in the throat; also, the fowle called a rayle;' Cot. Mod. F. râle. Littré notes rasle as the 14th cent. spelling; also that the Picard form is raille, shewing that the F. word agrees rather with the Picard form is reille, shewing that the E. word agrees rather with the Picard than the usual F. form. β . No doubt the bird was named from its cry; cf. O. F. raller, 'to rattle in the throat,' Cot.; mod. F. râler. Of Teut. origin; cf. O. Du. ratelen, 'to rattle, or make a noise,' Hexham; see Rattle. γ. So also O. Du. rallen, rellen, 'to make a noise;' een rel, 'a noise, a cracking, or a rustling, Hexham; the verb is merely a contracted form of ratelen, as in Dan. ralle, Norw. radla, to rattle. Cf. G. ralle, a rail, land-rail, corn-crake; Swed. ralla, to chatter, rallfågel, a landrail.

Short for arraiment, of which the M. E. form was araiment, and the initial a easily fell away. 'Rayment, or arayment, Ornatus;' Prompt. Parv. Cf. O. F. arréement, 'good array, order, equipage;' Cot. We find also array as a sb., Chaucer, C. T. 6509, with the shorter form ray, as in 'Hoc stragum ray,' in a list of Nomina Vestimentorum: Wright's Vocab. i. lum, ray,' in a list of Nomina Vestimentorum; Wright's Vocab. i. 238, col. I. See Array.

Der. rain, verb, A.S. hregnian, regnian, Matt. v, 45 (Northumb. version); rain-y, A.S. rénig, Grein, i. 372; rain-bow, A. S. rénboga, Gen. ix. 13; rain-guage. And see ir-rig-ate, em-broc-at-ion

Lat. ligo, a mattock. B. From the notion of collecting or heaping up. The root appears in Goth. rikan (pt. t. rak), to collect, heap up, Rom. xii. 20; cognate with Lat. legere, Gk. \(\lambda\)/yetv, to collect. \(\rightarrow\)/ RAG, to collect. See Legend. Der. rake, verb, A. S. racian (Somner).

RAKE (2). a wild, dissolute fellow. (Scand.) M. E. rakel, rash, Chaucer, C. T. 17238; Allit. Poems, C. 526. [This word was corrupted into rake-hell; see Trench, Eng. Past and Present, and 4 examples in the additions to Nares by Halliwell and Wright. And it was finally shortened to rake, as at present. Levins has both rakyl, adj. rascally, and the corrupted form rakehell. Rakehell was sometimes arbitrarily altered to rake-shame.

RAKEHELL, a rascal. (Scand.) See Rake (2).

RALLY (1), to gather together again, reassemble. (F., -L.) Properly a trans. verb; also used as intransitive. Spelt rallie in Cotgrave. It stands for re-ally; and Spenser uses re-allie nearly in the same sense as rally; F. Q. vii. 6. 23.—F. rallier, 'to rallie;' Cot.—Lat. re-, again; ad, to: and ligare, to bind; see Re- and Ally.

The form rely in Barbour's Bruce, iii. 34, &c., is used in the same sense; and is the same word, with the omission of Lat. ad.

RAILY (2), to banter. (F., -Teut.) 'Rally, to play and droll upon, to banter or jeer;' Phillips, ed. 1710. He also gives: 'Rallery, pleasant drolling.' Here rallery is another form of raillery, and to rally is merely another form of to rail, in later use, and due to an attempt to bring the E. word closer to F. railler. See Rail (2).

&c.; rati, passion. Der. ram, verb, to butt as a ram, hence to $\phi$ stink; only used in the pres. part. rancens, stinking. This thrust violently forward, M. E. rammen, Prompt. Parv., p. 422. Also has influenced the sense of the E. adj. rank; see Rank (2). ramm-ish, fetid, Chaucer, C. T. 16355. Also ram-rod, ramm-er.

The Icel. ramr, strong, shews merely a derived sense.

RAMBLE, to stray, rove, roam. (E.) The frequentative form of roam, or rather of the prov. E. rame, which is its equivalent. 'Rame, to gad about, to sprawl, to spread out too much;' Holderness Glossary (E.D.S.) It does not occur very early, and was prob. a dialectal (Northern) word, taken up into the literary language. 'Nor is this lower world but a huge Inn, And men the rambling passengers; Howell, Poema, prefixed to his Familiar Epistles and dated Jan. 1. 1641. And in Butler, Hudibras, pt. ii. c. 3 (ed. Bell, vol. ii. p. 161, l. 34). The b is excressent; and ram-b-le is for ramm-le. Rammle, to ramble; Whitby Glossary. See Roam. ¶ Perhaps it has been somewhat influenced by the words ramp and romp; the metaphorical sense 'to rave,' i. e. to wander, presents no difficulty. Der. ramble, sb., rambl-er, rambl-ing.

RAMIFY, to divide into branches. (F., -L.) 'To ramify and send forth branches;' Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. ii. c. 5. part 6. - F. ramifer, 'to branch, put out branches;' Cot. Formed as if from Lat. ramificare *; from rami- = ramo-, crude form of ramus, a branch; and ficare, due to facere, to make. β. Probably rāmus rad-mus; allied to Gk. βάδαμνος, a young branch, βάδιξ, a branch, and to Lat. radix; see Radix.

Der ramific-at-ion (as if from Lat. pp. ramificat-us*, whence sb. ramificat-io). Also (from Lat. ram-us) ram-ous, ram-ose, ram-e-ous.

RAMP, to leap or bound, properly, to climb, scramble, rear. (F., - Teut.) Ramp, to rove, frisk or jump about, to play gambols or wanton tricks; Phillips, ed. 1706; and in l'alsgrave. Not much used, except in the deriv. rampant. M. E. rampen, used by Chaucer in the sense 'to rage, be furious with anger;' C.T. 13010; cf. mod. E. romp, which is the same word. Gower uses rampend, rearing, E. romp, which is the same word. Gower uses rampena, rearing, said of a dragon, in the same way as the F. pp. rampant; C. A. iii. 74, l. 22. Cf. Prick of Conscience, 2225.—F. ramper, 'to creep, run, crawl, or traile itself along the ground; also, to climb;' Cot. β. From a Teut. source. Cf. Bavarian rampfen, explained by Schmeller, ii. 96, by the G. raffen, to snatch. Scheler, following Diez, says that the old sense of F. ramper was to clamber, preserved in mod. F. rampe, a flight of steps; and that it is allied to Ital. rampa, a claw, gripe, rampare, to claw, and rampo, a grappling-iron. y. The Ital. rampare (appearing in Prov. in the form rapar) is, in fact, a nasalised form of rappare, only used in the comp. arrappare, to snatch up, carry off, seize upon; and the base is Teut. RAP, to be in haste, found in Low G. rappen, to snatch hastily (Bremen Wörterbuch), Dan. rappe, to hasten, make haste, Dan. rap, quick, Swed. rappa, to snatch, rapp, brisk, G. raffen, to snatch.

8. Probably an initial h has been lost; cf. Icel. hrapadr, hurry, hrapa, to rush headlong, to hurry. See Rap (2). Der. ramp-ant, chiefly used of a lion rampant, as in Skelton, Against the Scottes, 135, from F. rampant, pres. part. of ramper; hence rampant-ly, rampane-y.

RAMPART, a mound surrounding a fortified place. (F.,-L.)

We frequently find also rampire, rampier, or ramper. Spelt rampyre, Tottell's Miscellany, ed. Arber, p. 172, l. 18 (Assault of Cupid, st. 5); rampart, Gascoigne, Fruites of Warre, st. 45. Rampire stands for rampar (without the final t). - O. F. rempart, rempar, 'a rampier, the wall of a fortresse; Cot. Cf. remparer, to fortifie, enclose with a rampier; id. β . The F. rempar is the true form; in rempart, the t is excrescent. Rempar corresponds (nearly) to Ital. riparo, a defence, and is a verbal sb. from remparer, to defend, answering (nearly) to Ital. riparare, to defend. v. F. remparer is 'to put again into a state of defence; from re-, again, em- for en, in, and parer, to defend, borrowed from Ital. parare, which from Itat. parare, to prepare, make ready. The Ital. riparare is the same word, with the omission of the preposition. See Re-, Em-, and Parapet or RAMSONS, broad-leaved garlic. (E.) Put for hramsons. Allium ursinum, broad-leaved garlic, ramsons;' Johns, Flowers of the Field. Ramsons = rams-en-s, a double pl. form, where -en represents the old A.S. plural, as in E. ox-en, and -s is the usual E. pluralending. We also find M.E. ramsis, ramzys, ramseys, Prompt. Parv. p. 422; and Way says that Gerarde calls the Allium ursinum by the p. 42; and way says that Genatic cast the Attum assume of the suffixes is, -eys, -ies are pl. endings. — A. S. hramsan, ramsons; Gloss. to Cockayne, A. S. Leechdoms; a pl. form, from sing. hramsa. + Swed. rams-lök (lök = leek), bear-garlic. + Dan. rams, or rams-lög (lög = leek). + Bavarian ramsen, ramsel (Schmeller). + Lithuan. kremsee, kremuszis, wild garlic (Nesselmann). Further allied to Gk. κρόμουν, an onion, Irish ereamk, garlic; Fick, iii. 83. All from an Aryan form KARMA, whence KARMUSA, an onion, or garlic.

RANCID, sour, having a rank smell. (L.) A late word; in Bailey, vol. i. ed. 1735. — Lat. rancidus, rancid. — Lat. rancere, to πerely due to confusion with Lat. rancidus, E. rancid, or rather with rancid-ly, -ness; also ranc-our, q. v.

RANCOUR, spite, deep-seated enmity. (F.,-L.) M. E. rancour, Chaucer, C. T. 2786. - F. rancour, 'rankor, hatred;' Cot. - Lat. rancorem, acc. of rancor, spite, orig. rancidness. - Lat. rancere, to be rancid; see Rancid. Der. rancor-ous, rancor-ous-ly.

RANDOM, done or said at hazard, left to chance. (F., - Teut.) The older form is randon, or randoun; and the older sense is 'force. impetuosity, &c., the word being used as a sb. It was often used with respect to the rush of a battle-charge, and the like. 'Kyng and duyk, eorl and baroun Prikid the stedis with gret randown; King Alisaunder, I. 2483. It often formed part of an adverbial phrase, such as in a randoun, in a furious course, Barbour's Bruce, vi. 139, xvii. 694, xviii. 130; intill a randoun, id. xix. 596; in randoun richt, with downright force, id. v. 632. So also at randon, orig. with rushing force, hence, left without guidance, left to its own force, astray, &c. 'The gentle lady, loose at randon lefte, The greene-wood long did walke, and wander wide At wilde adventure, like a forlorne wefte; Spenser, F. Q. iii. 10. 36. [The change from final -n to -m may have been due to the influence of whilom, seldom; so also ransom.] -O. F. randon, 'the swiftnesse and force of a strong and violent stream; whence aller à grand randon, to goe very fast, or with a great and forced pace; Cot. Thus the E. adv. at random answers to F. à randon.

3. A difficult word; Diez compares O. F. randir, to press on, Span. de rendon, de rondon, rashly, intrepidly, abruptly (nearly like E. at random), O. F. randonner, to run swiftly, violently, to the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of the stream of Cot., and refers them all to G. rand, an edge, rim, brim, margin. Ilence also Ital. a randa, near, with difficulty, exactly; of which the lit. sense is 'close to the edge or brim,' Span. randa, lace, border of y. The difficulty is in the connection of ideas; but Cotgrave really gives the solution, viz. that randon refers to the force of a brimming river. Whoever has to cross a mountain-stream must feel much anxiety as to whether it is full or not; at one time it is a mere rill, a few hours later its force sweeps all before it. This common and natural solution is, I suspect, the right one. Cf. G. bis am rande voll, full to the brim; am rande des Todes, on the brink of death, at death's door; eine sache zu rande bringe, to bring a thing to the brim, to fulfil or accomplish it. So also O. F. sang respandus à gros randons, blood shed 'by great gushes, or in great quantity,' Cot.; lit. in brimming streams.

8. We find also Ital randello, 'a hurling, whirling, or hissing noise in the aire; a randello, at random, carelesly, furiously, hurlingly; Florio. Here randello is a dimin, corresponding form, and may be merely taken from the same image; but since rand means the rim or verge of a circular shield as well as the brink of a river, it may equally well refer to circular motion. A whirled stone keeps to the utmost verge (as it were) of its circular path, with a tendency to fly beyond it with great force.

• The G. rand is cognate with A. S. rand, rim, rim of a shield, verge (Grein), Icel. rönd, a rim, border, Dan. rand, a rim, streak, Swed. rand, a stripe; all from a Teut. form RANDA, a rim; Fick, iii. 246. Root uncertain.

RANGE, to rank, or set in a row, to set in order, to rove. (F., — O. H. G.) The sense of 'to rove' arose from the scouring of a country by troops or ranks of armed men; the orig. sense is '10 set in a rank, to array. M. E. rengen (corresponding to O. F. renger, the form used in the 14th cent., according to Littre), Rob. of Brunne, p. 40, l. 26. 'The helle liun rengeth euer abuten' = the lion of hell is always ranging (roving) about; Ancren Riwle, p. 164.—F. ranger (O. F. renger), 'to range, rank, order, array;' Cot.—F. range, 'a ranke,' id. See Rank (1). Der. range, sb., Antony, iii. 13. 5. Also, rang-er, esp. one who ranges a forest, Minsheu, ed. 1627 (see his explanation); rang-er-ship.

RANK (1), row or line of soldiers, class, order, grade, station. (F., - O. H. G.) Spelt ranck, Spenser, F. Q. iii. 6. 35 (the verb to ranck is in the same stanza). The M. E. form is reng, Chaucer, C. T. 2596; also renk, St. Brandan, ed. Wright, 12 (Stratmann); see reng in Stratmann. Reng became renk, altered afterwards to rank in accordance with a similar change made in the f. original. - O. F. reng, later rang, 'a ranke, row, list, range;' Cot. He gives both forms. Scheler gives the Picard form as ringue, Prov. renc. — O.II. G. hring or hrine, a ring; cognate with E. Ring, q. v. And see Harangue. The sense changed from 'ring' of men to a 'row of men, or a file irrespective of the shape in which they were ranged. The Bret. renk is borrowed from O. F., and the other Celtic forms from F. or E. The G. rang is borrowed back again from F. rang.

O. F. rance, 'musty, fusty, stale,' Cot.; which comes to the same & to make haste, cf. rap, quick, brisk. + G. raffen, to snatch. Der. thing. 'As rank as a fox;' Tw. Night, ii. 5. 136. M. E. rank, ronk. rap-t, at least in the 16th century, see above. Also raff-le, q.v.; 'Ronk and ryf;' Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, A. 843 (or 844). Often with the sense of 'proud' or 'strong;' thus ronke is a various reading for strongs, Ancren Riwle, p. 268, note c. - A. S. rane, strong, proud, forward; Grein, ii. 363. + Du. rank, lank, slender (like things of quick growth). + Leel rake (for rank) stroight slender (like things of quick growth). + Leel rake (for rank) stroight slender (like things of quick growth). + Leel rake (for rank) stroight slender (like things of quick growth). + Leel rake (for rank) stroight slender (like things of quick growth). + Leel rake (for rank) stroight slender (like things of quick growth). + Leel rake (for rank) stroight slender (like things of quick growth). + Leel rake (for rank) stroight slender (like things of quick growth). + Leel rake (for rank) stroight slender (like things of quick growth). of quick growth).+Icel. rakkr (for rankr), straight, slender. + Swed. rank, long and thin. + Dan. rank, erect. β. A nasalised form of Teut. base RAK, to make straight, to stretch; Hexham gives rancken as equivalent to recken, to rack, to stretch. From ARAG, to stretch, make straight; whence also Rack (1), Right, Rich.

Der. rank-ly, ness; also rank-le, q.v.

RANKLE, to fester. (E.) In Levins; spelt rankyll in Palsgrave. Lit. to grow rank; but, being derived from rank only in the M. E. period, it took up the later sense of rank, after it had been confused with F. rance or ranci, musty, fusty, stale, putrified, Cot.; as noticed under Rank (2). It is rare in M. E., but appears, according to Stratmann, in Sir Beves of Hamptoun, ed. Turnbull, 1. 2656. Formed from Bank (2) by the addition of the frequentative suffix -le. Hence the sense is 'to keep on being rank,' to fester con-

RANSACK, to search thoroughly. (Scand.) M. E. ransaken, Chaucer, C. T. 1007; Genesis and Exodus, ed. Morris, 2323. - Icel. rannsaka, to search a house, to ransack; Swed. ransaka, Dan. ransage. - Icel. rann, a house, abode; and sak, base of sækja, to seek. B. The lcel. rann stands for rasn, by the assimilation so common in Icelandic; and is cognate with A.S. rasn, a plank, beam (Bosworth), Goth. razn, a house; the root of which is unknown. Icel. ¶ Not sækja is cognate with A. S. sécan, to seck; see Seek. connected with A. S. rán, Icel. rán, plunder, which is quite different from Icel. rann.

RANSOM, redemption, price paid for redemption, release. (F., - L.) M. E. ransoun, raunson, Chaucer, C. T. 1178. The change from final n to final m is not uncommon; cf. random. Spelt raunsun, Ancren Riwle, p. 124, l. 24. - O. F. raenson (12th cent., Littré), later rançon, 'a ransome,' Cot. - Lat. redemptionem, acc. of redemptio, redemption, by the usual loss of d between two vowels. See Redemption. Der. ransom, vb.; ransom-er. Doublet, redemption.

RANUNCULUS, a genus of plants, including the buttercup. (L.) Botanical. - Lat. ranunculus, a little frog; also, a medicinal plant. Formed with double dimin. suffix -cu-lu-s from ran-un-, extended from rana, a frog. β. The Lat. rāna stands for rac-na, and means 'croaker;' from RAK, extension of \checkmark RA, to bellow, make a noise. Cf. Lat. raccare, to make a noise as a tiger, loqui, to Cf. rat-a-tat-tat, a knocking at a door. Der. rapp-er.

BAP (2), to snatch, seize hastily. (Scand.) Perhaps for hrap, an initial & being lost. M. E. rapen (for hrapen), to hasten, act hastily, Gower, C. A. i. 335, l. 26; P. Plowman, B. v. 399; &c. The mod. E. phrase to rape and rend, to seize all one can get, is a corrupted phrase due to the collocation of the lccl. hrapa, to rush, hurry, seize, with ræna, to plunder, a verb formed from rán, plunder; the true sense is to seize and plunder, to plunder quickly. It appears in Chaucer as rape and renne, C. T. Group G, l. 1422; on which see my note and the Glossary. A similar phrase is rap and reave, seize and spoil, in Fox's Martyrs, p. 781, an. 1521 (R.) So also 'to rap out oaths, to hurry them out; Ascham, Scholemaster, b. i. ed. Arber, p. 57. Palsgrave has: 'I rappe, I ravysshe;' also, 'I rape or rende, je rapine.' 'What, dear sir, thus raps you?' [But it is certain that this pp. was soon and easily confused with Lat. raptus, pp. of rapere, to seize, with which it had no orig. connection, and very soon the Latin word, being better known, caused the E. word to be entirely lost sight of, so that it is now obsolete. Cf. F. rap., 'a ravishing, a violent snatching;' Cot. See Rapt, Rapture.] - Icel. hrapa, to fall, tumble, rush headlong, hurry, be in haste; cf. hrapaor,

RAPE (1), a seizing by force, violation. (Scand.)

'a rape, raptura, rapina; and to rape, rapere.'

T Levins has: The word is certainly Scandinavian, and the same as M. E. rape, haste, hurry; but has obviously been affected by confusion with a supposed derivation from Lat. rapere, to seize, with which it has really nothing to do; cf. F. rapt, 'a violent snatching,' Cot. The sb. really derived from Lat. rapere is Rapine, q. v.

B. The M. E. rape, haste, is common enough, occurring in the old proverb 'ofte rap reweith' = haste of the country of Handyng 1 and in Second From all Morris and repents, Proverbs of Hendyng, 1. 256, in Spec. of Eng. ed. Morris and Skeat, p. 42. Chaucer accused Adam Scrivener of negligence and rape, i. e. haste. And see King Horn, ed. Lumby, 1418; P. Plowman, B. v. 333; Gower, C. A. i. 296, l. 27. - Icel. hrap, ruin, falling down (probably also haste, as the vb. hrapa often means to hasten), hrapadr, a hurry; Swed. rapp, Dan. rap, brisk, quick. See Rap (2).

RAPE (2), a plant nearly allied to the turnip. (F., -L.; or L.) M. E. rape, Prompt. Parv. - O. F. rabe, later rave, 'a rape, or turnep,' Cot. The M. E. rape is either derived from a still older F. form, viz. rupe, or else has been accommodated to the spelling of the Lat. word. – Lat. rapa, a turnip, rape; also spelt rapum. + Russ. riepa, a turnip. + Gk. βάπυε, a turnip; cf. βαφανίς, a radish. Root unknown.

Der. rape-oil, rape-cake.

RAPE (3), a division of a county, used in Sussex. (Scand.) Still in use; of Scand. origin. - Icel. hreppr, a district; see remarks in the Icel. Dict. Prob. the orig. sense was 'share' or allotment; the deriv. being from Icel. hreppa, to catch, hence to obtain. This verb is cognate with A. S. hrepian, hreppan, to touch, take hold of, Gen. iii. 3; Swed. repa, to scratch.

III. 3; Sweat. repa, to science.

RAPID, swift. (F., -L.; or L.) In Milton, P. L. ii. 532, iv.
227. - F. rapide, 'violent;' Cot. [Or directly from Latin.] - Lat.
rapidum, acc. of rapidus, rapid, quick; lit. snatching away. - Lat. rapere, to snatch. Cf. Gk. ἀρπάζειν, to seize, from a base APΠ = PAΠ. β. From a base RAP, perhaps allied to RAPIER, a light, narrow sword. (F., -Span, -O. H. G.) In Shak. Temp. v. 84. In A. D. 1579, 'the long foining rapier' is described in Bullein's Dialogue between Sorenesse and Chirurge as 'a new kynd of instrument;' see note in Ben Jonson's Every Man, ed. Wheatly, introd. pp. xliv, xlv. -F. rapiere (mod. F. rapière), 'an old rusty rapier;' Cot.

3. Of unknown origin, see Scheler and Littré, but Mr. Wheatley's pate shews that in 1500 le section and Littré; but Mr. Wheatley's note shews that, in 1530, la rapiere was the spanische sworde, and Palsgrave has 'rapiere, Spanische sworde.' This makes it probable that Diez's solution (rejected by Littré) is right, and that rapiere is for ruspiere, a name given in contempt, meaning a rasper or poker. Hence also 'a proking-spit of Spaine' means a Spanish rapier (Nares). Cf. Span. raspadera, a raker (Neuman), from raspar, to rasp, scrape, file, scratch; see Rasp.

RAPINE, plunder, violence. (F.,-L.) In Shak. Titus, v. 2. 59. - F. rapine, 'rapine, ravine,' Cot. - Lat. rapina, plunder, robbery.

Lat. rapere, to seize; see Rapid. Doublet, ravine.

'Rapparees and banditti;' Bolingbroke, A Letter on Archbp. Tillotson's Sermon (R.)-Irish Donngoroke, A Letter on Archop. Tillotson's Sermon (R.)—Irish rapaire, a noisy fellow, sloven, robber, thief; cf. rapal, noise, rapach, noisy. So also Gael. rapair, a noisy fellow. See Rabble.

RAPPEE, a kind of snuff. (F.,—Teut.) Not in Todd's Johnson.

F. râpé, lit. rasped; Littré quotes: 'J'ai du bon tabac.. j'ai du fin et du rapé;' Lattaignant, Chanson. Pp. of râper, to rasp, of Teut. origin. See Rasp.

DAPIT corrido avec. (F. 1997)

RAPT, carried away. (E.; confused with L.) Orig. an E. word, the pp. of rap, to hurry; see Rap (2). But when Milton writes: 'Rape in a chariot drawn by fiery steeds,' P. L. iii. 522, he was rapt in a charlot drawn by hery steeds, P. L. in. 522, he was probably thinking of Lat. raptus, pp. of rapere, to seize, snatch away; see Rapid. The question as to which word is meant depends on chronology; the Latin sense is the later.

RAPTORIAL, in the habit of seizing. (L.) Used of birds of prey. Formed with suffix -al (= Lat. -alis) from raptori-, crude form of raptor, one who seizes. Lat. raptus, pp. of rapere, to seize;

see Rapture, Rapid.

a hurry; Swed. rappa, to snatch, scize, cf. rapp, brisk; Dan. rappe, RAPTURE, transport, ecstasy. (L.) In Shak. Troil. ii. 2. 122; conject-ure, &c.) from rapt-us, pp. of rapere, to seize; see Rapid.

Der. raptur-ous, raptur-ous-ly.

RARE, thin, scarce, excellent. (F., -L.) In Levins, ed. 1570. -F. rare, 'rare;' Cot. - Lat. rarum, acc. of rārus, rare. Root unknown. Der. rare-ly, rare-ness. Also rari-jy, irom r. rareper, to rarifie, Cot., as if from Lat. rareficare , but the classical Lat. word is rarefacere, from facere, to make. Also rarefact-ion, from From the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control of the control rarefaction, 'a making thin,' Cot. = Lat. acc. rarefactionem, from rarefactus, pp. of rarefacere. Also rar-i-ty, Temp. ii. 1. 58, from F. rarité, 'rareness, rarity,' Cot., from Lat. acc. raritatem.

RASCAL, a knave, villain. (F., -L.?) M.E. raskaille, used collectively, 'the common herd,' Morte Arthur, ed. Brock, 2881. See Prompt. Parv., and Way's note. 'Certain animals, not accounted as beasts of chace, were so termed; ... the hart, until he was six years old, was accounted raseayle; 'Way. He also cites: 'ptebecula, lytell folke or raskalle; plebs, folk or raskalle.' Cf. 'Rascall, refuse beest; Palsgrave. B. As the word was a term of the chase, and as it has the F. suffix -aille, it must needs be of F. origin; no other origin is conceivable, the word not being English. Nor can it, I think, be doubted that the E. raskaille stands for an O. F. rascaille*, which is clearly the same word as mod. F. racaille, 'the rascality or base and rascall sort, the scumme, dregs, offals, outcasts, of any company, Cot.

Y. The lit. sense is 'scrapings;' for I take O. F. rascaille* to stand for rasclaille* (which would have been unpronounceable), from O.F. rascler, mod. F. racler, 'to scrape, raspe; 'Cot. Or perhaps there was an O. F. rasquer, to scrape, whence may be derived O. F. raqué, small or corse wine, squeezed from the dregs of the grapes,' Cot.

5. Or, in any case, we find Prov., Span., and Port. rascar, to scrape, O. Ital. rascare, 'to burnish, to rub, to furbish' (Florio); all formed from a Low Lat. type rasicare*, a frequentative form from rasum, supine of radere, to scrape; see Rase.

6. The above view is, practically, that taken by Scheler. Perhaps it will also explain Port. rascão, a mean page or servant, a dish of minced meat; i.e. scrapings. Moreover, from Ital. raspare, to scrape, rasp, we have O. Ital. raspato, 'a kind of raspise [raspish, harsh] wine' (Florio); which seems a similar formation to O. F. raqué, coarse wine. The A.S. rascal, is unauthorised, and prob. a fiction. Der. rascal-ly, rascal-i-/y.

RASE, to scrape, efface, demolish, ruin. (F.,-L.) Often spelt raze, esp. in the sense to demolish; but it makes no real difference. See Raze. M. E. rasen, to scrape; Prompt. Parv. - F. raser, 'to shave, sheere, raze, or lay levell, to touch or grate on a thing in passing by it,' Cot.—Low Lat. rasare, to demolish, graze; frequentative verb formed from rasum, supine of Lat. radere, to scrape. Allied to rodere, to gnaw. Allied to scratch; cf. Skt. rad, to split, divide. Fick, i. 739. Der. ras-ure, from F. rasure, 'a razing out,' Cot.; ab-rade; e-rase, q. v., e-ras-ure; ras-or-i-al, q. v.; raz-or, q.v.; rail (2), q.v.; rascal, q.v., rash (2), q.v. And see rodent, Doublet, raze.

RASH (1), hasty, headstrong. (Scand.) M. E. rash, rasch, Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, A. 1166 (or 1167). The final -sch stands for -sk, as usual. — Dan. and Swed. rask, brisk, quick, rash; Icel. röskr, vigorous. + Du. rasch, quick. + G. rasch, quick, vigorous, rash. Cf. β. An adjectival form, from AR, Skt. ricch, to go, to attack. to raise, drive; cf. Skt. ri, to rise, raise, attack; Gk. δρ-νυμι, I excite. The orig. sense is excitable, prompt to attack. Der. rash-ly, -ness; perhaps rash-er.

RASH (2), a slight eruption on the body. (F., -L.) son's Dict. - O. F. rasche, 'a scauld, or a running scurfe, or sore; a Languedoc word,' Cot.; also spelt rasque. F. rache, an cruption on the head, scurf (Littré). Cf. Prov. rasca, the itch (Littré). So called from the wish to scratch it; cf. Prov. rasear, Span. rasear, to scratch, scrape, formed from a Low Lat. type rasicare*, to scratch, due to Lat. rasum, supine of radere, to scrape. See Rascal, Rase.

RASH (3), to pull, or tear violently. (F., -L.) 'Rash, to snatch or seize, to tear or rend;' Halliwell. 'The second he took in his arms, and rashed him out of the saddle;' Arthur of Little Britain, ed. 1814, p. 83 (R.) 'And shields did share, and mailes did rash, and helms did hew;' Spenser, F. Q. iv. 2.17. 'Rashing off helmes, and riving plates asonder;' id. v. 3. 8. M. E. aracen, afterwards shortened to racen. 'The children from hire arm they gan arace,' i. e. tore away; Chaucer, C. T. 8979. 'Hur heere of can she race' = she tore off her hair (Halliwell, s. v. race). [The change from the sound of final -s (voiceless) to -sh is regular, as in flourish from the stem fleuriss-, &c.] = O. F. esracer, mod. F. arracher, 'to root up, to pull away by violence. Cot. - Lat. exradicare = eradicare, to root up; see Eradicate, Radix.

iii. 2. 138. The word seems to be a pure coinage; there is no F. a hastily roasted; Minsheu, ed. 1627. This etymology is prob. the rapture, nor Low Lat. rapture. Formed with suffix -ure (as in right one; cf. rashed, burnt in cooking, by being too hastily dressed, right one; cf. 'rashed, burnt in cooking, by being too hastily dressed,' Halliwell; and see his examples. 'In my former edition of Acts and Monuments, so hastely rashed vp at that present, in such shortnesse of time; Fox, Martyrs, p. 645, an. 1439 (R.) See Rash (1).

The W. rhasg, a slice, does not suit the evidence.

RASORIAL, the name of a family of birds. (L.) It includes birds which, like hens, scrape the ground for food. Coined with suffix -al (= Lat. -alis) from rasori-, crude form of rasor, one who scrapes : see Razor.

RASP, to scrape, rub with a coarse file. (F., = O. H. G.) M. E. raspen, Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 1545. = O. F. rasper, mod. F. râper, to rasp. = O. H. G. raspón, whence mod. G. raspeln, to rasp, a frequentative form. Cf. O. H. G. hrespan, M. H. G. respen, to rake together. Der. rasper; and perhaps rapier. Also rasp-berry, q.v. RASP-BERRY, a kind of fruit. (F., - O. H. G.; and E.) The word berry is E.; see Berry. The old name was rastis-berry or raspise-berry; see Richardson. 'Raspo, a fruit or berie called raspise;' Florio. 'The raspis is called in Latin Rubus Idans;' Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xxiv. c. 14; the chapter is headed: 'Of Cynosbatos, and the raspice.' 'Ampes, raspises;' Cot. B. Raspice, raspise are corruptions of raspis (= raspès), which is nothing more than the old plural form, so that raspis = rasps, the word being at first used without berry, as shewn by the examples. Indeed, the prov. E. name is rasps, to this day; and rasps is used by Bacon, Essay 46. The word kex, q.v., is in a similar predicament. y. The Ital. raspo also means a rasp; and the name was given to the fruit from some supposed similarity to a rasp, prob. from the look of it, which is remarkably rough. See Rasp. named for a like reason; see Gooseberry. The goose-berry is

B.AT, a rodent quadruped. (E.) M. E. rat, or ratte, P. Plowman, B. prol. 200. – A. S. rat, Ælfric's Gloss., Nomina Ferarum; in Wright's Voc. p. 22, col. 2. + O. Du. ratte, 'a ratt;' Hexham; Du. rat. + Dan. rotte, + Swed. rdtta. + G. ratte, ratz. Cf. also Low Lat. ratus, rato, Ital. ratto, Span. rato, F. rat. Also Irish and Gael. radan, Bret. raz.

β. Perhaps from γRAD, to scratch; see Rodent. Cf. Skt. rada, a tooth, elephant; vajra-rada, a hog. Der. rat, verb, to desert one's party, as rats are said to leave a falling house. Also rat's-bane, ratten.

RATAFIA, the name of a liquor. (F., - Malay.) 'Ratafiaz, a delicious liquor made of apricocks, cherries, or other fruit, with their kernels bruised and steeped in brandy; Phillips, ed. 1710. — F. ratafia, the same; cf. F. tajia, rum-arrack. The right etymology is clearly that pointed out in Mahn's Webster. — Malay araq, 'arrack, a distilled spirit,' Marsden's Dict., p. 5; and táfia, 'a spirit distilled from molasses, (the French name for rum); araq bram tiffia, three kinds of spirit, enumerated in an old Malayan writing, id. p. 65. Again, at p. 39 of the same we find araq, bram, tisfia, arrack, bram, and rum. Omitting bram, we have araq tisfia, whence ratasia is an easy corruption, esp. when it is remembered that araq is also called raq, in Spanish raque, or in English rack; see Rack (5). β. The use of both words together is explicable from the consideration that araq is a very general term, and is not a true Malay word, being borrowed from Arabic; see Arrack. Thus ratafia means 'the rack (spirit) called tafia. See also Rum, sb.

RATCH, a rack or bar with teeth. (E.) 'Ratch, in clock-work, a wheel with twelve large fangs,' &c.; Phillips, ed. 1710. It is the wheel which makes the clock strike. The word is merely a weakened form of rack, in the sense of a bar with teeth, as in what is called 'the rack and pinion movement;' hence it came to mean also a kind of toothed wheel. See Rack (1). Hence also the dimin. ratch-et, in watch-work, 'the small teeth at the bottom of the fusee or barrel that stop it in winding up.' Doublet, rack (1).

RATE (1), a proportion, allowance, standard, price, tax. (F., -L.) In Spenser, F.Q. iv. 8. 19.—O. F. rate, price, value (Roquefort); not in Cotgrave. — Lat. ratum, neut., or rata, fem. of ratus, determined, fixed, settled, pp. of reor, I think, judge, deem. Both ratum and rata occur as sbs. in Low Latin.

B. The root appears to be RA, to fix, identical with AR, to fit; see Art (2). Der. rate, verb; rat-able, rat-able, rat-able-ness, rate-payer. And see ratio, ration, Der. rate, verb; reason, rat-i-fy.

RATE (2), to scold, chide. (Scand.?) In Shak. Merch. Ven. i. 3. 108. Usually supposed to be a peculiar use of the word above, as though to rate meant to tax, and so to chide. Observe the use of tax in the sense of 'to take to task.' But, if this were so, we should expect to find rate, to value, in earlier use; whereas, on the contrary, the present word seems to be the older of the two, being found in the 14th century. Palsgrave distinguishes between 'I rate one, I set one to his porcyon or stynte, and 'I rate or chyde one.' M.E. raten, to chide; 'He shal be rated of his studying' = he shall be scolded for RASHER, a thin slice of broiled bacon. (Scand.?) In Shak. to chide; 'He shall be rated of his studying' = he shall be scolded for Merch. Ven. iii. 5. 28. 'Rasker on the coales, qua' i rashly or his studying. Chaucer, C. T. 3463. Moreover, we find the compound verb araten, to reprove; see P. Plowman, B. xi. 98; 'rebuked and And KRAP, to make a noise, as in Lat. crepare, to rattle. See arated,' id. xiv. 163. - Swed. rata, to reject, refuse, slight, find fault with; whence ratgods, refuse of goods. So also Norw. rata, to reject, cast aside as rubbish; rat, rubbish, rata, adj. bad (Aasen.) Allied to Icel. hrat, hrati, rubbish, trash. Of obscure origin.

RATH, early, RATHER, sooner. (E.) Rather, sooner, earlier, is the comp. form of rath, soon, now obsolete. We also find rathest, somes. M.E. rath, early, ready, quick, swift, rathe, adv., soon; comp. rather; superl. rathest, soonest. 'Why rise ye so early, Chaucer, C.T. 3766. The word has lost an initial h, and stands for hrath. - A. S. hrave, adv., quickly, comp. hravor, superl. hravost; from the adj. hræv, hrev, also written hræd, hred, quick, swift, Grein, ii. 99, 100. + Icel. hradr, swift, fleet. + M. H. G. rad, hrad, quick. All from the Teut. base IIRATIIA, quick; Fick, Root uncertain; see Curtius, i. 188.

RATIFY, to sanction, confirm. (F.,-L.) In Levins; and in Skelton, Colin Clout, 716.-F. ratifier, to ratifie; Cot.-Low Lat. ratificare, to confirm.- Lat. rati-, for rate-, crude form of rates, fixed; and -ficare, for facere, to make. See Rate (1) and Fact. Der.

RATIO, the relation of one thing to another. (L.) Mathematical; in Phillips, ed. 1706. - Lat. ratio, calculation, relation. - Lat. ratus, determined, pp. of rear, I think, deem. See Rate (1). Doublets, RATION, rate or allowance of provisions. (F.,-L.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. - F. ration, a ration; see Littré. - Lat. rationem, acc. of ratio, a calculation, reckoning; so that a ration is a computed share for soldiers, &c., according to the reckoning of their number. - Lat. ratus, determined; see Rate (1). Der. ration-al, reasonable, Minsheu, ed. 1627, from F. rational, 'reasonable,' Cot.; hence, ration-al-ly, ration-al-ise, -ism, -ist, -ist-ic; ration-al-i-ty. Also ratio-cin-at-ion, Minsheu, from F. ratiocination, 'a discoursing, discussion,' from Lat. ratiocinationem, acc. of ratiocinatio, which from the pp. of ratiocinari, to reckon, compute, a verb formed from the sb. ratiocinium, a computation = ratio-ci-ni-um, formed by various suffixes from the base of ratio. Doublets, ratio, reason.

RATLINES, RATLINS, RATTLINGS, the small transverse ropes traversing the shrouds of a ship and forming a ladder. (Hybrid; E. and F., - L.) 'Rare-lines or Rattlings, in a ship, those lines with which are made the steps ladderwise to get up the shrouds, &c.; Phillips, ed. 1710. The origin is uncertain, but as the word appears to be truly English, it probably means rat-lines, a seaman's jocular name, as if forming ladders for the rats to climb by. See Rat and Line. β. The Du. word is weeflijn, i. c. weaving line or web-line, prob. because they cross the shrouds as if interwoven with them. There is a Dan. word rattine, but it means a tiller-rope, lit. a wheel-line, from Dan. rat, a wheel, and can hardly be connected. Rare-lines, i. e. thin lines, is obviously a corruption.

RATTAN, a Malacca cane. (Malay.) In Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1065, p. 95. Spelt ratan in Todd's Johnson. – Malay rótan, 'the rattan-cane. Calamus rotang;' Marsden's Dict., p. 152.

RATTEN, to take away a workman's tools for not paying his contribution to the trades' union, or for having offended the union. (F., - Low Lat., - Teut.) Modern; in Halliwell, and in Chambers' Dict., where the etymology is said to be unknown. But it is simple enough. The word is frequently heard in connection with Sheffield, where ratten is the local word for a rat. 'Ratten, a rat;' Hunter's Hallamshire Glossary. Hence to ratten is to rat, in connection with which we find, in Webster, 'ratting, the act of deserting one's former party, and going over to the opposite; also, the act of working for less than the established prices, a term used among printers. But the usual sense is 'to do secret mischief,' which is afterwards attributed to the rattens or rats. 'I have been rattened; I had just put a new cat-gut band upon my lathe, and last night the rats have carried it off;' Notes and Queries, 3 S. xii. 192; q. v. β. The prov. E. ratten is the same as M. E. raton, ratoun, a rat, P. Plowman, B. prol. 158. - F. raton, 'a little rat;' Cot. - Low Lat. ratonem, acc. of rato, the same as ratus, a rat; a word of Teut. origin. See Rat.

RATTLE, to clatter, to make a din. (E.) Put for hrattle, initial h being lost. M. E. ratelen, Arthur and Merlin, 7858 (Stratmann). - A.S. hrætelan*, only preserved in A.S. hrætele, hratele, or hrætelwyrt, rattle-wort, a plant which derives its name from the rattling of the seeds in the capsules; A.S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, iii. 333. + Du. ratelen, to rattle; ratel, a rattle. + G. rasseln, to rattle; rassel, a β. The form of the word is frequentative; and the sense is 'to keep on making a noise represented by the syllable hrat,' this syllable being of imitative origin. Cf. rat-a-lat-tat as the imitation of a knock at a door. So also Gk. κρότος, a loud knock, κροτεῖν, to knock, make to rattle, κροταλίζειν, to rattle. All from a KRAT, to knock; allied to KRAG, KLAG, to make a noise, as in Gk. κράζειν (=κράγ-νειν), Lat. clangor, and prov. E. rackle, to rattle; 190; rauissen, id. b. iv. pr. 5, l. 3774; b. i. met. 5, l. 504. — F. ravis:-, Fick, i. 538. Der. rattle, sb.; rattle-snake, a snake with a rattle at the end of its tail. Also rattle-traps, small knickknacks, from traps = goods; see Trap (2). Also rail (3).

RAUGHT, pt. t. and pp. of Reach, q. v.

RAVAGE, plunder, devastation, ruin. (F., -L.) The sb. is the more orig. word. Both sb. and verb are in Minsheu, ed. 1627. - F. ravage, 'ravage, havocke, spoil;' Cot. Formed, with the usual suffix -age (= Lat. -aticum), from rav-ir, to bear away suddenly; the sb. rav-age was esp. used of the devastation caused by storms and torrents; see Littré. — Lat. rapere, to seize, snatch, bear away; see Ravish. Der. ravage, vb., from F. ravager, 'to ravage,' Cot.;

RAVE, to be mad, talk like a madman. (F., - L.) M. E. raven, Chaucer, C. T. 16427. - O. F. raver, cited by Diez (s. v. rever), as a Lorraine word; the derivative ravasser, 'to rave, to talk idly,' is given in Cotgrave, who also explains resver (F. rever) by 'to rave, dote, speak idly. B. The word presents great difficulties; see rever in Diez and Scheler; but the solution offered by Diez is satisfactory, viz. that O. F. raver answers to Span. rabiar, to rave, both verbs being formed from the Low Lat. and Span. rabia, rage, allied to Lat. rabies, rage. Thus raver = Low Lat. rabiare *, from rabia. - Lat.

rabere, to rage. See Rage.

RAVEL, to untwist, unweave, entangle. (O. Du.) The orig. sense has reference to the untwisting of a string or woven texture, the ends of the threads of which become entangled together in a confused mass. To unravel is to disentangle, to separate the confused threads. 'The ravelled sleave [the entangled floss-silk] of care;' Mach. ii. 2. 37. To ravel out is not exactly to disentangle (as in Schmidt), but to unweave. 'Must I ravel out My weaved-up folly;' Rich. II, iv. 228; cf. Haml. iii. 4. 186; and see examples in Richardson. 'To ravell or untwist;' Minsheu, ed. 1627. Cf. 'I ryvell out, as sylke dothe, je riule; Palsgrave. - O. Du. ravelen, 'to ravell, or cadgell,' Hexham; he also explains verwerren by 'to embroile, to entangle, to bring into confusion or disorder, or to cadgill.' The same as mod. Du. rafelen, to fray out, to unweave; Low G. reffeln, to fray out, ravel, pronounced rebeln or rebbeln in Hanover and Brunswick (Bremen Wörterbuch). B. Of unknown origin; possibly connected with G. raffen, to snatch; cf. G. raffel, an iron rake, grate of flax; see ¶ The O. Du. ravelen, Du. revelen, to dote, from O.F. raver (see Rave), cannot be the same word. Der. un-ravel.

RAVELIN, a detached work in fortification, with two embankments raised before the counterscarp. (F., -Ital.) 'In bulwarks, rav'lins, ramparts of defence;' Ben Jonson, Underwoods, xiii, On the Poems of Sir J. Beaumont, l. 4. — F. ravelin, 'a ravelin;' Cot. Cf. Span. rebellin, l'ort. rebelim, Ital. rivellino, a ravelin.

β. It is supposed that the Ital. word is the original, as seems indicated by the old spelling in that language. - O. Ital. ravellino, revellino, 'a rauelin, a wicket, or a posterne-gate; also the uttermost bounds of the wals of a castle, or sconces without the wals;' Florio. y. But the origin of the Ital. word is unknown. The suggestion, from Lat. re-, back, and uallum, a rampart, is not quite satisfactory, as the old sense seems to be postern-gate; but it may be right.

RAVEN (1), a well-known bird. (E.) For hraven, an initial heing lost. M. E. raven, Chaucer, C. T. 2146. — A. S. hræfn, hrefn, a raven, Grein, ii. 100. + Du. raaf, raven. + Icel. hrafn. + Dan. ravn. + G. rabe, O. H. G. hraban. β. No doubt named from its cry. ■ KRAP, to make a noise; whence also Lat. crepare, to rattle.

¶ The crow is similarly named.

RAVEN (2), to plunder with violence, to devour voraciously. (F., - L.) Quite unconnected with the word above, and differently pronounced. The verb is made from an obsolete sb., viz. M. E. ravine, plunder, which accounts for the spelling ravin in Shak. Meas. for Meas. i. 2. 133. 'Foules of ravine' = birds of prey, Chaucer, Parl. of Foules, l. 323. So also ravyne, plunder, Ch. tr. of Boethius, b. i. pr. 4, l. 302; rauiner, a plunderer, id. b. i. pr. 3, l. 228. - O. F. ravine, rapidity, impetuosity (Burguy); mod. F. ravine; see Ravine. This O. F. ravine must orig. have had the sense of plunder, as in Latin .- Lat. rapina, plunder, pillage; see Rapine. Der. raven-ing; raven-ous, in Levins, from F. ravineux, 'ravenous, violent, impetuous, like a forcible stream,' Cot.; raven-ous-ly, -ness. Note that M. E. ravine, mod. E. ravine, and E. rapine are all one and the same word. RAVINE, a hollow gorge among mountains. (F.,-L.) Modern; added by Todd to Johnson. - F. ravine, a hollow worn away by floods; explained by Cotgrave to mean a great floud, a ravine or inundation of waters; shewing that, even in E., a ravine was a flood.

In still older French, it means impetuosity, violence. - Lat. rapina, plunder, hence violence; see Rapine. And see Raven (2).

ravish-ment, All's Well, iv. 3. 281, from F. ravissement, 'a ravishing, a ravishment,' Cot.

BAW, uncooked, unprepared, sore. (E.) For hraw, an initial heing lost. M. E. raw, K. Alisaunder, 4932.—A. S. hreaw; spelt hraw, Cockayne's Leechdoms, i. 254, l. 4. + Du. raanw. + Icel. hrar. + Dan. raa, raw, crude. + Swed. rd, raw, green. + O. H. G. rdo (declined as rawer, rouwer), M. H. G. rou, G. roh. β. Allied to Lat. crudus, raw, and to Skt. krúra, sore, cruel, hard. - VKRU, of which the fundamental notion is 'to be hard;' Curtius, i. 191. See Crude. Der. raw-ly, raw-ness, raw-boned.

BAY (1), a beam of light or heat. (F., -L.) The M. E. ray is used of striped cloth; see note to P. Plowman, C. vii. 217. The pl. 'rayes or beames' occurs in Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, b. ii. c. 12 (R.) - O. F. raye, 'a ray, line,' Cot.; mod. F. rai. Cf. Span. rayo, Ital. raggio. - Lat. radium, acc. of radius, a ray, radius. Root uncertain. Doublet, radius.

RAY (2), a class of fishes, such as the skate. (F., -L.) M. E. raye. 'Hec ragadia, raye;' Wright's Vocab. i. 222, col. 2, l. 2. - O. F. raye, 'a ray, skate,' Cot.; mod. F. raie. - Lat. rāia, a ray; Pliny, ix. 24.

β. The Lat. raia = ragya, cognate with G. roche, and É roach. The G. roche means (1) a roach, (2) a ray. See Roach.

RAYAH, a person, not a Mahometan, who pays the capitation-tax; a word in use in Turkey. (Arab.) It may be explained as 'subject,' though the real meaning is 'a flock,' or pastured cattle. Arab. rá'iyat (also rá'iyah), a flock; from rá'i, feeding, guarding, pasturing, ra'y, pasturing, feeding, tending flocks; Rich. Dict. pp. 716, 739. Doublet, ryot, from the form ra'iyat.

716, 739. Doublet, ryot, from the form ra tym.

RAZE, to lay level with the ground, destroy. (F., -L.) In Shak. Meas. ii. 2. 171. Also 'to graze, strike on the surface,' Rich. III. 3. 2. 11. Also 'to erase,' K. Lear, i. 4. 4. All various uses of the verb which is also spelt rase; see Rase. Der. raz-or, q. v., ras-ori-al, q. v. RAZOR, a knife for shaving. (F., - L.) M. E. rasour, Chaucer, C. T. 2419. - F. rasoir, 'a rasour,' Cot. Lit. 'a shaver;' from F. raser, to shave; see Rase, Raze. Der. razor-strop.

Lat. re-, red-, again. The form re- is most common, and is prefixed even to E. words, as in re-bellow, re-word (Shak.), but this is unusual; remarkable words of this class are re-ly (=relie), re-mind, re-new. The form red- occurs in red-eem, red-olent, red-dition. The true etymology of this prefix is still unsolved. ¶ As this prefix can be arbitrarily set before almost any verb, it is unnecessary to give all the words which are found with it. For the etymology of re-address, readjust, re-arrange, re-bellow, &c., &c., see the simple forms address, adjust, arrange, &c.

REACH (1), to attain, extend to, arrive at, gain. (E.) M. E. rechen, pt. t. raghte, raughte, pp. raught; P. Plowman, B. xi. 353; Chaucer, C. T. 136. We even find raught in Shak. L. L. L. iv. 2. 41. &c. - A.S. rácan, rácean, to reach; pt. t. rátte; Grein, ii. 364. + O. Friesic reka, retsia, resza. + G. reichen. β. The A. S. recan (=raikian) seems to mean 'to get into one's power,' and is connected with the sb. rice, power, answering to Goth. reiki, power, authority, and is from the same root as Rich, Regal, Right, &c.

y. It it still more closely connected with the rare sb. ge-réc, occasion, due time, occurring in Ps. ix. 9, ed. Spelman. This would give the orig. sense 'to seize the opportunity' or 'to attain to;' it comes to much the same thing. We may thus trace récan to the sb. réc (geréc), occasion, allied to rice, sb., power, and to the adj. rice, powerful; from Teut. base RAK = KAG, to rule. See Regal. Der. reach, sb., Oth. iii. 3. 219; also a 'stretch' of a river. And see rack (1), rank (2), rake (3).

REACH (2), to try to vomit; see Retch.

READ, to interpret, esp. to interpret written words. (E.) M. E. reden, pt. t. redde, radde, pp. red, rad; P. Plowman, B. iii. 334; Chaucer, C. T. 6371, 6373. A. S. rædan, to discern, advise, read; a weak verb, pt. t. rédde, pp. geréd, Grein, ii. 366. – A. S. réd, counsel, advice, id. 365. – A. S. rédan, to advise, persuade; a strong verb, with the remarkable reduplicated pt. t. reord. β. This strong verb answers to Goth. redan, in comp. garedan, to provide, a strong verb; also to Icel. ráda, to advise, pt. t. réd, pp. rádinn; also to G rathen, pt. t. rieth, pp. gerathen. Observe also G. berathen, to assist. y. All from Teut. base RAD, to assist, be favourable to. -'RADH, to be favourable to, assist; whence also Skt. radh, to make favourable, propitiate, to be favourable to, Russ. rade, ready, willing to help, Lithuan, rodas, willing, also as sh. counsel. See Fick, i. 170. Der. read-able, read-able, read-able-ness; read-er, read-ing, read-ing-book, read-ing-room. Also ridd-le.

stem of pres. part, of ravir, to ravish, snatch away hastily. Cf. Ital. — A. S. ræde, ready, Grein, ii. 366. [In this instance the suffix -e was rapire.—Lat. rapere, to snatch; but with a change of conjugation; turned into -i by confusion with the A.S. suffix -ig (answering to see Rapine, Rapid.

Der ravish-er, ravish-ing, Macb. ii. 1, 55; M. E. -i, y, E. -y); this may have been due to the influence of O. Swed. redig, plain, evident, clear, though this word is really from a different root, viz. from O. Swed. reda (= E. read), to explain. The O. Swed. adj. reda, ready, is the right cognate word, connected with reda, to prepare. So also Dan. rede, ready.]+O. H. G. reiti, ready; mod. G. bereit. β. The Icel. greiðr (= ga-reiðr), ready, only differs in the prefix and suffix; so also Goth. garaids, commanded. y. These adjectives are closely related to Icel. reidi, harness, outfit, implements, gear, and to O. H. G. reita, Iccl. reita, a raid. We may look upon ready as expressing either 'prepared for a raid' or 'prepared for riding, equipped.' All from a Teut. base RID (RAID), to ride; see Ride, Raid. The use of ready in the sense of 'dressed' is found as late as the beginning of the 17th century. 'Is she ready?' = is she dressed; Cymb. ii. 3. 86. Der. readi-ly, readi-ness, readymade

REAL (1), actual, true, genuine. (F., -L.; or L.) Spelt reall in Levins; and in Tandall's Works, p. 104, col. 1, l. 5, where it is opposed to nominall. M. E. real; Prompt. Parv. The famous disputes between Realists and the Nominalists render it probable that the word was taken immediately from the familiar Low Lat. realis rather from the O. F. real, 'reall,' given by Cotgrave. The mod. F. form is reel, also given by Cotgrave.

B. The Low Lat. realis, 'belonging to the thing itself,' is formed from re-, stem of res, a thing, with suffix -alis. Y. The etymology of res, property, substance, a thing, is by no means clear; it may be related to Skt. rú, to give. Der. real-ly; real-ise, from O. F. realiser, 'to realize,' Cot.; real-is-able; real-is-at-ion, from O. F. realisation, 'a realization, a making reall,' Cot.; real-ism, real-ist, real-ist-ic; real-i-ty, from F. réalité (Littré).

REAL (2), a small Spanish coin. (Span., -L.) In Swinburne's Travels through Spain (1779), letter 9, p. 56. — Span. real, lit. 'a royal' coin.—Lat. regalis, royal. See Regal.

REALGAR, red orpiment. (F., — Span., — Arab.) A term in chemistry and alchemy. Spelt resalgar, Chaucer, C. T. Group G, I. 814 (1. 16282).—F. realgar, of which there was prob. an O. F. form resalgar *, answering to the Low Lat. risigallum. - Span. rejalgar. -Arab. rahj al-ghir, powder of the mine, mineral powder. - Arab. rahj, dust, powder; al, the; and ghir, a cavern, hence a mine. See Rich. Dict., pp. 759, 1040. This etymology is due to Dozy; and see Devic, supp. to Littré.

REALM, a kingdom. (F.,-L.) M. E. roialne, Gower, C. A. iii.

99, 1. 3; ryalme, Sir Gawain and the Grene Knight, 1. 691; reaume, Will. of Palerne, 1964; realme, Rom. of the Rose, 495. - O. F. realme, reaume, roialme (Burguy); mod. F. royaume, a kingdom; answering to a Low Lat. form regalimen*, not found. - O. F. real, roial, mod. F.

ŘEAM, a bundle of paper, usually twenty quires. (F., - Span., -Arab.) In Skelton, Works, i. 131, 174; spelt reme, Spelt reame, in Minsheu, ed. 1627, and in Levins. We even find M. E. reeme in Prompt. Parv. p. 429. - O. F. raime, rayme (Littré), a ream; mod. F. rame. Palsgrave has: 'Reame of paper, ramme de papier.' - Span. resma, 'a reame of paper;' Minsheu. (Cf. Ital. risma.) - Arab. rizmat (pl. rizam), a bundle, esp. a bundle of clothes; Rich. Dict. p. 731. See Littre, Devic's supp. to Littre, and Scheler's note on Diez; all agree that this etymology has been completely established by Dory. Devic remarks that we even find the F. expression coton en rame, cotton in a bundle, and that it is hopeless to connect this, as Diez proposes, with the Gk. ἀριθμός, number. Cotton paper was manufactured in Spain, where it was introduced by the Moors.

REAP, to cut, as grain, gather a crop. (E.) M. E. repen, sometimes a strong verb; pt. t. rep, pl. ropen, P. Plowman, B. xiii. 374; pp. ropen, Chaucer, Leg. of Good Women, 74. — A. S. ripan, rypan (with the possible form repan); see Sweet's A. S. Reader, Glossary, and introduction; i or y is put for é, when é is a mutation of ea (eb). Cf. A. S. rip, ryp, a reaping, harvest; id. Allied to Du. rapen, to gather, reap, glean; G. raufen, to pluck; Goth. raupjan, to pluck, Mark, ii. 23; Luke, vi. 1.

B. Allied to words from a base RUP, which appears to be a variant of the Teut. base RUB, to break, and an unchanged form of \(\sqrt{RUP}, \) to break; see Rupture, Reave.

Der. reap-er, ripe.

REAR (1), to raise. (E.) M. E. reren, Rob. of Glouc. p. 28, l. 5.

-A. S. reren, to rear, Deut. xxviii. 30. The form reren stands for ressan, with the common substitution of r for s, and is cognate with the common substitution of r for s, and means to Icel. reisa (mod. E. raise). It is the causal of rise; and means to make to rise.' Thus ræran = ræsan = raisian, causal of risan. See Doublet, raise.

wining to help, Lithuan, rouns, wining, also as 85. Counsel. See Pick, 1.170. Der. read-able, read-able, read-able, read-able, read-able, read-ing-fook, read-ing-room. Also ridd-le.

F. ariere. - Lat. re-, prefix, back; and -tro, extension from Aryan suffix -TAR; see Schleicher, Compend. § 225. And see Re-. Der. rear-admiral, rear-guard, rear-rank; also rear-ward, q. v.

REAR (3), insufficiently cooked. (E.) For hrear. Obsolete, except provincially. M. E. rere. If they [eggs] be rere; Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 13.—A. S. hrer, half-cooked, A. S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, ii. 272. A connection with raw has been suggested, but it is very doubtful.

REARMOUSE, the same as Reremouse, q. v.

REARWARD, the rear-guard. (F.,-L. and G.) Spelt rereward, I Sam. xxix. 2, Isaiah lii. 12, Iviii. 8; this is merely the old spelling preserved. [Not to be read re-reward, as is sometimes done.] M. E. rerewarde, Gower, C. A. i. 220, l. 25; Morte Arthure, ed. Brock, 1430. Short for arere-warde, compounded of M. F. rebatre, 'to repell, repulse, beat or drive back again. - F. re-(=Lat. re-), back; and batre (mod. F. battre), to beat, from Lat. batere, popular form of batuere, to beat. Der. (from O. Cf. also rebato, rabato, a kind of ruff, Much Ado, iii. 4. 6, where the final -o seems to be an E. addition, as the word is not Span. or Ital., but French; from F. rabat, 'a rebatoe for a womans ruffe' (Cot.), which from rabattre, to lessen, put for re-abattre.

REBECK, a three-stringed fiddle. (F., -Ital., -Pers.) 'And the jocund rebecks sound; Milton, L'Allegro, 94. Hugh Rebeck is a proper name in Romeo, iv. 5. 135. An old woman is called 'an old rebekke,' and again, 'an old ribibe,' in Chaucer, C. T. 7155, 6959.—O. F. rebec, 'the fiddle tearmed a rebeck;' Cot. Also spelt rebebe (Roquefort).—Ital. ribecca, also ribebba, 'a rebeck, a croud, or a See Re- and Puff. Der. rebuff, verb.

REBUKE, to reprove, chide. (F., -L.) M. E. rebuken, P. Plowman, B. xi. 419. - O. F. rebouquer (13th cent., Littre), later reboucher, 'to dull, to blunt,' Cot. It was used of armour that turned back a weapon; hence, metaphorically, of refusing or turning aside a request (see an example in Littre, who adds that, in Normandy, they say rebouquer for to reject). - F. re-, back; and bouque, Picard form of F. bouche, the mouth, whence bouquer - F. boucher, 'to stop, obstruct, shut up, also to hoodwinke,' Cot. - Lat. re-, back; and bucca, the cheek, esp. the puffed cheek (hence, the mouth), which Fick (i. 151) connects with buccina, a trumpet, and Skt. bukk, to sound. — BUK, to puff, of imitative origin; from the sound of blowing.

¶ It will be seen that the sense of rebuke depends on that of boucher, to stop one's mouth, to obstruct; hence, to reject. But it is remarkable that the radical sense is 'to puff or blow back,' which is just the sense of to rebuff. Thus, to rebuke and to rebuff are, radically, much the same. Der. rebuke, sb., Sir Degrevant, 863;

REBUS, an enigmatical representation of words by pictures of things. (L.) 'As round as Gyges' ring, which, say the ancients, Was a hoop-ring, and that is, round as a hoop. Lovel. Excellent have beene the conceipt[s] of some citizens, who, wanting armes, have coined themselves certaine devices as neere as may be alluding to their names, which we call rebus; Henry Peacham (1634), The Gentleman's Exercise, p. 155, § 2, B. 3. It refers to representing names, &c., by things; thus a bolt and tun expresses Bolton; and so on.—Lat. rebus, by things, by means of things; abl. pl. of res, a thing; see Real.

Ellis, p. 712.-Lat. recantare, to sing back, re-echo, also to recant, recall (Horace, Od. i. 16. 27); the orig. sense was perhaps to reverse a charm. - Lat. re-, back; and cantare, to sing; see Re- and Chant. Der. recant-er, recant-at-ion. This throws some light on the word cant, and renders the derivation of cant from Lat. cantare more easy and probable; recant seems to have been the older word, and it was one of the commonest of words in the time of Mary.

RECAST, to cast or mould anew. (Scand.; with L. prefix.) Also, to throw back again; 'they would cast and recast themselves from one to another horse;' Florio, tr. of Montaigne, p. 155 (R.)

The orig. sense is 'beginning,' young. Der. recent-ly, -ness.

See Re- and Cognisance. a coined word.

RECESS, RECESSION; see Recede.

RECIPE, a medical prescription. (L.) In Phillips, ed. 1706; he rightly explains that it is so called because it begins with the word recipe, i. e. take so and so. - Lat. recipe, imp. sing. of recipere, to take. See Receive. So also recipi-ent, one who receives, from the stem of the pres. part. of recipere.

RECIPROCAL, acting in return, mutual. (L.) In King Lear, iv. 6. 267. Formed by adding -al to Lat. reciproc-us, returning, alternating, reciprocal; whence also O. S. récau (put for récian); 'bu ne récst' = thou carest not, Mark, xii. 14. + O. Sax. rókian.+M. H. G. ruochen, O. H. G. róhhjan, ruohhjan, to reck, heed, have a care for. β . The A. S. récan easily became récean, whence M. E. rekken. The é results, as usual, from δ followed by i in the next syllable. The verb is a denominative, i. e. from a sb. The sb. exists in M. H. G. ruoch, O. H. G. ruah, ruoh, care, heed, answering to a Teut. type ROKA, care, heed; Fick, iii. 249. From Teut. base RAK = Aryan RAG, occurring in Gk. αλέγειν (for ἀρέγειν), to have a care, heed, reck. Der. reck-less, A.S. recceleús, Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Pastoral Care, ed. H. G. rechenen, O. H. G. rehhanon; allied to M. H. G. rechen, O. H. G. rachjan, to declare, tell. And cf. Goth. rahnjan, to β. The Icel. rekja is to be referred to the sb. rök, neut. pl., a reason, ground, origin, cognate with M. H. G. racha, O. H. G. rahha, a thing, subject; and prob. with Gk. λόγος, discourse γ. From Teut. base RAK, to collect, whence E. Rake (1), q.v. From Aryan γ RAG, to collect; cf. Gk. λέγειν, and see Legend; Fick, iii. 249. But it is quite possible that some meanings of the various words above are due to the similar \checkmark RAG, to rule, whence Regal, Right. RECOGNISE, to know again, acknowledge. (F.,-L.) In Levins. The O.F. verb is recognoistre in Cot., mod. F. reconnaître. The E. verb is not immediately derived from this, but is merely made out of the sb. recognisance, which was in rather early use, and occurs in Chaucer as a legal term, C.T. 13260. - O.F. recoignisance (13th cent., Littré), later recognoissance, 'a recognizing, also an acknowledgement of tenure, Cot. RECONDITE, secret, profound. (L.) In Phillips, ed. 1706.—
Lat. reconditus, put away, hidden, secret; pp. of recondere, to put back again.—Lat re-, again; and condere, to put together. β. The Lat. condere (in which the prefix is con-, for com- = cum, with), is often referred to the VDHA, to put; but this root is represented in Latin by fac-ere. We must rather refer condere (pt. t. condidi) to dare (pt. t. dedi), to give; just as edere (pt. t. edidi) and addere (pt. t. addidi) may be referred to the same root, viz. DA, to give. Some confusion of the senses of the roots DA and DHA seems to have taken place in Latin; see Curtius, i. 316. The root of Abscond requires amendment accordingly.

RECONNOITRE, to survey, examine from a military point of view. (F., -L.) 'She reconnoitres fancy's airy band;' Young, Night Thoughts, Nt. ii. l. 265. - O. F. recognoistre (Cot.), reconoistre (Littré), mod F. reconnaître, to recognise; . . also, to take a precise view of; Cot. See Recognise. Der. reconnaiss-anc., from mod. F.

See Re- and Heart. Der. record, sb., Chaucer, C. T. 7631, from O. F. record,

"a record, witnesse," Cot.; record-er, record-er-ship.

RECOUNT, to tell again, narrate. (F., -L.) In Skelton, Philip Sparowe, l. 613. From Re- and Count. The F. conter often has the sense 'to relate;' the F. compound verb is written raconter, which Cotgrave explains by 'to tell, relate, report, rehearse.'

RECOUP, to diminish a loss by keeping back a part as a claim for damages. (F., - L., - Ck.) Spelt recoupe in Phillips, ed. 1706; whom see. It means lit. to secure a piece or shred. - F. recoupe, 'a shred,' Cot. - F. recouper, to cut again. - F. re- (= Lat. re-), again; and couper, to cut, a word of Gk. origin. See Re- and Coppice.

3. A difficult word; Vanicek connects it with Sabine cuprus, good; so that recuperare is 'to make good again;' again, he takes the orig. sense of cuprus to be 'desirable,' from cupre, Der. recover-able; recover-y, All's Well, iv. to desire; see Cupid. 1. 28. a coined word

RECREANT, cowardly, apostate. (F., - L.) M. E. recreant, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 9. 1. 24; recreaunt, P. Plowman, B. xviii. 100. — O. F. recreant, 'tired, toyled, faint-hearted,' Cot.; properly the pres. part. of recroire, 'to believe again; also, to restore, deliver, or give back; 'id. And cf. O. F. recreu, 'tired, wearie, faint-hearted,' id.

B. The pres. part. recreant and pp. recreu partook of the sense of Low Lat. recredere, from which F. recroire is derived. This verb, lit. to believe again, or to alter one's faith, was also used in the phrase se recredere, to own oneself beaten in a duel or judicial combat. The same sense reappears in Ital. ricreduto, 'a miscreant, recreant, or unbeleeving wretch;' Florio. - Lat. re-, again; and credere, to believe; see Re- and Creed.

RECRUIT, to enlist new soldiers. (F.,-L.) 'To recrute and maintain their army when raised;' Prynne, Treachery and Disloyalty, pt. iv. p. 33 (R.) 'A recruit [supply] of new people;' Howell, Famil. Letters, vol. i. pt. i. let. 38, § 7. — F. recruter, not given in Cotgrave, but explained by Littre by 'to levy troops.' He tells us that it is an ill-formed word, first found in the 17th century. Formed from recrute, a mistaken or provincial form for recrue, fem. of recru, pp. of recroitre, to grow again.

RECTITUDE, uprightness. (F., -L.) 'By the rectitude of his justice;' Golden Book, let. 11 (R.) - F. rectitude, omitted by Cotgrave, but used in the 14th cent. RED, one of the primary colours. (E.) M. E. reed (with long vowel), sometimes rede, red; Chaucer, C. T. 637. – A. S. redd, red; Grein, ii. 373. + Du. rood. + Icel. rauðr. + Dan. röd. + Swed. röd. + G. roth. + Goth. rauds. β. All from Teut. base RAUDA, red Fig. 70th. + Goth. rauds. p. All from fett, base RAUDA, red (Fick, iii. 257); the Lat. rufus, red, being a cognate form. From the base RUD, to redden, esp. with blood; appearing in the Icel. strong verb rjóba (pt. t. rauð), to redden. This base answers to Aryan γ RUDH, to redden, perhaps orig. to smear with blood; whence Skt. rudhira, blood, Gk. ερεύθειν, to redden, ερυθρώ, red, Irish and Gael. ruadh, W. rhudd, Lat. ruber, red, robigo, rust, &c. Der. red-ly, red-ness; redd-en (with -en as in strength-en, length-en); redd-ish, redd-ish-ness; red-breast (a bird with red breast), Skelton, Phillip Sparrow, 399, Lydgate, Floure of Curteisie, st. 9, in Chaucer's Works, ed. 1561, p. 348; red-shank (a bird with red shanks or legs); red-start (a bird with a red tail, from A.S. steort, a tail, Exod. iv. 4), in Levins; red-hot, red-heat, red-lead, red-letter, red-tape. Allied words are ruby, rubescent, rubric, ruddy, russet.

REDDITION, a rendering, restoring. (F., -L.) In Cotgrave; and Minsheu, ed. 1627. -F. reddition, 'a reddition;' Cot. -Lat. redditionem, acc. of redditio, a rendering, - Lat. redditus, pp. of reddere, to restore; see Render. Der. reddit-ive.

REDEEM, to ransom, atone for. (F.,-L.) Lit. to buy back. Latimer has redemed and redeming, sb., Seven Sermons, ed. Arber, p. 202. Wyclif has redempcion, Luke, i. 68. - F. redimer, 'to redeem, ransom,' Cot. [But the change of vowel is remarkable; perhaps partly due to accent, or to the influence of the sb. redemption. - Lat. redimere, to buy back, redeem. - Lat. red-, back; and emere, to buy, orig. to take, from & AM, to take. See Re- and Example. Der. redeem-er, redeem-able; redempt-ion, from F. redemption = Lat. acc. redemptionem, nom. redemptio, from redempt-us, pp. of redimere;

REDOUBT, an intrenched place of retreat. (Ital., -L.) Used by Bacon, according to Todd's Johnson, but no reference is given. Phillips, ed. 1706, gives the spellings reduit (which is the F. form) and reduct (which is Latin). — Ital. ridotto, 'a withdrawing place;' Florio. Formed as sb. from ridotto, 'reduced, brought or led vnto, brought back safe and sound againe;' Florio. This is the same word as ridutto, pp. of ridure, to bring back, bring home. — Lat. reducere, to bring back; see Reduce.

¶ The spelling redoubt is due to confusion with O. F. redoubter, to dread, as if a redoubt were a place into which men retire out of fear! See Redoubtable.

REDOUBTABLE, terrible. (F., -L.) In Cotgrave; the verb to redoubt, to fear, was formerly in use, as in Minsheu. M. E. redoutable, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. iv. pr. 5, l. 3763. — O. F. redoubtable, 'redoubtable,' Cot. — O. F. redoubter, to fear; orig. form redouter. See Re- and Doubt.

REEF (1), a ridge of rocks. (Du.) Formerly riff. 'A riff or ridge of rocks;' Dampier's Voyages, vol. i. an. 1681 (R.) Of late introduction. - Du. rif, a reef, riff, sand. Sewel (ed. 1754) explains introduction. — Du. ry, a reet, ini, sand. Sewel (ed. 1754) explains it by 'a flat in sea, a riff.' Hexham has rif, riffe, 'a foard, or a shallow place.' + Icel. rif, a reef in the sea; cf. rifa, a rift, rent, fissure. + Dan. rev, a reef, bank; cf. revle, a shoal; revne, to crack, split. Note also Swed. refva, a strip, cleft, gap, refvel, a sand-bank. The G. riff, a reef, is prob. borrowed from Dutch.

3. The orig. notion seems to be either 'strip' or 'rift;' it seems to be connected with Icel. rifa, to rive, and to be derived from the pl. of the past tense, of which the base is rif. See Rift, Rive. Der. reef-y.

REEF (2), a portion of a sail that can be drawn close together. (Du.) Fully explained in Phillips, ed. 1706. 'Up, aloft, lads; come, reef both topsails;' Dryden, Enchanted Island, Act i. sc. 1 (R.) M. E. riff, Gower, C. A. iii. 341, l. 21. — Du. reef, 'a riff in a sail;' Sewel, ed. 1754. O. Du. rif, also rift (Kilian). 'Een rif van een zeyl inbinden, to binde up a peece of a saile when the wind blows too hard; Hexham. Hence is formed Du. reven, to reeve. + Low G. reff, riff, a little sail, which is added to a large one when there is little wind; cf. reffen, to reeve. + Swed. ref, a reef; refva, to reeve. + Dan. reb, a reef; rebe, to reeve. + Icel. rif, a reef in a sail. β. Of uncertain origin; it is usual to compare A.S. ryft, a veil, Levit. iv. 17; but Ettmüller accents this word as ryft, and connects it with E. reave. It seems simpler to connect it with rift, with the orig. notion of strip. The Icel. rif means (1) a rib, (2) a reef or rock, (3) a reef in a sail; cf. also rifrildi, a shred.

y. I suppose reef (1) and reef (2) to be the same word, in the sense of 'rift' or 'strip;' and that both are to be connected with rive. Surrey writes ryft for reef (of a sail); Praise of Meane Estate, last line, in Tottell's Misc., ed. Arber, p. 28, l. 4; cf. O. Du. rift above. Sec Rive. Der. reef, verb; also reeve, verb, q. v.

REEE, vapour, smoke. (E.) M. E. reke, Cursor Mundi, 2744; where the Trinity MS. has reech. – A. S. réc, vapour; Grein, ii. 360.+ Du. rook.+Icel. reykr.+Swed. rök.+Dan. rög.+G. rauch; O. H. G. B. From the Teut. base RUK, to smoke, reek, appearing rouk. in the strong A. S. verb redcan, to reek (pt. t. redc., pl. rucon, Lye); as also in the Icel. verb rjûka (pt. t. rauk, pl. ruku), and in the G. riechen, O. H. G. riohhan.

y. This Teut. base answers to an Aryan base RUG, prob. allied to ARAG, to dye, to colour, whence Skt. raja, rajas, dimness, sky, dust, pollen, rajani, night, and the verb ranj, to dye, as well as Goth. rikwis, darkness, and Icel. rökr, twilight. If so, the orig. sense of reek is 'that which dims,' mist. See REEL (1), a small spindle for winding yarn. (E.) M. E. rele.

'Hoc alabrum, a rele;' Wright's Voc., p. 269, col. 1. At. p. 180 of the same vol., alabrum is again glossed by reele. — A. S. hreol; alibrum (sic), hred; 'Wright's Voc. p. 59, col. 1. Ducange explains the Low Lat. alabrum as a reel. Cf. Icel. hræll or ræll, a weaver's rod or sley. It is doubtful whether the A. S. and Icel. forms should have an initial h. Root unknown. Der. reel, verb, M. E. relien, relen, orig. to wind on a reel (P. Plowman, C. x. 81, Prompt. Parv.), hence to turn round and round (Allit. Poems, C. 147), and so to REEVE (1), to pass the end of a rope through a hole or ring. (Du.) A nautical word; not in Todd's Johnson. - Du. reven, to reeve. - Du. reef, a reef; because a reeved rope is used for reefing. See Reef (2). ¶ The pt. t. is usually rove; but this is a mere invention, as the verb, like all other verbs derived from sbs., is properly a weak one.

REED'S (2), an officer, steward, governor. (E.) See Chaucer's Reve's Tale. — A. S. gereja, an officer, governor; Grein, i. 441. The orig. sense is simply 'excellent' or 'iamous;' formed (by the

See Ro- and Fact. Der. refectory, Dryden, Hind and Panther, iii. 530, spelt refectorie in Minsheu, from Low Lat. refectorium, a hall for meals in a convent.

REFEL, to refute. (L.) In Shak. Meas. v. 94; and Palsgrave.

Lat. refellere, to shew to be false, refute.—Lat. re-, back again, in reply; and fallere, to deceive, &c. See Re- and Fail, False.

REFER, to reduce, assign, direct to an umpire. (F.,—L.) 'Referre you' = betake yourself; Henrysoun, Test. of Creseide, st. 43.

O. F. referre (14th cent., Littré), F. réferer, to refer.—Lat. referre, to bear back, refate, refer. = Lat. re-, back; and ferre, cognate with E. bear. See Re- and Bear (1). Der. refer-able, also spelt referr-ible (see exx. in Richardson); refer-ee, in which the suffix answers to F.pp. suffix -é, as in other cases; refer-ence, Oth. i. 3. 238; refer-end-ar-y, i. e. a referee, Bacon, Essay 49, from F. referendaire, which see in Cotgrave. REFINE, to purify, make elegant. (F., -L.) In Spenser, Hymn 2, 1.47. Coined from re- and fine, but imitated from F. raffiner, 'to refine,' Cot. The F. raffiner is from re- and affiner, 'to refine, to fine as metalls,' Cot.; where af- = Lat. af-, put for ad, to, before f following; also finer is due to F. fin, fine. The E. word ignores the second element. See Re- and Fine (1). Der. refiner. refin-er-y; also refine-ment, imitated from F. raffinement, 'a refining, Cot.

REFLECT, to throw or bend back, to ponder, think. (L.) In Shak. Rich. III, i. 4. 31. 'I reflecte, as the sonne beames do; Palsgrave. [The sb. reflexion is in Chaucer, C. T. 10544.] — Lat. reflectere, to bend backwards. - Lat. re-, back; and flectere, to bend. Ro- and Floxible. Der. reflecting; reflector; reflective, also reflexive, from F. reflexif, 'reflexive, reflexing,' Cot.; reflectively, ness; reflex, adj., from Lat. reflexus, pp. of reflectere; reflexible, reflex-ibil-i-ty REFLUENT, flowing back. (L.) Rare; a late word, not in Phillips. - Lat. refluent-, stem of pres. part. of refluere, to flow back. -Lat. re-, back; and fluere, to flow; see Re- and Fluent. Der. reflux, sb., in Phillips, ed. 1706, from F. reflux, 'the ebbe of the sea,' Cot.; see Flux.

REFORM, to shape anew, amend. (F., -L.) M. E. reformen, Gower, C. A. i. 273, last line. - F. reformer, 'to reforme,' Cot. - Lat. re-, again; and formare, to form, from forma, form; see Re- and Form. Der. reform-er; reform-at-ion, Skelton, Garland of Laurel, 411, from F. reformation, reformation, Cot. = Lat. acc. reformationem, from reformatus, pp. of reformare; reform-at-ive, reform-

REFRACT, to bend aside rays of light. (L.) 'Visual beams refracted through another's eye;' Selden, Introd. to Drayton's Polyolbion (R.) - Lat. refractus, pp. of refringere, to break back, hence, to turn aside. - Lat. re-, back; and frangere, to break, cognate with E. break; see Re- and Break. Der. refract-ion, Chapman, turn aside. — Lat. re-, back; and frangere, to dreak, cognate with E. break; see Re- and Break. Der. refract-ion, Chapman, Monsieur D'Olive, Act ii. sc. 1 (Vandome's 6th speech), from F. refraction, 'a rebound,' Cot.; refract-ive, refract-ive-ness. Also refract-or-y, Troil. ii. 2. 182, a mistaken form for refractary, from F. refractarie, 'refractary,' Cot. = Lat. refractaries, stubborn, obstinate. Hence refract-or-i-ly, refract-or-i-ness. Also refrang-ible, a mistaken form for refring-ible, from Lat. refringere; refrang-ible-i-i-v. Phillins. ed. 1706: cf. mod. F. refrang-ible, riftrangible, riftrangible, riftrangible. ibil-i-ty, Phillips, ed. 1706; cf. mod. F. réfrangible, réfrangibilité; but it is quite possible that the F. words were borrowed from English works on optics. And see refrain (2).

REFRAIN (1), to restrain, forbear. (F., -L.) M.E. refreinen, refreynen; Wyclif, James, i. 26. - F. refreiner, to bridle, repress."

Cot. [Cf. E. ordain - F. ordener.] - Lat. refrenare, to bridle, hold in with a bit. - Lat. re-, back; and frēnum, a bit, curb, pl. frēna, curb and reins, a bridle. β. The Lat. fre-num is from Δ DHAR, to support, maintain, whence also Skt. dhri, to support, maintain, and Lat. firmus, firm: The sense is 'holder' or 'keeper,' from its restraint upon the horse. See Re- and Firm. As Littré well remarks, Cotgrave also has O. F. refreindre, 'to brille, restraine, hold in;' this is from Lat. refringere, to break back, and it seems probable that refrener and refreindre were sometimes confused; see Refract and Refrain (2).

REFRAIN (2), the burden of a song. (F., -L.) M. E. refraine, Chaucer, Troil. ii. 1571. The sb. refraining, i. e. singing of the burden of a song, occurs in the Rom. of the Rose, 749. = F. refrain; refrain d'une balade, the refret, or burden of a ballade, Cot. Cf. Prov. refranks, a refrain, refranker, to repeat (Bartsch); Port. refrão. Span. refran, a proverb, short saying in common use. So called from usual change from o to e or long o) from A.S. rof, active, excellent, frequent repetition; the O.F. refreindre, to hold in, pull back (Cosgrave), is the same word as Prov. refrenher, to repeat; both are alis. Lat. regere, to rule. ARAG, to stretch, to govern; Fick, i. from Lat. refringere, to break back, hence, to pull back (and so to 739; whence Skt. ráj, to govern, rij, to stretch, Gk. opéyeiv, to come back to, to repeat).

B. So also the O. F. refret, used in the same sense (whence E. refret as in Cotgrave above), is from the Lat. refractus, pp. of refringere; see Refract. 7. It is probable that F. refrain was borrowed from Provençal rather than from Lat. directly.

REFRESH, to enliven, revive. (F., - L. and G.) M. E. refreshen, refreschen; Chaucer, C. T. 5620; Gower, C. A. iii. 25, l. 16.—O. F. refreschir, 'to refresh, coole;' Cot.—F. re- (=Lat. re-), again; and O. F. frez (fem. fresche), 'new, fresh, recent,' Cot.

3. The O. F. frez, mod. F. frais, is from O.H. G. frise (G. frisch), cognate with E. fresh, q. v.

The element fresh is, in fact, also native English; but the compound refresh was nevertheless borrowed from French, as shewn further by the early use of the derived sb. refreshment. Der. refresh-ment, in the Testament of Love, pt. ii (according to Richardson), shortened from O.F. refreschissement, 'a refreshment, REFRIGERATE, to cool. (L.) 'Their fury was asswaged and refrigerate; 'Hall, Chronicle, Henry VII, an. 4; where it is used as a pp.—Lat. refrigeratus, pp. of refrigerare, to make cool again.—Lat. re-, again; and frigerare, to cool, from friger.—frigor, stem of frigus, sb., cold. See Re- and Frigid. Der. refrigerator, refrigeration, refrigerative, refrigerator-y; also refrigerant, from the stem of the pres. part. of refrigerare.

REFUGE, a shelter, retreat. (F., -L.) M. E. refuge, Chaucer, C. T. 1722. - F. refuge, 'a refuge,' Cot. - Lat. refugium, an escape, a refuge. - Lat. refugere, to flee back, retreat. - Lat. re-, back; and fugere, to flee. See Re- and Fugitive. Der. refug-ee, Dryden, tr. of Juvenal, Sat. iii. 129, from F. refugié, pp. of se refugier, to take REFULCIENT, shining, brilliant. (L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627.

-Lat. refulgent-, stem of pres. part. of refulgere, to shine back, glitter.—Lat. re-, back; and fulgere, to shine. See Re- and Fulgent. Der. refulgent-ly, refulgence.

REFUND, to repay. (L.) 'Refund, to melt again, reflow, cast out again, pay back;' Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674. [The sense answers to that of O. F. refonder, 'to restore, pay back,' Cot. It was, not improbably, borrowed from French, and accommodated to the Lat. spelling.] - Lat. refundere, to pour back, restore. - Lat. re-, back; and fundere, to pour. See Re- and Fuse (1). Perhaps allied to refuse, q. v.

REFUSE, to reject, deny a request. (F., -L.) M. E. refusen, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 103, l. 21. - F. refuser, 'to refuse, Cot. Cf. Port. refusar, Span. rehusar (for refusar), Ital. rifusare. B. Of disputed origin. Diez supposes it to have arisen as another form of refute (Lat. refutare), by confusion with Lat. recusare, to refuse, which passed into French in the form reuser, afterwards shortened to ruser; see Ruse.

y. But Scheler well suggests that F. refuser may answer to a Low Lat. form refusere*, a frequentative form of refuser to a low Lat. quentative form of refundere (pp. refusus). The Lat. refundere meant to pour back, repay, restore, give back; and the sense of 'refusing' may have arisen from giving back a present.

5. Or again, since F. refus meant not only 'a refusal' but also 'refuse, outcasts, leavings' (Cotgrave), it may be that refuse, as a sb., meant what was rejected in fusing metals, and was used for being re-fused or fused again. It is remarkable that Florio gives no verb rifusor, but only the sb. rifuso, 'a refusall,' with the adverb a rifuso, 'careleslie, refusingly, heedlesslie.'

6. For the origin of refute, see that word. e. For the origin of refute, see that word. For the etymology of refundere, see Refund. Either way, the root is GHU, to pour. Der. refuse, sb. (Levins), M. E. refuce, Prompt. Parv., from F. refus, as above. Also refus-al (Levins), in which the suffix was added by analogy with propos-al, &c.

REFUTE, to oppose, disprove. (F., -L.) In Minsheu, ed.

1627. - F. refuter, 'to refute, confute,' Cot. - Lat. refutare, to repel, repress, rebut, refute. The orig. sense was probably 'to pour back.'

See Re- and Confute; also Futile. Der. refut-able; refut-at-orig. from F. refutation, 'a refutation,' Cot.; refut-at-or-y, from Lat. adj.

REGAIN, to gain back. (F., -L., and O. H.G.) In Hall's Chron. REGAIN, to gain back. (F., = L., and O. H.G.) In Hall's Chron. Hen. VI, an. 15 (R.) = O. F. regaigner, 'to regaine;' Cot. = F. re(= Lat. re-, again); and O. F. gaigner (F. gagner), to gain, a word of German origin, as shewn under Gain (2). It is clear that regain is merely the O. F. regaigner; and hence regain is not a compound of re- with gain in the orig. sense of 'profit.' The latter is a Scand. word, as explained under Gain (1).

REGAI, royal, kingly. (F., -L.) Regall occurs as a sb. in The Plowman's Tale, st. 19; but as an adj. not (perhaps) much earlier than in Levins, ed. 1570. = O. F. regal, 'regall, royal,' Cot. = Lat. regals, 'stem of res. a king with suffice.

than in Levins, ed. 1570. - O. F. regal, 'regall, royal,' Cot. - Lat. of regio, a direction, line, boundary, territory. - Lat. regere, to rule, regalis, royal, kingly. - Lat. reg-, stem of rex, a king, with suffix direct. See Regal.

739; whence Skt. ráj, to govern, rij, to stretch, Gk. ôpéyes, to stretch, Goth, uf-rakjan, to stretch out, &c. Cf. Skt. rájan, a king. Der. regal-ly, regal-i-ty; also regal-ia, q.v. From the same root are numerous words, such as cor-rect, di-rect, e-rect, rect-itude, rectify, rect-or; rajah; reach, right, rack (1); rig-id, reg-ent, regi-cide, regiregriment, regriment, regrine, se regaler, to make as much account of himself as if he were a king; evidently in order to connect the word with F. régal, regal, royal: but the word was in use in F. in the 14th century as a ransitive verb; see Littré.

B. The connection with regal is almost certainly wrong; but the word offers great difficulties. Minsheu's Span. Dict. gives regalar, 'to cocker, to make much of, to melt.' Diez takes the sense 'to melt' to be the orig. one; whence to warm, cherish, entertain, He makes the Span. regalar = Lat. regelare, to thaw, to melt, supposing that it was a very old word, adopted at a time when g had the same sound before both a and b. adopted at a time when g had the same sound before both a and ε. γ. The Lat. regelare is from re., again, back, and gelare, to freeze; the orig. sense being 'to unfreeze,' i. e. to thaw. See Re- and Gelatine.

5. But Scheler inclines to connect regale with O. F. galer, to rejoice; cf. Span. gala, parade; see Gala. This seems the simpler solution. See further in Diez and Littré. Der. regale-ment.

REGALIA, insignia of a king. (L.) Merely Lat. regalia, lit. royal things, neut. pl. of regalis, royal; see Regal.

REGARD, to observe, respect, consider. (F., - L. and O. H. G.)

In Palsgrave, spelt regarde. The sb. regard seems to be in earlier use in E., occurring in Chaucer, in the phr. at regard of, Pers. Tale, (Six-text, Group I, 788); but the verb is the orig. word in French. – F. regarder, 'to look, eye, see, view;' Cot. – F. re-, again; and garder, 'to keep, heed, mark;' Cot. See Re- and Guard. Der. regard, sb., as above; regard-er; regard-ful; regard-ful-ly, Timon, iv. 3. 81; regard-less, regard-less-ly, -ness. Doublet, reward, vb.

REGATTA, a rowing or sailing match. (Ital.) Properly a rowing match; a Venetian word, as explained in the quotation from Drummond's Travels, p. 84, in Todd's Johnson; a book which Todd dates A.D. 1744, but Lowndes in 1754. – Ital. regatta, rigatta, 'a strife or contention for the maistrie;' Florio. Cf. O. Ital. rigattare, to wrangle, sell by retail as hucksters do, to contend, to cope or fight;' Florio. This is allied to Span. regatear, to haggle, retail provisions, also to rival in sailing (Neuman); Span. regateo, a haggling, a regatta. β. Referred in Mahn's Webster to Ital. riga, a line; but I do not see any connection. Rather, O. Ital. rigatture is put for Ital. recatare, to retail. So also Span. regatear is for recatear, to haggle, to proceed slowly; prob. allied to recatar, to take care, be cautious, compounded of re-, again, and catar, to taste, try, view. Lat. captare. See Re- and Cater.

REGENERATE, to renew, produce anew. (L.) In Levins. -Lat. regeneratus, pp. of regenerare, to generate again. - Lat. re-, again; and generare; see Re- and Generate. Der. regeneration, M. E. regeneracioun, Wyclif, Matt. xix. 28, from O. F. regeneration (14th cent., Littré) = Lat. acc. regenerationem; regenerat-ive.

REGENT, invested with authority for an interim period. (F.,-L.) In Skelton, Against the Scottes, l. 114. - F. regent, 'a regent, protector, vice-gerent;' Cot. - Lat. regent, stem of pres. part. of regere, to rule. See Regal. Der. regent-ship; also regenc-y, formed with suffix -y from F. regence, 'the regency,' Cot.

1. The former is the older sense. 'Regicide, a king-(F., =L.) 1. The former is the older sense. Regicide, a king-killer; Minsheu. = F. regicide, omitted by Cotgrave, but cited by Minsheu. Coined from Lat. regi-, crude form of rex, a king; and matricide, a slayer, as in fratri-cida, matri-cida. See Fratricide, Matricide, Parricide. 2. The latter answers to a word coined from Lat. regi- and -cidium, a slaying. Der. regicid-al.

REGIMEN, a prescribed rule, rule of diet. (L.) In Philips, ed. 1706. - Lat. regimen, guidance; formed with suffix -men from regere, to rule; see Regal.

REGIMENT, a body of soldiers commanded by a colonel. F.,-L.) Shak has it in this sense, All's Well, ii. 1, 42; and also in the sense of 'government,' or sway; Antony, iii. 6. 95. In the latter sense, the word is old, and occurs in Gower, C. A. i. 218, 1. 9.—F. regiment, 'a regiment of souldiers,' Cot. In older F., it meant 'government;' see Littré.—Lat. regimentum, rule, government; formed with suffixes -men-to- (Aryan -man-ta) from regere, to rule;

see Regimen, Rogal. Der. regiment-al.

REGION, a district, country. (F.,-L.) M. E. region, King
Alisaunder, l. 82. - F. region, 'a region,' Cot. - Lat. regionem, acc. M. E. regioun, King REGISTER, a written record of past events. (F., -L.) M. E. A. S. hrán, in Ælfred's tr. of Orosius, i. 1. § 15. [The A.S. hrán registre, P. Plowman, B. xx. 269. - F. registre, 'a record, register;' would give a form rôn, just as stán gives E. stone.] Cf. O. Swed. ren, Cot. Cf. Ital. and Span. registro, Port. registro, registo, the last registre, P. Plowman, B. xx. 269. - F. registre, 'a record, register;' Cot. Cf. Ital. and Span. registro, Port. registro, registo, the last being the best form. - Low Lat. registrum, more correctly regestum, a book in which things are recorded (regeruntur); see Ducange. -Lat. regestum, neut. of regestus, pp. of regerere, to record, lit. to bring back.—Lat. re., back; and gerere, to bring; see Re- and Jest. Der. register, verb, L. L. L. i. 1. 2, and in Palsgrave; registr-ar, M. E. registrere, P. Plowman, B. xix. 254; registr-ar-ship; registrary (I) ow Let registrary registres. registr-ar-y (Low Lat. registrar-ius); registr-y; registr-at-ion.

REGNANT, reigning. (L.) Mere Latin. = Lat. regnant-, stem of pres. pt. of regnare, to reign. - Lat. regnum, a kingdom; see

Der. regnanc-y.

REGRESS, return. (L.) In Shak. Merry Wives, ii. 1. 226; and in Minsheu, ed. 1627. - Lat. regressus, a return. - Lat. regressus, pp. of regredi, to go back. - Lat. re-, back; and gradi, to go. See Reand Grade. Der. regress, verb; regress-ion (Lat. regressio);

REGRET, sorrow, grief. (F., - L. and O. Low G.) As a verb, the word is late; it is used by Cotton (R.), and occurs in Pope, Epitaph on Fenton, 1.8. In old authors, it is only used as a sb., as in Spenser, F. Q. i. 7. 20. 'Hie regrate And still mourning;' Henrysoun, Test. of Creseide, st. 57. - F. regret, 'desire, wille, also griese, sorrow; Cot. He also gives: à regret, 'loathly, unwillingly, with an ill stomach, hardly, mauger his head, full sore against his will;' Cot. Cf. regretter, 'to desire, affect, wish for, bewaile, bemoane, lament;' The F. regretter corresponds to an O. F. regrater, of which Scheler cites two examples. β. The etymology is much disputed; but, as the word occurs in no other Romance language, it is prob. of Teut. origin, the prefix re- being, of course, Latin. Perhaps from the verb which appears in Goth. grétan, to weep, Icel. gráta, to weep, bewail, mourn, Swed. grâta, Dan. græde, A.S. grætan, M. E. greten, Lowland Sc. greit. See Groot (2). Wedgwood well cites from Palsgrave: 'I mone as a chylde doth for the wantyng of his nourse or mother, je regrete.' γ. This is approved by Diez and Scheler; Littré suggests a Lat. form regradus, the return (of a disease), to suit the Walloon expression li r'gret d'an mau = the return of a disease. Mahn suggests Lat. re- and gratus, pleasing. Others suggest Lat. requiritari, but quiritari became F. crier; sec Cry. See the whole discussion in Scheler. Der. regret, verb, as above; regret-ful, regret-ful-ly.

REGULAR, according to rule. (L.) 'And as these canouns regulers,' i.e. regular canons; Rom. of the Rose, 6696. Rather directly from Lat. regularis than from O. F. regulier. - Lat. regula, a rule. - Lat reg-ere, to rule, govern; see Regal. Der. regular-ly; regular-i-ty, from O. F. regularité (14th cent., Littré); regul-ate, from Lat. regulatus, pp. of regulare; regul-at-ion, regulat-ive, regulat-or.

REHEARSE, to repeat what has been said. (F., - L.) M. E. rehercen, rehersen; P. Plowman, C. xviii. 25; A. i. 22. - O. F. reherser, 'to harrow over again,' Cot.; better spelt rehercer. From the sense of harrowing again we easily pass to the sense of 'going again over the same ground,' and hence to that of repetition. Cf. the phrase 'to rake up an old story.' - F. re- (= Lat. re-), again; and hereer, 'to harrow,' Cot., from herce, a harrow. The sb. herce, whence E. hearse, changed its meaning far more than the present word did; see Reand Hearse. Der. rehears-al, spelt rehersall in Palsgrave.

REIGN, rule, dominion. (F., -L.) M. E. regne, Chaucer, C. T. 1638; spelt rengne, King Horn, ed. Lumby, 901, 908. – F. regne, 'a realme,' Cot. – Lat. regnum, a kingdom. – Lat. reg-ere, to rule; see Rogal. Der. reign, verb, M. E. regnen, Havelok, 2586, from F. regner = Lat. regnare. And see regn-ant.

REIMBURSE, to refund, repay for a loss. (F., -L. and Gk.) In Cotgrave; and in Phillips, ed. 1706. An adaptation of F. rembourser, made more full in order to be more explicit; the F. prefix rem- answering to Lat. re-im-, where im- stands for in before b following. 'Rembourser, to re-imburse, to restore money spent;' Cot. For the rest of the word, see Purse. Der. reimburse-ment, from F. rembursement, 'a re-imbursement;' Cot.

REIN, the strap of a bridle. (F., -L.) M. E. reine, reyne, King Alisaunder, 786. - O. F. reine, 'the reigne of a bridle;' Cot. Mod. F. rêne. The O.F. also has resne, resgne, corresponding to Ital. redina, and to Span rienda (a transposed form, put for redina); and these further correspond to a Low Lat. type retina*, not found, but easily evolved from Lat. retinere, to hold back, restrain, whence was formed the classical Lat. retinaculum, a tether, halter, rein. See Retain. Der. rein, verb, rein-less.

REINDEER, RAINDEER, a kind of deer. (Scand., - Lapp;

all of which, as in E. and Scand., the main part of the word is borrowed from Lapp, with a change of meaning.

B. Diez refers us to the Lapp and Finnish word raingo, but this is a mere misspelling β. Diez refers us of Swed. renko, lit. 'rein-cow,' the female of the reindeer. The true Lapp word for reindeer is patso, but it happens to be continually associated with reino, pasturage or herding of cattle, or with derivatives of reino; so that reino was wrongly applied by the Swedes to the animal itself. For proof of this, see Ihre, Lexicon Lapponicum, p. 374; where we find reino, pasturage; reinohet, to pasture; reinohatte, frequentative of reinohet; reinohem piädnak, a dog kept for the purpose of collecting reindeer together. Hence such sentences as the iollowing. Lapp reinon lüh mija patsoh, Swed. vara renar aro i her-darnes skötsel, our herdsmen are taking care of the reindeer, or, our reindeer are in charge of the herdsmen. Lapp patsoit warin reinohet, to pasture reindeer on the fells. Lapp reinohatte swainasebt patsoitat, Swed. Idi din dreng valla din renar, let thy servant pasture thy rein-deer. This is the solution of a difficulty of long standing.

REINS, the lower part of the back. (F., -L.) M. E. reines; spelt reynes in Wyclif, Wisdom, i. 6, later version; reenus, earlier version .- O. F. reins, 'the reines;' Cot. - Lat. renes, s. pl., the kidneys, reins, loins. Allied to Gk. φρήν, the midriff; pl. φρένεε, the parts about the heart, or about the liver. See Frenzy. Der. ren-al. ISSUE, REITERATE; see Instate, Invest, &c.

REJECT, to throw away or aside. (F., -L.) 'I rejecte, I caste awaye, je rejecte;' Palsgrave, ed. 1530. - O. F. rejecter; mod. F. rejeter. The F. word was spelt rejecter in the 16th century, and our word seems to have been borrowed from it rather than from Latin directly; the still older spelling in O. F. was regeter. = O. F. re- (= Lat. re-), back; and O. F. geter, getter, mod. F. jeter, to throw, from Lat. icates. See Ro- and Jet (1). Cf. Lat. rejectus, pp. of reicere, to reject, compounded of re- and icaere, to throw. Der. reject-ion, from F. rejection, a rejection;' Cot.

REJOICE, to feel glad, exult. (F., -L.) M. E. reioisen, reioicen (with i=j), to rejoice; Chaucer, C. T. 9867; P. Plowman, C. xviii. 198. - O. F. resjois-, stem of pres. part. of resjoir, mod. F. réjouir, to gladden, rejoice. - O. F. re- (= Lat. re-), again; and esjoir (mod. F. from Lat. ex., and the vb. joir (mod. F. jouir), derived, like Ital. godere, from Lat. gaudere, to rejoice. See Re-, Ex-, and Joy. Der. rejoic-ing, rejoic-ing-ly.

REJOIN, to join again. (F., -L.) Esp. used in the legal sense to answer to a reply. 'I rejoyne, as men do that answere to the lawe and make answere to the byll that is put up agaynst them; Palsgrave. - F. rejoindre, 'to rejoine;' Cot. See Re- and Join. Der. rejoinder, Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, b. i. c. 14, which appears to be the F. infin. mood used substantively, like attainder, remainder.

RELAPSE, to slide back into a former state. (L.) As sb. in Minsheu, ed. 1627, and in Shak. Per. iii. 2. 110. Cotgrave translates the O. F. relaps by 'relapsed.' [There is no classical Lat. sb. relapsus.] - Lat. relapsus, pp. of relabi, to slide back. See Re- and Lapse. Der. relapse, sb.

RELATE, to describe, tell. (F., -L.) In Spenser, F. Q. iii. 8. 51; and in Palsgrave. - F. relater, 'to relate;' Cot. -Low Lat. relatare, to relate. - Lat. relatum, used as supine of referre, to relate; which is, however, from a different root.—Lat. re-, back; and latum, supine, latus, pp., put for tlatus, from \(\sqrt{TAL}, \) to lift. See Re-; and see Elate. Der. related; relation, P. Plowman, C. iv. 363, from F. relation, 'a relation,' Cot.; relat-ive, M. E. relatif, P. Plowman, C. iv. 301, from F. relatif; relat-ive-ly.

RELAX, to slacken, loosen. (L.) In Milton, P. L. vi. 599. [Bacon has relax-as an adj., Nat. Hist. § 381.] - Lat. relaxare, to relax. - Lat. re-, back; and laxare, to loosen, from laxus, loose; see Re- and Lax. Der. relax-at-ion, in Minsheu, from F. relaxation, & relaxation,' Cot. Doublet, release.

RELAY (1), a set of fresh dogs or horses, a fresh supply. (F., = L.?) Orig. used of dogs. 'What relays set you? None at all, we laid not In one fresh dog;' Ben Jonson, Sad Shepherd, Act i. sc. 2. M. E. relaye, in the same sense, Chaucer, Book of the Duchess, 362. - F. relais, a relay; par relais, 'by turnes,' i.e. by relays, Cot. He also gives: 'chiens de relais, 'dogs layd for a backset,' i.e. kept in reserve; chevaux de relais, 'horses layed in certain places on the highway, for the more haste making. He explains relais as 'a seat or standing for such as hold chiens de relai, i.e. a station.

B. The word presents much difficulty.

Mr. Wedgwood quotes from a late edition and E.) Spelt rayneders, Morte Arthure, ed. Brock, 922. Perhaps the obscure word ron, in An Old Eng. Miscellany, ed. Morris, p. 92, l. 71, means a reindeer, as suggested by Stratmann. Formed by adding deer (an E. word) to Icel. hreinn, a reindeer, answering to tion of the F. word, it links it to Ital. rilassiare (from Lat. relaxare).

and E. Relax, q.v. The difficulty lies in explaining the O. F. laier, again; Cot. - Lat. re-, again; and O. F. lecher, mod. F. lécher, to leier, common in the same sense as F. laiser; see Burguy. This form answers rather to Du. laten (E. let), and it would seem difficult to derive it from laxare; but Diez suggests that the future tense laisserai (of laisser) may have been contracted into lairai, which might have influenced the form of the infinitive. He cites gerrai for gesirai as the future of O. F. gesir. y. We are thus left in some uncertainty as to whether the latter syllable of the word is due to Lat. laxare or to Du. laten, Goth, letan, words of similar meaning; see Let (1). The sense is clearly 'a rest,' and a relay of dogs is a set of fresh dogs kept at rest and in readiness. Cf. à relais, 'spared, at rest, that is not used,' Cot.; relayer, 'to succeed in the place of the weary, to refresh, relieve,' id.

RELAY (2), to lay again. (Hybrid; L. and E.) Simply pounded of Re- and Lay; and distinct from the word above. Simply com-

RELEASE, to set free, relieve, let go. (F., -L.) M. E. relessen, P. Plowman, B. iii. 58; relesen, Chaucer, C. T. 8029. - O. F. relessier, F. relaisser, 'to release,' Cot. - Lat. relaxare, to relax; see Relax. Doublet, relax.

RELEGATE, to consign to exile. (L.) 'To relegate, or exile;' Minsheu, ed. 1627. – Lat. relegatus, pp. of relegare, to send away, dispatch, remove. – Lat. re-, back, away; and legare, to send. See Re- and Legate. Der. relegation, from F. relegation, 'a relega-

RELENT, to grow tender, feel compassion. (F., -L.) Lamentacion of Mary Magdalene, st. 70. Altered from F. ralentir, to slacken. . . to relent in; Cot. Cf. Lat. relentescere, to slacken. F. re- and a (shortened to ra-), from Lat. re- and ad-; and lentus, slack, slow, also tenacious, pliant, akin to lenis, gentle, and E. lithe; see Lenity, Lithe. The Lat. relentescere is simply from re- and lentus, omitting ad. Der. relent-less, -ly, -ness.

RELEVANT, relating to the matter in hand. (F.,-L.) make our probations and arguments relevant; 'King Chas. I, Letter to A. Henderson (R.) It means 'assisting' or helpful. - F. relevant, pres. part. of relever, 'to raise up, also to assist;' Cot. - Lat. relevare, to lift up again. - Lat. re-, again; and leuare, to lift; see Re- and Levant, Lever; also Relieve. Der. relevance, relevancy; ir-RELIC, a memorial, remnant, esp. a memorial of a saint. (F., -L.) Chiefly in the plural; M. E. relykes, s. pl., Rob. of Glouc. p. 177, last line; Chaucer, C. T. 703.—F. reliques, s. pl., 'reliques;' Cot.—Lat. reliquias, acc. of reliquia, pl., remains, relics. - Lat. relinquere (pt. t. reliqui, pp. relictus), to leave behind. = Lat. re-, back, behind; and linquere, to leave, allied to lieëre, to be allowable. See Re- and License. And see Relinquish, Relict. Der. reliqu-ar-y, q.v. RELICT, a widow. (L.) A late word; accented relict in a quotation from Garth, in Johnson's Dict. - Lat. relicta, fem. of relictus, left behind, pp. of relinquere; see Relic, Relinquish.

releven (with u=v), P. Plowman, B. vii. 32; Chaucer, C. T. 4180.— F. relever, 'to raise up, relieve,' Cot.—Lat. relevare, to lift up.—Lat. re., again; and leuare, to lift; see Re- and Lever. Der. relief, M. E. relefe, Gower, C. A. iii. 23, l. 4, from O. F. relef, mod. F. relief, a sb. due to the verb relever; hence bas-relief; also rilievo, from Ital. rilievo, the relief or projection of a sculptured figure. And see RELIGION, piety, the performance of duties to God and man. (F., - L.) In early use. Spelt religiun, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, ii. 49, l. 13; Ancren Riwle, p. 8. - F. religion. - Lat. religionem, acc. of religio, piety. Allied to religens, fearing the gods, pious. [And therefore not derived from religare, to bind; as often suggested, centrary to grammatical order.] β. 'It is clear that ἀλέγω is the opposite of Lat. nec-lego [neglego, negligo], and θεων όπιν οὐκ ἀλέ-γοντεs (Homer, Il. xvi. 388) is the exact counterpart of Lat. religens and religio; Curtius, i. 454. Thus religion and neglect are from the same root LAG; but it is a little uncertain in what sense. They seem to be connected with E. reck rather than with legend. See Reck, Neglect. Der. religion-ist; religi-ous, from F. religieux, religious, Cot., which from Lat. religiosus; religi-ous-ly.

RELLINQUISH, to leave, abandon. (F., -L.) In Levins, ed. Der. religion-ist; religi-ous, from F. religieux, 1570. - O. F. relinquis-, stem of pres. part. of relinquir (Burguy). -Lat. relinquere, to leave; by a change of conjugation, of which there are several other examples. See Relic. Der. relinquish-ment.

RELIQUARY, a casket for holding relics. (F., -L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - F. reliquaire, 'a casket wherein reliques be kept;' Cot. - Low Lat. reliquiare, neut. sb., or reliquiarium, a reliquary; Ducange.—Lat. reliquia-, crude form of reliquia, relics. See Relic.

RELIQUE, the same as Relic, q. v.

RELISH, to have a pleasing taste, to taste with pleasure. (F., — L. and G.) In Shak. Temp. v. 23; Wint. Tale, v. 2. 132. As sb., Tw. Nt. iv. 1. 64; and in Palsgrave. — O. F. relecher, 'to lick over b. iii. c. 26 (R.) 'Remittynge [referring] them . . . to the workes of lick, from O.H.G. lecchón, lechón (G. lecken), cognate with E. Lick. See Re- and Lecher. Der. relish, sb.

RELUCTANT, striving against, unwilling. (L.) In Milton, P. L. iv. 311. - Lat. reluctant-, stem of pres. part. of reluctare, reluctari, to struggle against. - Lat. re-, back, against; and luctari, to struggle, wrestle, from lucta, a wrestling. β. Luc-ta stands for lug-ta; cf. Gk. λυγ-ίζειν, to bend, twist, writhe in wrestling, overmaster. - A RUG, to break; as in Skt. ruj, to break, bend, hurt.

Der. reluctant-ly, reluctance, Milton, P. L. ii. 337; reluctanc-y.

RELY, to rest or repose on, trust fully. (Hybrid; L. and E.) A barbarous word, compounded of Lat. re- and E. lie, verb, to rest.

[A similar compound is re-mind.] Shakespeare is an early authority for it, and he always uses it with the prep. on (five times) or upon (once). He also has reliance, followed by on, Timon, ii. 1. 22. So also to rely on, Drayton, Miseries of Q. Margaret (R.); Dryden, Epistle to J. Dryden, 139; relying in, Fletcher, Eliza, An Elegy (R.); reliers on, Beaum. and Fletcher, Woman's Prize, i. 3 (Petruchio's 24th speech). Thus to rely on is to lie back on, to lean on. See (1). ¶ Not from O. F. relayer, 'to succeed to in Re- and Lie (1). the place of the weary, to refresh, relieve, or ease another by an undertaking of his task, Cot.; as suggested by Wedgwood. This suits neither in sound nor sense, and certainly could not be followed by on.

Der. reli-able, a compound adj. which has completely established itself, and is by no means a new word, to which many frivolous and ignorant objections have been made; it was used by Coleridge in 1800, in the Morning Post of Feb. 18; see F. Hall, On Eng. Adjectives in -able, with special reference to Reliable, p. 29. Hence reliabil-i-ty, used by Coleridge in 1817; reli-able-ness, also used by the same writer. Also reli-ance, in Shak., as above, a doubly barbarous word, since both prefix and suffix are F., formed by analogy with appliance, compliance, &c. Also reli-er, as above.

REMAIN, to stay or be left behind. (F.,-L.) Spelt remayne in Palsgrave. Due to the O. F. impers. verb il remaint, as in the proverb 'beaucoup remaint de ce que fol pense, much is behind of that a fool accounts of, a foole comes ever short of his intentions, Cot. The infin. remaindre is preserved in our sb. remainder; cf. E. rejoinder from F. rejoindre, E. attainder from F. attaindre. - Lat. remanet, it remains; remanere, to remain. - Lat. re-, behind; and manere, to remain; see Re- and Manor. Der. remains, s. pl., Titus Andron., i. 81; remain-der, Temp. v. 13, see above. And see remnant.

REMAND, to send back. (F., - L.) 'Wherevpon he was remaunded; Berners, tr. of Froissart, v. ii. c. 206 (R.) - F. remander, 'to send for back again;' Cot. - Lat. remandare, to send back word. = Lat. re-, back; and mandare, to enjoin, send word; see Re- and Mandate.

REMARK, to take notice of. (F., - L. and Teut.) Shak, has remark'd, Hen. VIII, 5. i. 33; and remarkable, Antony, iv. 15. 67. - F. remarquer, 'to mark, note, heed;' Cot. - Lat. re-, again; and marquer, to mark, from marque. sb., a mark, which is from G. mark, cognate with E. mark; see Re- and Mark. Der. remark-able, from F. remarquable, 'remarkable,' Cot.; remark-abl-y; remark-able-

REMEDY, that which restores, repairs, or heals. (F., - L.) M. E. remedie, Chaucer, C. T. 1276; Ancren Riwle, p. 124, l. 22. - O. F. remedie*, not recorded, only found as remede, mod. F. remede, a remedy. Cf. O. F. remedier, verb, to remedy. - Lat. remedium, a remedy; lit. that which heals again. - Lat. re-, again; and mederi, to heal; see Re- and Medical. Der. remedy, verb (Levins, Palsgrave), from F. remedier; remedi-able (Levins); remedi-al, a coined word; remedi-al-ly

REMEMBER, to recall to mind. (F., -L.) M. E. remembren, Chaucer, C. T. 1503. — O. F. remember, used reflexively, to remember; Cot. Formed, with excrescent b after m, due to stress, from Lat. rememorari, to remember. - Lat. re-, again; and memorare, to make mention of, from memor, mindful. See Re- and Memory. Der. remembrance, Chaucer, C. T. 8799, from F. remembrance; remembranc-er, Macb. iii. 4. 37.

REMIND, to bring to the mind again. (Hybrid; L. and E.) A barbarous compound (like rely) from Lat. re-, again, and E. mind. Rather a late word; in Bailey's Dict. vol. ii. ed. 1731. See Re- and Mind.

REMINISCENCE, recollection. (F., -L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - F. reminiscence, 'remembrance of things;' Cot. - Lat. reminiscentia, remembrance. - Lat. reminiscenti-, crude form of pres. part. of reminisci, to remember, an inceptive verb, with suffix -sci. - back, slacken, abate. - Lat. re-, back; and mittere, to send; see Reand Mission. Der. remitt-er, remitt-ance, remitt-ent; remiss, adj., from Lat. remissus, pp. of remittere; remiss-ly, remiss-ness; remiss-ible, from Lat. remissibilis; remiss-ibil-i-ty; remiss-ive. Also remiss-ion, M. E. remission, Ancren Riwle, p. 346, l. 21, from F. remission (Cot.)

Lat. acc. remissionem, from nom. remissio.

REMNANT, a remainder, fragment. (F., -L.) M.E. remenant, remenaunt, King Alisaunder, 5707. — O. F. remenant, remanent, 'a remnant, residue; 'Cot. - Lat. remanent-, stem of pres. part. of remanere, to remain ; see Remain.

REMONSTRATE, to adduce strong reasons against. (L.) See Trench, Select Glossary. See Milton, Animadversions upon the Remonstrant's Defence. The sb. remonstrance is in Shak. Meas. v. 397.—Low Lat. remonstratus, pp. of remonstrare, to expose, exhibit; used A. D. 1482 (Ducange); hence, to produce arguments. - Lat. re-, again; and monstrare, to shew, exhibit; see Re- and Monster.

Der. remonstrant, from the stem of the pres. part.; remonstrance, from F. remonstrance, 'a remonstrance,' Cot. = Low Lat. remonstrancia.

REMORSE, pain or anguish for guilt. (F., = L.) M. E. remors. 'But for she had a maner remors;' Lydgate, Storie of Thebes, pt. iii (Of the wife of Amphiorax). - O. F. remors, 'remorse; Cot. — Low Lat. remorsus (also remorsio), remorse; Ducange. — Lat. remorsus, pp. of remordere, to bite again, vex. — Lat. re-, again; and mordere, to bite; see Re- and Mordacious.

(Chaucer has the verb remord (— O. F. remordre), tr. of Boethius, b. 4, pr. 6, l. 4030. Der. remorse-ful, Rich. III, i. 2. 156; remorse-ful-ly;

REMOTE, distant. (F., -L.) In Spenser, F. Q. iii. 4. 6. - O. F. remot, m., remote, f., 'remote, removed;' Cot. Or directly, from Lat. remotus, pp. of remouere, to remove; see Remove. Der. remote-ly, -ness; also remot-ion = removal, Timon, iv. 3. 346.

REMOUNT, to mount again. (F., -L.) Also transitively, to cause to rise again, as in M. E. remounten, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. iii. pr. 1, 1. 1706. - F. remonter, 'to remount,' Cot. - F. re-, again; and mounter, to mount: see Re-, and Muunt. (2)

b. iii. pr. I, I. 1700.— r. remonter, 'to remount,' Cot. — r. re-, again; and monter, to mount; see Re- and Mount (2).

REMOVE, to move away, withdraw. (F.,—L.) M. E. remeuen (remeven), Chaucer, Troil. i. 691, where remeve rimes with preve, a proof. Just as we find M. E. remeven for mod. E. remove, so we find M. E. preven for mod. E. prove, preve for proof. Palsgrave uses remeve and remove convertibly: 'I remeve, as an armye... removeth from one place to an other.'—O. F. removeorir, 'to remove, retire;' Cot. = F. re-, again; and mouvoir, to move; see Re- and Move. ¶ The M. E. remuen, to remove, Chaucer, C. T. 10495, though it has nearly the same sense, is quite a different word, answering to O. F. remuër, 'to move, stir,' Cot., from Lat. re- and mutare, to change. Richardson confuses the matter. Der. remov-able (Levins), remov-ed:l-i-ty; remov-al, a coined word; remov-er, Shak. Sonn. 116, remov-ed-ness, Wint. Tale, iv. 2. 41. Also remote, q.v. REMUNERATE, to recompense. (L.) In Shak. Titus, i. 398.

- Lat. remuneratus, pp. of remunerare, remunerari, to reward. - Lat. re-, again; and munerare, munerari, to discharge an office, also to give, from muner-, stem of munus, a gift. See Re- and Munificent. Der. remuner-able, remunerat-ion, L. L. L. iii. 133, from F. remuneration, 'a remuneration,' Cot. = Lat. remunerationem, acc. of remuneratio;

RENAL, pertaining to the reins. (F., -L.) Medical. -F. renal, 'belonging to the kidneyes;' Cot. -Lat. renalis, adj., formed from ren-es, the reins; see Reins.

RENARD, a fox; see Reynard.

RENASCENT; from Re- and Nascent. RENCOUNTER, RENCONTRE, a meeting, collision, chance combat. (F., - L.) Now commonly rencontre; formerly rencounter, used as a verb by Spenser, F. Q. i. 4. 39, ii. I. 36. — F. rencontre, 'a meeting, or incounter... by chance;' Cot. Cf. rencontrer, verb, 'to incounter, meet;' id. Contracted forms for reëncontre, reëncontrer.— F. re- (= Lat. re-), again; and encontrer, to meet; see Re- and Encounter.

Hence the spelling reencounter.

meet; see Re- and Encounter. Hence the spelling reencounter in Berners, tr. of Froissart, v. ii. c. 29 (R.)

REND, to tear, split. (E.) M.E. renden, pt. t. rente, pp. rent; Chaucer, C. T. 6217.—A.S. hrendan, rendan, not common. In the O. Northumb. versions of Luke, xiii. 7, succidite [cut it down] is glossed by hrendas vel seearfa8 in the Lindisfarne MS., and by ceorfas vel rendas in the Rushworth MS. Again, in Mark, xi. 8, the Lat. cadebans [they cut down] is glossed by gebugun vel rendon. Thus the orig. sense seems to be to cut or tear down. + O. Fries. renda, randa, to tear, break. B. The A.S. hrendan answers to a theoretical form hrandian*, which may be connected with hrand, the pt. t. of the Icel, strong verb hrinda. to push, kick, throw, which Fick (iii.

Galene; id., Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 1. - Lat. remittere, to send of down (base of the present tense, krinta); Lithuan. kirsti, to cut, hew (see kertu in Nesselmann); and cf. Lat. crēna (= cret-na), whence 8. If this be right, we have a remarkable connection L. cranny. between the words rent and cranny, both implying 'cut' or 'slit;' see Cranny. Der. rent, sb., Jul. Cæsar, iii. 2. 179; apparently quite a late word, obviously formed from the pp. rent.

RENDER, to restore, give up. (F., - L.) M. E. rendren, P. Plowman, B. xv. 601. - F. rendre, 'ro render, yield;' Cot. - Low Lat. rendere, nasalised form of Lat. reddere, to restore, give back. -Lat. red-, back; and dare, to give. See Re-, Red-, and Date (1). Der. render-ing. Also rent (2), q. v. Also redd-it-ion, q. v. Also rendez-vous, q. v. RENDEZVOUS, an appointed place of meeting. (F., -L.) In Hamlet, iv. 4. 4. - F. rendezvous, 'a rendevous, a place appointed for the assemblie of souldiers;' Cot. A substantival use of the for the assemblie of souldiers; Cot. A substantival use of the phrase rendezvous, i. e. render yourselves, or assemble yourselves, viz. at the place appeinted.

B. Rendez is the imperative plural, and person, of rendre, to render; and vous (= Lat. uos) is the pl. of the 2nd pers. pronoun. See Render.

RENEGADE, RENEGADO, an apostate, vagahond. (Span., -L.) Massinger's play called The Renegado was first acted in 1624.

In Shak. Tw. Nt. iii. 2. 74, the first folio has 'a verie Renegatho;' spelling which represents the sound of the Spanish d. The word was spelling which represents the sound of the Spanish d. The word was at first renegado, and afterwards renegade by loss of the final syllable.

— Span. renegado, 'an apostata,' Minsheu; lit. one who has denied the faith; pp. of renegar, 'to forsake the faith,' id. — Low Lat, renegare, to deny again. — Lat. re-, again; and negare, to deny; see Reand Negative.

¶ 1. The word was not really new to the language, as it appears in M. E. as renegat; but the M. E. renegat having been corrupted into runagate, the way was cleared for introducing the word over again; see Punagate.

¶ 2. The odd word renegate. the word over again; see Runagate. 2. The odd word renege (with g hard), in King Lear, ii. 2. 84, = Low Lat. renegare; so also M. E. reneye, P. Plowman, B. xi. 120. Doublet, runagate.

RENEW, to make new again. (Hybrid; L. and E.) M. E. renewen, Wyclif, 2 Cor. iv. 16; where the Lat. renouatur is translated Der, renew-al, a coined by is renewid. From Re- and New.

word; renew-able, also coined. Doublet, renovate.

RENNET (1), the prepared inner membrane of a calf's stomach, used to make milk coagulate. (E.) 'Renet, for chese, coagulum; Levins. The word is found with various suffixes, but is in each case formed from M. E. rennen, A. S. rinnan, rennan, to run, because rennet causes milk to run, i. e. to coagulate or congeal. This singular use of E. run in the sense to congeal does not seem to be noticed in the Dictionaries. Pegge, in his Kenticisms (E. D. S. Gloss. C. 3) uses it; he says: 'Runnet, the herb gallium [Galium verum], called in Derbyshire erning, Anglice cheese-runnet; it runs the milk together, i. e. makes it curdle.' 'Earn, Yearn, to coagulate milk; earning, yearning, cheese-rennet, or that which curdles milk; Brockett. Here earn (better ern) is put, by shifting of r, for ren; just as A. S. yrnan (irnan) is another form of rinnan, to run. Cf. Gloucestersh. running, rennet (E. D. S. Gloss. B. 4). 'Renlys, or rendlys, for mylke, [also] renels, Coagulum;' Prompt. Parv. 'As nourishing milk, when runnet is put in, Runs all in heaps of tough thick curd, though in his nature thin; 'Chapman, tr. of Homer, II. v, near the end. So also A.S. 'rynning, coagulum; gerunnen, coagulatus; 'Wright's Vocab. i. 27, last line, i. 28, first line. All from A. S. rinnan, to run; also found as rennan, A. S. Chron. an. 656, in the late MS. E.; see Thorpe's edition, p. 52, l. 7 from bottom. See Run. + O. Du. rinsel, runsel, or renninge, 'curds, or milk-runnet,' Hexham; from rinnen, 'to presse, curdle;' id. Cf. geronnen melck, 'curded or rennet milke;' id. Cf. G. rinnen, to run, curdle, coagulate.

RENNET (2), a sweet kind of apple. (F., -L.) Formerly spelt renat or renate, from a mistaken notion that it was derived from Lat. renatus, renewed or born again. 'The renat, which though first it from the pippin came. Grown through his pureness nice, assumes that curious name; Drayton, Polyolbion, song 18. — F. reinette, rainette, a pippin, rennet; Hamilton. Scheler and Littré agrec to connect it with O. F. rainette, 'a little frog' (Cot.), the dimin. of raine, a frog. because the apple is speckled like the skin of a frog. In this case, it is derived from Lat. rana, a frog. See Ranunculus.

RENOUNCE, to give up, reject, disown. (F.,-L.) M. E. renouncen, Gower, C. A. i. 258, 1. 3. - F. renoncer, 'to renounce;' Cot. - Lat. renunciare, better renuntiare, to bring back a report, also, to disclaim, renounce.—Lat. re-, back; and nuntiare, to bring a message, from nuntius, a messenger; see Re- and Nuncio. Der.

resource-ment, Meas. for Meas. i. 4. 35; also renunciation, q.v.

RENOVATE, to renew. (L.) A late word; in Thomson's

Seasons, Winter, 704. But the sb. renovation is in Bacon, Life of Henry VII, ed. Lumby, p. 203, l. 33.—Lat. renountus, pp. of the Icel. strong verb krinda, to push, kick, throw, which Fick (iii. 83) refers to KART, to cut.

Y. The meaning suits exactly, and we may therefore prob. connect E. rend with Skt. krit, to cut, cut renouare, to renew.—Lat. re-, again; and nonus, new, cognate with 'a renovation,' Cot.; renovat-or. Doublet, renew.

RENOWN, celebrity, fame. (F.,-L.) Put for renowm; by the influence of the former n, which assimilated the final letter to itself. M. E. renoun, Chaucer, C. T. 14553; Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, M. E. renoum, Chaucer, C. 1. 14553; Rob. of Brunne, II. of Langton, p. 131, l. 5; King Alisaunder, 1448. [But also renomé, renommé, in three syllables, with final e as F. é; Gower, C. A. ii. 43, l. 26; Barbour's Bruce, iv. 774; renoumee, Barbour's Bruce, viii. 290.] In Bruce, ix. 503, one MS. has the pp. renownit, spelt renommyt in the other.—F. renom [also renommée], 'renowne, fame;' Cot. Cf. renommé, 'renowned, famous;' Cot. And observe that renon occurs in C. F. of the 14th and 14th continued (littre) so that the change to in O.F. of the 12th and 13th centuries (Littré), so that the change to final n is rather F. than E. Cf. Port. renome, renown; Span. renombre, renown, also a surname; and Span. renombrar, to renown. -F. re- (= Lat. re-), again; and nom, a name; hence renown = a renaming, repetition or celebration of a name. See Re- and Noun. Der. renown, verb, in Barbour, as above. RENT (1), a tear, fissure, breach. (E.)

The suggestion of Diez, that O.F. plevir is due to Lat. præbere, to afford (hence, to offer a pledge), is the most likely solution. See Re- and Pledge. Der. replev-in, properly a sb., from F. re- and O. F. plevine, 'a warranty,' Cot. REPLY, to answer. (F., -L.) M. E. replien, replyen; Chaucer,

E. form was commonly repreuen (= repreven), with the sense to reject, put aside, disallow. To reprieve a sentence is to disallow or reject it. Palsgrave has repreve for reprove. 'The stoon which men bildynge repreueden' = the stone which the builders rejected; Wyclif, Luke, xx. 17. See Reprove. Der. reprieve, sb., Cor. v. 2. 53. Doublet, reprove.

REPROACH, to upbraid, revile, rebuke. (F., -L.) Meas. for Meas. v. 426. Cf. Span. reprochar, vb., reproche, sb.; Prov. repropehar, to reproach (cited by Diez). also find Prov. repropehiers, reprojers, sb., a proverb (Bartsch). β. The etymology is disputed, yet it is not doubtful; the late Lat. appropiare became O. F. aprocher and E. approach, so that reproach answers to a Lat. type repropiare , not found, to bring near to, hence to cast in one's teeth, impute, object. See Diez, who shews that other proposed solutions of the word are phonetically impossible. Y. Scheler well explains the matter, when he suggests that repropiare is, in fact, a mere translation or equivalent of Lat. obicere (objicere), to cast before one, to bring under one's notice, to reproach. So also the G. vorwerfen, to cast before, to reproach. 8. And hence we can explain the Prov. repropehiers, lit. a bringing under one's notice, a hint, a proverb.

• The form repropiare* under one's notice, a hint, a proverb. is from re., again, and propicus, adv., nearer, comp. of prope, near; see Propinquity and Approach. Der. reproach, sb.; reproachable, reproach-able, reproach-able, reproach-ful, Titus Andron. i. 308; reproachable, ful-ly.

The etymology sometimes given from Gk. βεειν, to flow (root βν), can hardly be right, as it does not give the right vowel. Cf. Ital. risorto, royal power, jurisdiction; quite distinct from risorto, resuscitated, which is the pp. of risorgere = Lat. resurgere, to rise again.

B. The Lat. sortiri is lit. 'to obtain by lot;' from sorti-, crude form of sors, a lot. See Re- and Sort. Der. resort, sb., as above.

REST (1), repose, quiet, pause. (E.) M. E. reste (dissyllabic), Chaucer, C. T. 9729, 9736. The final e is due to the form of the oblique cases of the A. S. sb. — A. S. rest, ræst, fem. sb., rest, quiet; but the gen., dat., and acc. sing. take final -e, making reste, ræste; see Grein, ii. 372. + Du. rust. + Dan. and Swed. rast. + Icel. rüst, the distance between two resting-places, a mile. + Goth. rasta, a stage of a journey, a mile. + O. H. G. rasta, rest; also, a measure of distance.

3. All from the Teut. type RASTA, Fick, iii. 246; to be divided as RA-STA. And just as we have blass from blow, so here the root is \checkmark RA, to rest, whence Skt. ram, to rest, rejoice at, sport, and the sb. ra-ii, pleasure, as also the Gk. ἐρονή, rest, and prob. ἔρον, love; see Ram, Erotic. Der. rest, verb, A.S. restan, Grein, ii. 373; rest-less, rest-less-ly, rest-less-ness.

REST (2), to remain, be left over. (F., -L.) Perhaps obsolete; but common in Shak. 'Nought rests for me but to make open proclamation;' I Hen. VI. i. 3. 70. The sb. rest, remainder, is still common; it occurs in Surrey, tr. of Virgil, Æn. ii. 651 (Lat. text); see Richardson. - F. rester, 'to rest, remaine;' Cot. - Lat. restare, to stop behind, stand still, remain. - Lat. re-, behind, back; and stare, to stand, cognate with E. stand; see Re- and Stand. rest, sh., as above, from F. reste, 'a rest, residue, remnant;' Cot. Der. restitue, verb, in P. Plowman, B. v. 281 (obsolete); from F. restituer.

RESTIVE, unwilling to go forward, obstinate. (F.,-L.) Sometimes confused with restless, though the orig. sense is very different. In old authors, it is sometimes confused with resty, adj., as if from rest (1); but properly resty or restie stands for O.F. restif. 'Grow restie, nor go on;' Chapman, tr. of Homer, Iliad, v. 234. 'When there be not stonds, nor restiveness in a man's nature;' Bacon, Essay 40, Of Fortune. See further in Trench, Select Glossary. - F, restif, 'restie, stubborn, drawing backward, that will not go forward;' Cot. Mod. F. rétif. - F. rester, 'to rest, remain;' Cot. See Rost (2). Thus the true sense of restive is stubborn in keeping one's place; a restive horse is, properly, one that will not move for whipping; the shorter form resty is preserved in prov. E. rusty, restive, unruly (Halliwell); to turn rusty is to be stubborn. Der. restive-ness. RESTORE, to repair, replace, return. (F., -L.) M. E. restoren, Rob. of Glouc., p. 500, l. 10. - O. F. trencher, 'to cut,' Cot. See Re- and Trench. Der. retrench-ment, Phillips.

RETRIBUTION, requital, reward or punishment. (F.,-L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627.-F. retribution, 'a retribution, requitall;' Cot. - Lat. retributionem, acc. of retributio, recompense. - Lat. retributus, pp. of retribuere, to restore, repay. — Lat. re-, back; and tribuere, to assign, give; see Re- and Tribute. Der. retribut-ive.

RETRIEVE, to recover, bring back to a former state. (F., — L.) 'I retreve, I fynde agayne, as houndes do their game, je retrouue;' Palsgrave. Levins has: 'retrive, retrudere;' he must mean the same word. Prob. in still earlier use as a term of the chase. Just as in the case of contrive, the spelling has been altered; probably retreve was meant to represent the occasional form retreuver of the O. F. retrover, later retrouver. - F. retrouver, 'to find again; Cot. - F. re., again; and trower, to find. See Contrive and Trover. Thus the successive spellings are retreve (for retrewe), retrive, retrieve. Der. retriev-er, retriev-able.

Aryan -tar), as in ul-tro, ci-tro, in-tro; from red- or re-, back. Thus the sense is 'more backward.' See Re-.

RETROCESSION, a going back. (L.) A coined word, and not common; see an example in Richardson. As a math. term, in Phillips ed 1706. Formed with suffer ion (F. F. in Let ion.) Phillips, ed. 1706. Formed with suffix -ion (= F. -ion, Lat. ionem) from retrocess-us, pp. of retrocedere, to go backwards; see Retro- and Cede. The classical Lat. sb. is retrocessus.

RETROGRADE, going backwards, from better to worse. (L.) In early astronomical use, with respect to a planet's apparent backward motion. M. E. retrograd, Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, ed. Skeat, pt. ii. § 4, l. 31; § 35, l. 12. — Lat. retrogradus, going backward; used of a planet. — Lat. retrogradi, to go backward. — Lat. ward; used to a planet. — Lat. retrograde, to go backward. — Lat. retrograde, backward; and gradi, to go, from gradus, a step; see Retrograde, orb, from O. F. retrograder, to recoyle, retire, Cot.; retrogress-ion, in Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. vi. c. 3, last section, as if from Lat. retrogressio* (but the classical form is retrogressus), from retrogressus, pp. of retrogradi. Hence retrogress-ive, -ly. Also retrograd-at-ion, Holland, tr. of Plinie, b. ii.

spective, adj., Moral Essays, Ep. i. l. 99. Swift has retrospection (Todd; no reference). Retrospect, or Retrospection, looking back; Phillips, ed. 1706. Coined from Lat. retrospectus, unused pp. of retrospicere, to look back. - Lat. retro-, backward; and specere, to look; see Retro- and Spy.

RETURN, to come back to the same place, answer, retort. (F., -L.) M. E. returnen, retournen, Chaucer, C. T. 2097; Rom. of the Rose, 382, 384. - F. retourner, 'to return;' Cot. - F. re-, back; and tourner, to turn; see Re- and Turn. Der. return, sb., King Alisaunder, l. 600. Der. return-able.

REUNION, REUNITE; see Re- and Unit.

REVEAL, to unveil, make known. (F., -L.) Spelt revele, Spenser, F. Q. iii. 2. 48. - F. reveler, 'to reveale;' Cot. - Lat. revelare, to unveil, draw back a veil. - Lat. re-, back; and uelare, to veil, from uelum, a veil; see Re- and Veil. Der. revel-at-ion, M. E. revelacioun, Wyclif, Rom. xvi. 25, from F. revelation, 'a revelation,' Cot. = Lat. revelationem, acc. of revelatio, formed from revelatus, pp. of revelare.

REVEILLE, an alarum at break of day. (F.,-L.) 'Sound a reveille, sound, sound;' Dryden, A Secular Masque, 61. 'Save where the fife its shrill reveille screams; 'Campbell, Gertrude, pt. iii. st. 7. Now a trisyllabic word. The last syllable is difficult of explanation, as the F. word is reveil, an awaking, reveille; as in battre le réveil, sonner le réveil, to beat, to sound the reveille (Hamilton). It is perhaps due to some misconception by Englishmen with respect to the F. word rather than to a derivation from reveillé, pp. of réveiller, to rouse, which is the allied verb. β . The sb. réveil = 0. F. resveil, 'a hunt's-up or morning-song for a new married wife, the day after the marriage.' The verb réveiller = O. F. resveiller, 'to awake;' Cot. - F. re- (= Lat. re-), again; and O. F. esveiller, to waken (Cot.), from Low Lat. exuigilare *, not found, but a mere compound of ex, out, and uigilars, to wake, watch, from uigil, wakeful. See Re-, Ex-, and Vigil.

REVEL, a carouse, noisy feast, riotous or luxurious banquet. (F., -L.) The sb. is older than the verb in English. M. E. reuel (F., -L.) The sb. is older than the verb in English. M. E. reuel (=revel), Chaucer, C. T. 2710, 4400, Legend of Good Women, 2251; P. Plowman, B. xiii. 442; Will. of Palerne, 1953. [On the strength of Chaucer's expression, 'And made revel al the longe night' (C. T. 2719), Tyrwhitt explained revel as 'an entertainment, properly during the night.' This is an attempt at forcing an etymology from F. réveiller, to wake, which is almost certainly wrong; and a little research shews that the dictum is entirely groundless. In Will. of Palerne, 1953, the revels are distinctly said to have taken place in the forenoon; and in Chaucer, Legend of Good Women, 2251, we read that 'This revel, full of song and full of daunce, Lasted a fourtenight, or little lasse,' which quite precludes a special reference to the night.] - O. F. revel, which Roquefort explains by 'pride, rebellion, sport, jest, disturbance, disorder, delay.' 'Plains est de joie et de revel' = is full of joy and revelry; Le Vair Palefroy, 1. 760; id. 'La douçors de tens novel Fait changier ire en revel = the sweetness of the fresh season changes anger into sport; Bartsch, Chrestomathie, col. 323, l. 28. According to Diez, it also appears as rivel. β . The word presents great difficulty. The opinion of Diez seems best, viz. that it is connected with O. F. reveler, to rebel, revolt (Roquefort); so that the orig. sense would be 'revolt, uproar, riot, tumult.' Cf. also O. F. revelé, proud, i. e. orig. rebellious. See the passage in the Roman de la Rose, 8615, cited by Roquefort and in Bartsch, col. 382, l. 35: 'Quil vous fust avis que la terre Vousist enprendre estrif ou guerre Au ciel destre miex estelee; Tant ert par ses fleurs revelee' = that you would have thought that the earth wished to enter into a strife or war with heaven as to being better adorned with stars; so greatly was it puffed up by its flowers. Here revelee = rendered rebellious, made conceited. The adj. reveleux (Roquefort) meant blustering, riotous; from which it is an easy step to the sense of indulging in revelry.

7. The word also occurs in Provençal; in Bartsch, Chrest. Prov., col. 133, l. 19, we have: 'e rics hom ab pauc de revel' = and a rich man with but little hospitality, i. e. little given to revelry.

8. If this view be right, the sb. revel is from the verb reveler = Lat. rebellare, to rebel; see Rebel.

9. Scheler opposes this solution, and links revel to F. réver, to dream; but the as a variant of revel) can hardly be explained except by supposing that re- (= ri-) is the ordinary prefix; just as Florio gives both rebellare and ribellare as the Ital. verb 'to rebel.' See Scheler's article on F. rôver. Der. revel, verb, M. E. revelen, Poems and Lives of Saints, ed. Furnivall, xxx. 15 (Stratmann), from O. F. reveler, to rebel, be riotous, as above; reveli-er, M. E. revelour, Chaucer, C. T. 4389; revel-ry, M. E. revelrie, Rom. of the Rose, 720.

also M. E. revelous, full of revelry, full of jest, Chaucer, C. T. 12934. Re- and Vision. Der. revise, sb., revis-al, revis-er; revis-ion, from = O. F. reveleux (as above); which furnishes one more link in the evidence.

REVISIT, to visit again. (F., -L.) In Hamlet, i. 4. 53. From REVENGE, to injure in return, avenge. (F., -L.) In Palsgrave. 'To revenge the dethe of our fathers;' Berners, tr. of Froissart, vol. ii. c. 240 (R.) - O. F. revenger (Palsgrave), later revencher, 'to wreak, or revenge himselfe,' Cot., who gives the form revengé for the pp. Mod. F. revancher; whence the phrase en revanche, in return, to make amends; by a bettering of the sense. - F. re-, again; and venger, older form vengier, to take vengeance, from Lat. uindicare. See Re- and Vengeance; also Avenge, Vindicate. Der. revenge, sb., Spenser, F.Q. i. 6. 44; revenge-ful, Hamlet, iii. 1. 126; revenge-ful-ly; revenge-ment, 1 Hen. IV, iii. 2. 7. Doublet, revindicate.

REVENUE, income. (F., -L.) Lit. 'that which comes back or is returned to one.' Often accented revenue; Temp. i. 2. 98. - O. F. revenue, 'revenue, rent;' Cot. Fem. of revenu, pp. of revenir, to return, come back. - F. re-, back; and venir, to come. - Lat. re-, back; and uenire, to come, cognate with E. come. See Re- and Come.

REVERBERATE, to re-echo, reflect sound. (L.) In Levins, ed. 1570.—Lat. reverberatus, pp. of reverberare, to beat back. — Lat. re-, back; and verberare, to beat, from verber, a scourge, lash, whip, of uncertain origin. Der. reverberat-ion, M. E. reverberacioun, Chaucer, C. T. 7815, from F. reverberation, 'a reverberation,' Cot. = Lat. acc. reverberationem. Also reverberat-or-y; and reverb (a coined word, by contraction), K. Lear, i. 1. 156.

REVERE, to venerate, regard with awe. (F., -L.) Not an early word, to reverence being used instead. In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - O. F. reverer (mod. réverer), 'to reverence,' Cot. - Lat. revereri, to revere, stand in awe of. - Lat. re-, again (here intensive); and uereri, to fear, feel awe (corresponding to the E. phrase to be wary, to beware), from the same root as wary. See Re- and Wary. Der. reverence, in early use, M. E. reverence, Rob. of Glouc., p. 553, l. 18, King Alisaunder, 793, from O. F. reverence, 'reverence, Cot. = Lat. reverentia, respect. Hence reverence, vb., Minsheu, ed. 1627, P. Plowman, C. xiv. 248, from O. F. reverencer, 'to reverence,' Cot.; reverenti-al, from F. reverential, 'reverent,' Cot. Also rever-ent, Chaucer, C. T. 8063, from O. F. reverent (14th century, see Littré, s. v. révérend), which from Lat. reverendus, fut. pass. part. of revereri: later form rever-end, Frith's Works, p. 105, col. 2, l. 40.
REVERIE, REVERY, a dreaming, irregular train of thought.

(F., -L.) 'When ideas float in the mind without any reflection or regard of the understanding, it is that which the French call resvery; our language has scarce a name for it;' Locke, Human Understanding, b. ii. c. 19 (R.) - F. rêverie, formerly resverie, 'a raving, idle talking, dotage, vain fancy, fond imagination; Cot. - F. rever, formerly resver, 'to rave, dote, speak idly, talke like an asse;' id. β. The F. rêver is the same word as the Lorraine raver, whence E. rave; see Rave. Cotgrave's explanation of rêver by the E. rave is thus justified.

REVERSE, opposite, contrary, having an opposite direction. (F.,-L.) The adj. use seems to be the oldest in E.; it precedes the other uses etymologically. M. E. reuers (= revers). 'A vice reuers unto this ' = a vice opposite this; Gower, C. A. i. 167, l. 2. 'Al the reuers sayn' = say just the contrary; Chaucer, C. T. 14983. — O.F. revers, 'strange, uncoth, crosse;' Cot. - Lat. reversus, lit. turned back, reversed, pp. of revertere, to turn backward, return. - Lat. re-, back; and uertere, to turn; see Re- and Verse. Der. reverse, verb, Gower, C. A. i. 3, l. 7; reverse, sb., Merry Wives, i. 3, 27, from F. revers, 'a back blow,' Cot. Cf. F. les revers de fortune, 'the crosses [reverses] of fortune;' id. Also revers-ion, Levins, from F. reversion, 'a reverting,' Cot.; hence revers-ion-ar-y. Also revers-al, Bacon, Life of Hen. VII, ed. Lumby, p. 15, l. 26; revers-ible. And REVERT, to return, fall back, reverse. (F., = L.) In Spenser, F. Q. iv. 6. 43. = O. F. revertir, 'to revert, returne;' Cot. = Lat. renertere, to return; see Reverse. Der revert-ible.

REVIEW, to view again, look back on, examine carefully. (F., -L.) 'To review, to recognise, or revise;' Minsheu, ed. 1627. And see Shak. Sonn. 74; Wint. Tale, iv. 4. 680. From Re- and View. Der. review, sb., review-er, review-al.

REVILE, to calumniate, reproach. (F., -L.) M. E. reuilen (with u=v), Gower, C. A. iii. 247, l. 23; Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 161, l. 11. There is no O. F. reviler, nor viler; the word was coined by prefixing F. re- (= Lat. re-, again) to O. F. aviler, thus producing a form raviler *, easily weakened into reviler, just as in the case of Repeal, q.v.

β. The O. F. aviler (mod. F. avilir) is 'to disprise, disesteeme, imbase, make vile or cheap. &c.; Cot. = F. a = Lat. ad, to; and vil, vile, from Lat. uilis. See Vile. Der. reviler. REVISE, to review and amend. (F., = L.) Also revivify, from re- and vivify; reviv-i-fic-at-ion.

F. révoquer. - Lat. revocare, to call back. - Lat. re-, back; and uocare, to call. See Re- and Voice. See Re- and Voluble. Der. revolv-er; revolution, M. E. reuolucion, Gower, C. A. ii. 61, l. 21, from F. revolution = Lat. acc. revolutionem, from nom. revolutio, a revolving, due to revolutus, pp. of revoluere. Hence revolution-ar-y, -ise, -ist. And see revolt.

REWARD, to requite, recompense, give in return. (F., -L. and Teut.) M. E. rewarden, verb, P. Plowman, B. xi. 129, Wyclif, Heb. xi. 26. Also reward, sb., used exactly in the sense of regard, of which it is a mere doublet. 'Took reward of no man' = paid regard to no one, P. Plowman, C. v. 40; see Chaucer, Legend of Good Women, prol. 399; Hampole, Pricke of Conscience, 1881; Will. of Palerne, 3339.—O. F. rewarder, the same as regarder, to regard (Burguy).—O. F. re- (= Lat. re-), back; and warder, the same as garder, a word of Teut. origin. See Regard, Guard, Ward. The Cock and the Fox, 581, 663, 721, 768, 794, 805. 'Hyer [here] begynneth thystorye [the history] of reynard the foxe; 'Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox, A.D. 1481. See the Introductory Sketch to The History of Reynard the Fox, ed. W. J. Thoms, Percy Soc., 1844.— F. renard, regnard (mod. F. rénard), a fox; Cot. β . Of Teut. origin; the famous epic is of Low G. origin, and was composed β. Of Teut. in Flanders in the 12th century; see the edition, by Herr Ernst Martin, Paderborn, 1874, of Willems, Gedicht von den vos Reinaerde (poem of the fox Reynard). Thus the E. and F. words are due to the Flemish name reinaerd or reinaert. This is the same as the O. H. G. reginhart, used as a Christian name, meaning literally 'strong in counsel,' an excellent name for the animal.

7. The O. H. G. regin, ragin, counsel, is the same as Goth. ragin, an opinion, judgment, advice, decree. This is not to be connected with Lat. regere, to rule, but with Skt. rackand, orderly arrangement, from rack, to arrange; see Fick, iii. 250.

8. The O. H. G. kart, strong, lit. hard, is cognate with E. Hard, q.v. The O. H. G. raginhart became later reinhart, a reynard, fox.

RHOMB, RHOMBUS, a quadrilateral figure, having all its sides equal, but not all its angles right angles. (F., -L., -Gk.; or L., -Gk.) The F. form rhomb is now less common than the Lat. form rhombus; but it appears in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, and in Milton, P. R. iii. 309. - F. rhombe, 'a spinning wheel; also, a figure that hath equal sides and unequal angles, as a quarry of glass,' &c.; Cot. - Lat. rhombus. - Gk. ρόμβος, anything that may be spun or twirled round, a spinning-wheel; also a rhomb, or rhombus, from a certain likeness to a whirling spindle, when the adjacent angles are very unequal. - Gk. ρέμβειν, to revolve, totter; nasalised form from βέπειν, to sink, fall, be unsteady, which is allied to G. werfen, to throw, mand E. warp; see Warp. The root is √WARP, to throw. Der. rhomb-ic; rhombo-id, i. e. rhomb-shaped, from βόμβο, crude form of βόμβο, and εlδ-os, form, shape; rhombo-id-al. Doublet, rumb, q.v. RHUBARB, the name of an edible plant. (F., - Low Lat., - Gk.) Spelt reubarbe by Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iv. c. 1 (R.); also Reubarbarum, id. b. iii. c. 5; rubarbe, Skelton, Magnificence, 2385.-O. F. rheubarbe, 'rewbarb;' Cot. Mod. F. rhubarbe. Cf. Ital. reobarbaro, rhubarb; spelt rabbarbaro in Florio. The botanical name is rheum. - Low Lat. rheubarbarum (= rheum barbarum), used by Isidore of Seville (Brachet). - Gk. βῆον βάρβαρον, rhubarb; lit. the Rheum from the barbarian country. β. Gk. βῆον appears to be an adjectival form, from βd, the Rha or Volga, the name of a river in Pontus; so that prov means 'belonging to the Rha;' and the word rhubarb means 'barbarian Rha-plant.' The word pa also denoted rhubarb, and the plant was also called Rha Ponticum, whence the Linnæan name Rheum Rhaponticum, which is tautological. 'Huic Rha uicinus est amnis, in cujus superciliis quædam uegetabilis eiusdem nominis gignitur radix, proficiens ad usus multiplices me-delarum; Ammianus Marcellinus, xxii. 8. 28; a passage which Holland translates by: 'Neere unto this is the river Rha, on the sides whereof groweth a comfortable and holsom root, so named, good for many uses in physick.' See Taylor's Words and Places, White's Lat. Dict. (s. v. rha), and Richardson. Y. As some river-names are Celtic, it is just possible that rha may be related to W. rhe, fleet, speedy, rhean, a rill.

RHUMB, the same as Rumb, q.v. RHYME, the same as Rime (1), q.v.

RHYTHM, flowing metre, true cadence of verse, harmony. (F., -L., -Gk.) Formerly spelt rithme, as in Minsheu, ed. 1627. - F. rithme, 'rime, or meeter;' Cot. - Lat. rhythmum, acc. of rhythmus. - Gk. βυθμός, measured motion, time, measure, proportion; Ionic form, βυσμός. Cf. Gk. βυσίς, a stream, βυμα, a stream, ρυτός, flowing; all from the base βυ-; cf. βέειν (for βέρειν), to flow. - SRU, to flow; see Rheum.

Quite distinct from rhyme; see Rime (1). Der. rhythm-ic, Gk. βυθμικός; rhythm-ic-al.

β. Root uncertain; Fick gives the theoretical Teut. base as REBYA; iii. 254. Perhaps from the base of the verb to rive; whence the orig. sense of 'stripe' or 'narrow strip;' see Rive. Der. rib, verb; ribb-ing; spare-rib; rib-wort, Palsgrave, a plantain, called simply ribbe (rib) in A S: see A S. Leechdows Glossery.

simply ribbe (rib) in A. S.; see A. S. Leechdoms, Glossary.

RIBALD, a low, licentious fellow. (F., - Teut.) M. E. ribald, but almost always spelt ribaud, P. Plowman, B. xvi. 151, v. 512; King Alisaunder, 1578; pl. ribauz, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris. 279, last line but one. - O. F. ribald, ribaud (ribauld in Cet.), a ribald, ruffian; mod. F. ribaut. The Low Lat. form is ribaldus; see Ducange. And see a long note in Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, 1839, p. 369. We also find Low Lat. ribalda, fem., a prostitute. B. Of uncertain origin; but the suffix -ald shews the word to be Teutonic; it answers to O. H. G. walt, power, and was (1) a common suffix in Frankish proper names, and (2) a common suffix in F. words, where it is used as a masc. termination denoting character, and commonly has a depreciatory sense, as in the present instance. Y. Diez connects ribald with O. H. G. hripi, M. H. G. ribe, a prostitute, and cites from Matthew Paris: 'fures, exules, fugitiui, excommunicati, quos omnes ribaldos Francia uulgariter consueuit appellare.' Hence also O. F. riber, to toy with a female (Roquefort); which fully explains the sense.

8. Scheler suggests O. H. G. riban (G. reiben), which not only means to rub, but to paint, to put rouge on the face; see Rive. The early history of the word appears to be lost.

Der. ribald-ry, M. E. ribaldrie, commonly written ribaudrie, Chaucer, C. T. 12258, P. Plowman, C. vii. 435.

RIBAND, RIBBAND, RIBBON, a narrow strip, esp. of RIBAND, RIBBAND, RIBBON, a narrow strip, esp. of silk. (C.) Spelt riband from a fancied connection with band, with which it has nothing to do; also ribband, Spenser, F.Q. iv. 10. 8. But the d is merely excrescent and is not always found in the M. E. period, though occurring in the Prompt. Parv. M. E. riban, P. Plowman, B. ii. 16; 'with ribanes of red golde' = with golden threads. 'Ragges ribaned with gold' = rags adorned with gold thread; Rom. of the Rose, 4754. Again, in Rom. of the Rose, 1077, Riches wears a purple robe, adorned with orfreis (goldembroidery) and ribaninges. It is thus clear that the early sense was 'embroidered work in gold,' and not so much a ribbon as a thread. Of Celtic origin. = Irish ribin, a ribbon; from rib, ribe, a flake, a hair, a ribbon; Gael. ribean, a riband, fillet, from rib, ribe, a hair, rag, clout, tatter, gin, snare, whence also ribeag, a hair, little hair, small rag, tassel, fringe, bunch of anything hairy; W. rhibin, a streak, from rhib, a streak. Also Breton ruban, cited by Stratmann, but not in Legonidec, ed. 1821. Cf. F. ruban, spelt riban in the 15th century, ruben in Cotgrave, rubant in Palsgrave; this may have been derived from Breton. I think this etymology, given in Stratmann, is conclusive, and that the suggestions of any connection with G. ring and band, or Du. rijg (a lace) and band, may as well be given up. The second syllable is due to the common Celtic dimin. suffix, as in W. bych-an, little, dimin. of bach, little; see Spurrell, Welsh Gram. p. 93.

bych-an, little, almin. of back, little; see Spurrell, Welsh Gram. p. 93.

RIBIE, the same as Rebock, q. v.

RICE, a kind of edible grain. (F., -Ital., -L., -Gk., -O. Pers.)

In Shak. Wint. Tale, iv. 3. 41; spelt rize in Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 49; rice in Levins; ryce in Palsgrave. -O. F. ris, 'rice,' Cot.; mod. F. riz. -Ital. riso. - Lat. oryza, rice. -Gk. δρυζα, also δρυζον, rice; both the plant and grain.

β. Doubtless borrowed from an O. Pers. word, not recorded, but related to Skt. vriki, rice, of which the root is supposed to be Skt. vriki to grow, increase, answering to an Aryan Δ. WARDH, to grow. Curtius (ii. 199) remarks that δρυζα 'is clearly a borrowed word; and, as is recognised by Pott, ii. 1. 168, and Benfey, i. 87 (cf. Hehn, 369), seems not so much directly to resemble the Skt. vriki in sound, as to be an attempt at reproducing a related Persian form which has a sibilant instead of λ. It is worth noticing as a proof that the Greeks tried to express a foreign v by o. Pictet, i. 273, gives the Afghan uriski, which also has a vowel in the place of v.' Raverty, in his Dict. of the Pushto or Afghan language, writes urijzey, wrijey, pl., rice; urijza'k, a grain of rice; pp. 1019, 1017.

γ. The word passed also into Arabic, in the forms uruz, the Span. arroz, rice, was borrowed from Arabic.

RICH, wealthy, abounding in possessions. (E.) (12th cent.), O. Eng. Homilies, i. 53, l. 10; Ancren Riwle, p. 66; Layamon, 128. (Not borrowed from F., but an E. word.) — A. S. rice, rich, powerful; Luke, i. 52; Mark, x. 25. The change from final c to ch is just as in Norwich from Norbwic, pitch from A. S. pic, &c.; see Mätzner, i. 145; and cf. beseech with seek, speech with speak, &c.+Du. rijk.+Icel. rikr.+Swed. rik. + Dan. rig. + Goth. reiks.+G. reich.

B. All from a Teut. type RIKA, rich, lit. powerful, ruling; Fick, iii. 248. Allied to Lat. ren, Skt. rája, a king, from A RAG, to rule (Lat. regere).
The fact that the word might have come into the language from F. riche, which is from M. H. G. riche (G. reich), does not do away with the fact that it has always existed in our language. But the deriv. riches is really of F. origin; see Riches. Der. rich-ly, A.S. riclice, Luke, xvi. 19; rich-ness, M. E. richnesse, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 155, l. 14. Also -ric in bishop-ric, where -ric = A. S. rice, a kingdom, dominion; cf. Icel. riki, Goth. reiki, G. reich, sb., dominion, allied to Lat. reg-num, and even to E. realm. And see Riches.

RICHES, wealth. (F., -O. H. G.) Now often regarded as a pl. sb. Shak. has it as a pl. sb., Timon, iv. 2. 32, Per. i. 1. 52; but usually as a sing. sb., Oth. ii. 1. 83, iii. 3. 173, Sonnet 87. M. E. richesse, a sing. sb.; 'Mykel was the richesse,' Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 30, l. 24. The pl. is richesses, Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 24, Langton, p. 30, 1. 24. The pr. is richesses, Ayenotic of Inwyl, p. 24, l. 21; Ancren Riwle, p. 168, l. 13. The word first appears (spelt riches) in Layamon, 8091. — F. richesse, 'riches, wealth;' Cot. Formed with suffix -esse (cf. Port. and Span. rigu-eza, Ital. ricch-ezza) from the adj. riche, rich. — M. H. G. riche, O. H. G. rikhi (G. reich), rich; cognate with E. Rich, q.v.

RICK, a heap or pile of hay or wheat. (E.) The vowel was formerly long, and an h has been lost; rick stands for reek, hreek. M. E. reek, Prompt. Parv. p. 428, col. 1, last line.—A. S. kreác, to translate Lat. aceruus, a heap; Wright's Vocab. i. 74, col. 2, 1, 5 from bottom. Also corn-hrýcca, a corn-rick; Ælfric's Homilies, ii. 178. + Icel. kraukr, a rick, small stack. Root unknown. Doublet, prov. E. ruck, a heap, the Scand. form, from Icel. hraukr, O. Swed. ruka, ruga, a heap (Ihre).

Der. ricochet, verb.

RICKETS, a disease of children, accompanied with softness of the bones and great weakness. (E.) The name was first given to this disease, about 1620, by the country-people in Dorsetshire and Somersetshire. This we learn from a treatise by Dr. Glisson, De Rachitide, cap. 1. The pseudo-Gk. term rachitis was invented by him, as he tells us, in partial imitation of the prov. E. name, as well as to denote the fact that it is sometimes accompanied by spinal disease; the word rachitis being founded on Gk. baxes, the spine, a word probably cognate with E. Bidge, q. v. By a singular blunder, it is now usual to derive rickets from 'Greek rachitis,' there being no such word in existence till A. D. 1650, which is the date of Glisson's treatise. See an excellent account in Rees' Encycl., 1819, vol. 30. 'Cavil 7. Hospitals generally have the rickets... Answer. Surely there is some other cure for a ricketish body than to kill it;' Fuller, Worthies of England, 1662; repr. 1840, vol. i. p. 47. A still earlier notice of rickets is in Fuller, Meditations on the Times (first pub. 1647), xx. p. 163, in Good Thoughts, &c., Oxford, 1810; see N. and Q. 6 S. ii. 219. The prov. E. 'rickety (unsteady) table' is well known. β. Formed, with pl. suffix -ets, from E. wrick, M. E. wrikken, to twist, used in the phr. 'to wrick (i. e. to twist) one's ancle.' Thus the word denotes a disease accompanied by distortion. 'The deuel wrikked her and ther, i. e. the devil (when seized by St. Dunstan) twisted hither and thither; Spec. of Eng., ed. Morris and Skeat, p. 22, 1.82. Allied to A.S. wringan, to wring; see Wring. + Du. wrikken, to stir to and fro; de bank wrikt nog, the bench stands totteringly still (i.e. is rickety); Sewel. See Wriggle.

RICOCHET, the rebound of a cannon-ball fired at a slight elevation. (F.) Not in Todd's Johnson. - F. ricochet, 'the sport of skimming a thin stone on the water, called a Duck and a Drake; Cot. Rabelais (Pantagruel, iii. 10) uses the phrase chanson de ricochet, which Cot. explains: 'an idle or endlesse tale or song.' Littré quotes from a writer of the 15th century: 'Mais que il cede je cederai, et semblablement respond l'autre, et ainsi est la fable du ricochet. B. There is also a F. verb ricocher, to ricochet, make ducks and drakes; and Scheler and Littré derive ricochet from ricocher. I suspect the derivation runs the other way, and that ricocher is merely a short form for ricocheter*. Y. The prefix is plainly the Lat. re-, again. The O.F. cochet is 'a cockerell, or cock-chick, also a shote or shetepig' [young pig], Cotgrave; in the former sense, it is a dimin. of caq, a cock. We cannot tell more till we know what the fable du coq, a cock. ricochet was; the English duck and drake is more intelligible, viz. from the ducking under water and coming up again; see Duck.

uruzz, aruzz, rice, sometimes also ruzz; Rich. Dict. pp. 56, 736; and RID, to free, deliver, disencumber. (E.) M.E. ridden, to separate the Span. arroz, rice, was borrowed from Arabic. liver, O. Eng. Homilies, i. 273; also spelt redden, id. ii. 19, l. 20. (Rid stands for red, and that for hred.) - A. S. hreddan, to snatch away, deliver; Grein, ii. 101. + O. Friesic. hredda. + Du. redden. + Dan. redde. + Swed. rädde. + G. retten.

B. Root uncertain; it is proredde. + Swed. rädde. + G. retten. B. Root uncertain; it is proposed to connect A. S. hreddan with A. S. hræö, quick, and G. retten with M. H. G. hrat, rad, quick; for which see Rather. If this be right, as is probable, the orig. sense is 'to be quick,' to rush to the rescue. Der. ridd-ance, Spenser, Daphnaida, 364; a hybrid word, with F. suffix -ance (Lat. -antia).

RIDDLE (1), a puzzling question, enigma. (E.) Strange as it may seem, it is certain that the word has lost a final s, and stands for riddles, with a plural riddles-es, if it were rightly formed. The loss of s was easy and natural, as it must have appeared like the sign of the plural number. M. E. redels; we find F. un devinal explained by a redels in Wright's Vocab. i. 160. 'The kynge putte forth a rydels,' other M$$. redels; Trevisa, iii. 181; and see P. Plowman, B. xiii. 184. — A. S. rédelse, pl. rédelsan, Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, c. xxvii. § 3 (bk. iii. pr. 4), c. xxxv. § 5 (bk. iii. pr. 12), where it means 'ambiguity.' The pl. rédelsas also occurs, Numb. xii. 8, where the A. V. has dark speeches.' The lit. sense is 'something requiring explanation.' Formed with suffixes -el-s (for -el-sa, March, A. S. Gram. § 228), from A. S. ræd-an, to read, interpret; we still use the phr. to read a riddle.' See Road. + Du. raadsel (for raad-se-la, by inversion of the suffixes); from raden, to counsel, to guess. + G.

RIDDLE (2), a large sieve. (E.) For hriddle, by loss of initial h.

M. E. ridil, Prompt. Parv. p. 433. The suffixes -il (or -el) and -er being of equal force, we find the corresponding word in the A. S. kridder, a vessel for winnowing com; Wright's Vocab. i. 34, col. 2. Cognate forms appear in Irish creathair, Gael. criathar, Corn. croider, Bret. krouer, a sieve; see Williams, Corn. Dict. Insteading of connecting these with Lat. cribrum (connected with cernere, from ✓ SKAR), it seems better to adopt the suggestion in Williams, that the Celtic forms are simply derived from Irish and Gael. crath, to shake, brandish; cf. W. crydio, crydu, to tremble, Bret. kridien, a trembling. The Gk. κραδάειν, to shake, wave, brandish, presents a striking similarity to the above Celtic words. The orig, sense was perhaps 'shaker.' Der. riddle, verb; cf. A. S. hridian, to sift, Luke, xxii. 31.

RIDE, to be borne along, esp. on a horse. (E.) M. E. riden, pt. t. rood, pp. riden (with short i); Chaucer, C. T. 94, 169, 624, 782, &c. -A. S. ridan, pt. t. rád, pp. riden, Grein, ii. 378. + Du. rijden. + Icel. rlóa. + Dan. ride. + Swed. rida. + G. reiten; O. H. G. ritan. B. All from Teut. base RID, to ride. Cf. Lat. rheda (a Celtic word), a four-wheeled carriage. Der. ride, sb., rid-er, rid-ing; also bedridden, q. v., raid, q. v., ready, q. v., road, q. v.

RIDGE, anything resembling the top of a quadruped's back, an extended protuberance. (E.) M. E. rigge, a back, esp. a quadruped's back, King Alisaunder, 5722; whence mod. E. ridge by mere weakening. The true form is rig in the nom. case, and rigge in the dative; confusion of these resulted in the extension of the dat. form to all cases. We find 'upon his rig' = upon his back, Havelok, 1775. We also find rug, Ancren Riwle, p. 264; pl. rugges, Layamon, 540. The double form is due to the A. S. y. — A. S. hryeg, the back of a man or beast; Grein, ii. 109. + Du. rug, back, ridge. + Dan. ryg. + Swed. rygg. + Icel. hryggr. + G. rücken; O. H. G. hrucki. β . All from Teut. base HRUGYA, Fick, iii. 85. It seems to answer exactly to Gk. paxis, the back, chine, ridge of a hill; the correspondence of Gk. 6 with Teut. Ar shews that an initial a has been lost in the Gk. word; Curtius, i. 436. Der. ridg-y. Doublet, rig (3).

BIDICULOUS, laughable, droll. (L.) In Shak. Temp. ii. 2.

169. Englished (by the common change from -us to -ous) from Lat. ridiculus, laughable. — Lat. riders, to laugh; see Risible. Der. ridiculous-ly, -ness. Also ridicule, orig. ridicle, as in Foxe, Acts and Monuments, pp. 132, 747 (R.), from Lat. ridiculum, a jest, neut. of ridiculus, but changed to ridicule by confusion with F. ridicule, ridicule.

lous, which is not a sb. but an adj.

RIDING, one of the three divisions of the county of York. (Scand.) Put for thriding; the loss of the th being due to the mis-division of the compound words North-thriding, East-thriding, and West-thriding; or it may be put for triding, in a similar way, if belonging to the Norwegian dialect. - Icel. pridjungr, the third part of a thing, the third part of a shire; see Cleasby and Vigfusson. - Icel. pridi, third, cognate with E. Third, q. v.+Norweg. tridjung, a third part; from tridje, third; Aasen.

RIFE, abundant, prevalent. (Scand.) M. E. rif (with long i), also rife, rive, ryfe, ryue; adv. rive, ryue. 'Pere was sorwe rive' = there was abundant sorrow, Will. of Paleme, 5414. 'Balu Per wes riue' = evil was abundant there ; Layamon, 20079. - Icel. rifr, munificent, abundant; cf. rifligr, large, munificent; O. Swed. rif. rife. A. S. & q. v. Cf. Du. wrikken, 'to move or stir to and fro;' wriggelen, 'to rif, abundant, is given by Etmüller; but it is an extremely scarce word, and borrowed; his reference (Obs. mi. dierum fest. nat.) I do not understand. β. Allied to O. Du. rijf, rijve, 'abundant, copious, or large,' Hexham; Low G. rive, abundant, munificent, extravagant. Cf. Icel. reifa, to bestow, reifir, a giver. Fick (iii. 254) derives this adj. from the verb to rive; if this be so, it meant 'rubbing away,' wasteful, extravagant; see Rive. Der rife-ly, rife-ness.

RIFF-RAFF, refuse, rubbish, the off-scourings of the populace. (F., - Teut.) 'Lines, and circles, and triangles, and rhombus, and (F., = Teut.) 'Lines, and circles, and triangles, and rhombus, and rifferaffe;' Gosson, School of Abuse, 1579, ed. Arber, p. 49, l. 26. Due to M. E. rif and raf, every particle, things of small value. 'The Sarazins, ilk man, he slouh, alle rif and raf' = He slew the Saracens, and the state of them. Rob. of Brunne, tr. of every man of them, every particle of them; Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 151. And again: That noither he no hise suld chalange rif no raf' = That neither he nor his should claim a single bit of it; id. p. 111, l. 2. = F. rif et raf; as, 'Il ne luy lairra rif ny raf, he will strip him of all;' Cot. So also: 'On n'y a laissé ne rifle, ne rafle, they have swept all away, they have left no manner of thing behind them; id. The lit, sense of rif is 'a piece of plunder of small value;' it is closely related to F. rifler, 'to rifle, ransack, spoile, make havock or clean work, sweep all away before him;' id. So also O. F. raffler, 'to rifle, ravage, to sweep all away,' id. also O. F. raffler, 'to rifle, ravage, to sweep all away,' id. The connected E. words are Rifle (1) and Raffle, q. v. Cf. O. Ital. raffold ruffola, by riffraffe, by hooke or crooke, by pinching or scraping;

BIFLE (1), to carry off as plunder, spoil, strip, rob. (F., -Teut.) M. E. riflen, P. Plowman, B. v. 234. - F. rifler, 'to rifle, ransack, spoile, make havock,' Cot. A word prob. due to the Norse seakings. Formed as a frequentative from Icel. hrifa, to catch, to grapple, seize, rifa (usu. spelt hrifa), to pull up, scratch, grasp; related to which are hrifsa, to rob, pillage, hrifs, sb., plunder. B. We also find Icel. hrifa, a rake, O. Du. rif, rieve, a small rake (Hexham); the form of the base would be harf-, answering to Lat. earpere; so that the root is probably KARP, to seize; see Harvest.

y. The F. rifler (from Icel. hrifa) and rafter (from G. raffen) may not have been connected in the first instance, but the similarity of sound drew them together, as recorded in the E. riff-raff, q. v. Der. rifl-er.

RIFLE (2), a musket with a barrel spirally grooved to give the bullet a rotary motion. (Scand.) A modern word; rifle and rifle-man appear in Todd's Johnson, ed. 1827. 'Rifled arms were known on the continent about the middle of the 17th century; they do not appear to have been introduced into the British service till the time of the American revolutionary war; Engl. Cycl. β . The sb. rifle is a short form for rifled gum, and is due to the technical word rifle, to groove. This is a dimin. form from the Scand. form of the verb to rive, and means 'to tear slightly,' hence to channel, to groove. See Ripple (1). - Dan. rifle, to rifle, groove, channel, as in riflede söiler, fluted columns; cf. rifle, a groove, flute; riffel, a rifled gun; Swed. reffla, to rifle; cf. reffelbössa, a rifled gun. - Dan. rive (for rife), to tear; Swed. rifua, to scratch, tear, grate, grind; Icel. rifa, to rive; see Rive. So also G. riefe, a furrow, riefen, to rifle. A. S. geriflian rests only on the authority of Somner, and is explained by 'rugare,' i. e. to wrinkle. If a true word, it does not correspond to E. rifle, but to the old verb rivel, to wrinkle; see Rivel. It is, however, a closely related word. Der. rifle-man. RIFT, a fissure. (Scand.) In Spenser, F. Q. i. 2. 30. M. E. reft, Rom. of the Rose, 2661; ryfte, Prompt. Parv. p. 433. = Dan. rift, a rift, rent, crevice, from rive, to rive; Norw. rift, a rift; Icel. ript, a breach of contract. Cf. Swed. refva, a rift, strip, cleft, gap; from Swed. rifva, to tear, rive. See Rive. Der. rift, verb, Temp. v. 45, spelt ryft in Palsgrave.

RIG (1), to fit up a ship with tackle. (Scand.)

Also to dress up a person, but this is merely the jocular use of the word, and not the old sense, as supposed by Johnson. In Shak., only in the nautical sense; Temp. i. 2. 146, v. 224, &c. 'High rigged ships;' Surrey, tr. of Virgil; Lat. text. celsas naues, Æn. iv. 396. 'I rygge a shyppe, I make it redye; Palsgrave. Of Scand origin; the traces of the word are very slight. - Norweg. rigga, to bind up, wrap round; in some districts, to rig a ship; rigg, sb., rigging of a ship; Aasen. (f. Swed. dial. rigga pd, to harness a horse, put harness on him (which presupposes a sb. rigg, with the sense of harness or covering, just as the Swed. sela pd, to harness, is from sele, sb., harness); Rietz. Perhaps related to A. S. wrihan, to cover. ¶ It is impossible that rig can be derived from A. S. wrihan, as has been suggested, because that

RIGID, stiff, severe, strict. (L.) In Ben Jonson, Epistle to a Friend, Underwoods, lv. 17. – Lat. rigidus, stiff. – Lat. rigere, to be stiff. Perhaps the orig. sense was 'to be straight;' cf. Lat. rectus, direct, right, straight. If so, it may be referred to KAG, to rule, direct. Der. rigid-ly, -ness, rigid-i-ty. Also rig-our, Chaucer, C. T. 11087, from O. F. rigour (mod. F. rigueur) = Lat. rigorem, acc. of rigor, harshness; rigor-ous, Cor. iii. 1. 267, from F. rigoreux, 'rigor-ous,' Cot.; rigor-ous-ly, -ness.

RIGMAROLE, a long unintelligible story. (Hybrid: Scand.; The word is certainly a corruption of ragman-roll, and F., - L.) once a very common expression for a long list of names, hence a long unconnected story. See my note to P. Plowman, C. i. 73, where it occurs as rageman; Anecdota Literaria, by T. Wright, 1844, p. 83, where a poem called Ragman-roll is printed; Wright's Homes of Other Days, p. 247; Jamieson's Dict., where we learn that the Scottish nobles gave the name of ragman-rolls to the collection of deeds by which they were constrained to subscribe allegiance to Edw. I, A. D. 1296; Towneley Mysteries, p. 311, where a catalogue of sins is called a rolle of ragman; Skelton, Garl. of Laurell, l. 1490, and Dyce's note; P. Plowman's Crede, l. 180; Cowel's Law Dict., and Todd's Johnson, s. v. rigmarole. Also the long note on ragman-roll in Halliwell. B. In the next place, ragman was a name for the devil; and ragman-roll is the devil's roll, the devil's list. For an example of ragman in this sense. see P. Plowman, C. xix. 122, and the note; it was also a contemptuous name for a coward. γ. The word roll is F.; see Roll. The word ragman is Scandinavian. Cf. Icel. ragmenni, a craven person, coward, ragmennska, cowardice; from Icel. ragr, a coward, and maîr (= manr), a man. Swed. ragren, the devil; Rietz cites O. Icel. ragrættr, an evil spirit, lit. a cowardly wight, where vættr is our E. wight = G. wicht in bösewicht, a bad spirit. To call a person ragr was to offer him the greatest possible insult.

5. The Icel. ragr is believed to be the same word as Icel. argr, effeminate, by a shifting of r, as in E. Run, q.v. For a notice of the Icel. argr, see Arch (2). The word roll was sometimes pronounced row (see Jamieson); hence we find in Levins, ed. 1570: Ragmanrew, series, where rew = row. RILE, to vex; see Roil

RILL, a streamlet, small brook. (C.?) 'The bourns, the brooks, the becks, the rills, the rivulets;' Drayton, Polyolbion, Song 1. (He also has the dimin. rill-et in the same Song.) - W. rhill, a row, trench, drill; contracted form of rhigol, a trench, groove; dimin. of rhig, a notch, a groove. If this be right, the true sense is 'shallow trench' or 'channel;' there is no difficulty in the transference of the sense to the water in the channel, since the words channel, canal, and kennél are used in a like ambiguous manner. β. There is also a Low G. rille, used in the sense of a small channel made by rain-water running off meadows, also, a rill; see Bremen Wörterbuch. This is obviously the same word; but it may likewise be of Celtic origin, as there is no assignable Teutonic root for it. On the other hand, the W. rhill has an intelligible Celtic origin in the W. rhig above cited; and, just as W. deg (ten) is cognate with Lat. decem, we may refer rhig to the Aryan ARIK, to tear, hence, to score, scratch, furrow; cf. Skt. likh, to scratch, lekhá, a stroke, mark, Gk. epeinesv, to rend, Lat. rima (for ric-ma), a chink; see Fick, i. 195. Der. rill-et, rill, verb. 65 See remarks on Drill (2).

RIM, a border, edge, verge. (E.) 1. M. E. rim, rym. 'Rym of a whele;' Prompt. Parv. - A. S. rima, rim; in the comp. sa-rima, seashore, lit. sea-rim; A. S. Chron. an. 897; see Sweet, A. S. Reader. col. 119, 1.6. Certainly connected with Rickets, and Wriggle, Cf. W. rhim, rhimp, rhimpn, a rim, edge, rhimpyn, an extremity; sible that the E, word was borrowed from Celtic. 2, We also find rim used in the sense of peritoneum or inner membrane of the belly, as in Shak. Hen. V, iv. 4. 15; and see Pricke of Conscience, l. 520, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, 1343; the sense may be 'border,' hence envelope or integument. This is probably the same word. Otherwise, cf. A.S. krif, the belly; see Midriff.

RIME (1), verse, poetry; the correspondence of sounds at the ends of verses. (E.) Usually spelt rhyme, in which case it is one of the worst spelt words in the language. This ridiculous spelling was probably due to confusion with the Gk. word rhythm, and it is, I believe, utterly impossible to find an instance of the spelling rhyme before A.D. 1550; perhaps not so soon. Dr. Schmidt omits to state that the first folio of Shak. has the spelling rime, Two Gent. of Verona, iii. 2. 69, Merry Wives, v. 5. 95, L. L. L. i. 2. 100; &c. It is rime in Minsheu, ed. 1627, and in Cotgrave; ryme in Palsgrave. M. E. rime, ryme, Chaucer, C. T. 13639, 13852, 13853, 13856; &c. — A. S. rim, number, computation, reckoning (Grein); the present peculiar use of the word is in a secondary sense, from the numerical regularity of verses as to syllables and accents, hence at last used to denote a particular accident of verse, viz. the consonance of final syllables, + Du. rijm. + Icel. rima. + Dan. riim. + Swed. rim. + G. reim, O. H. G. rim, Arim, number (to which are due Ital. rima, F. rime, Span. and Port. rima). + Irish rimh; W. rhif, number.

B. Curtius, i. 424, shews these words to be cognate with Gk. αριθμός, number, in which the θ is intrusive, as in πορθμός, a ferry, as compared with πόρος, a ferry. Irish not only has rimk, a number, but also aireamh in the same sense, which is also the Gaelic form; W. has both rhif and eirif; and these words go to shew that, in the Gk, dριθμός, the initial a is rather a part of the root than merely prosthetic, as supposed by Fick, i. 737. That is, the root is Aryan \(\sqrt{A}\) AR, to fit; whence also Harmony, q.v.; and see Arithmetic, Art. \(\gamma\). This ultimate connection of the words art, harmony, arithmetic, and rime is The root of rhythm is SRU, to flow; which highly interesting. is quite a different matter. Der. rime, verb (usually rhyme), M. E. rymen, rimen, Chaucer, C. T. 1461, from A. S. riman (Grein); rimeless (usually rhyme-less); rim-er (usually rhymer), spelt rimer in the first folio ed. of Shak. Antony, v. 2. 215; rime-ster (usually rhymester), the suffix of which is discussed under Spinster.

Whilst the word above RIME (2), hoarfrost, frozen dew. (E.) has no title to an h, the present word, conversely, has such a title; the word has lost initial k, and stands for hrime. M. E. rime, ryme. "Ryme, frost, pruina;" Prompt. Parv. — A. S. hrim, to translate Late, pruina; Ps. cxviii. 83, ed. Spelman (margin). + Du. rijm. + Icel. hrim. + Dan. riim. + Swed. rim. Cf. also G. reif, M. H. G. rife, O. H. G. hrifo, hoar-frost; Lithuan. szarmà, hoar-frost.

B. The orig. sense was prob. 'ice;' or literally, 'that which is hardened;' Curtius connects E. rime with Gk. κρυμ-όε, κρύ-οε, frost. κρύσταλλοε, ice, from KRU, to be hard; see Crystal, Crude, Crust, Raw.

RIND, the external covering, as the bark of trees, skin of fruit. (E.) M. E. rind, rinde; Ancren Riwle, p. 150, ll. 4, 8. - A.S. rinde, the bark of a tree, Wright's Vocab. i. 285, col. 2; also, a crust (of bread), Ælfric's Hom. ii. 114, last line but one. + O. Du. rinde, 'the barke of a tree;' Hexham. + G. rinde, O. H. G. rinta. Root unknown. RING(1), a circle. (E.) Put for kring, initial k being lost. M. E.

Further allied to Lat. circus; Gk. кріков, кірков; see Circus. Also to Skt. chakra (for kakra), a wheel, a circle; Russ. krug', a ring. Der. ring, verb, K. John, iii. 4. 31; ring-dove, so named from the ring on its neck; ring-er; ring-lead-er, 2 Hen. VI, ii. 1. 170; ring-let, used to mean 'a small circle,' Temp. v. 37; ring-straked, i. e. streaked with rings, Gen. xxx. 35; ring-worm, a skin disease in which rings appear, as if formed by a worm, Levins, ed. 1570. And see rink, circus, cycle, rank, range, harangue.

RING (2), to sound a bell, to tinkle. M.E. ringen, Chaucer, C. T. 3894. — A.S. kringan, to clash, ring; byrnan hringdon, breastplates clashed, Beowulf, 327, ed. Grein; ringden pa belle, they rang the bells, A.S. Chron. an. 1131. The verb is weak, and appears to be so in all Teutonic tongues except modern E., which has pt. t. rang, pp. rung (by analogy with sing); we also find pp. rongen, rungen, in Allit. Morte Arthure, ll. 462, 976, 1587. + Du. ringen. + Icel. hringia; cf. hrang, sb., a din. + Dan. rings. + Swed. rings.

Lat. clangor, a din; see Clang. Der. ring, sb., ring-er β. Allied to RINK, a space for skating on wheels, a course for the game of curling. (E.) The former use is modern; the latter is mentioned in curling. (E.) The former use is modern; the latter is mentioned in Jamieson's Dict. It appears to be a mere variation of ring; compare the use of ring in the compound prizering, and the cognate Latin through shady lanes along the vale of Eeman, which runs rippling word circus. As to the form, we may note the Low Dutch rink used over the stones; Gray, to Dr. Wharton, Oct. 18, 1769. As pointed rhimio, to edge; rhimmu, to form a rim. Root unknown; it is pos- as a variant of ring; see the Bremen Wörterbuch; and cf. vulgar E.

RINSE, to cleanse with clean water, make quite clean. (F., = Scand.) 'He may rynse a pycher;' Skelton, Magnificence, 2194. O. F. rinser, 'to reinse linnen clothes;' Cot. - Icel. hreinsa, to make clean, cleanse; from hreinn, adj., clean, pure (the suffix -sa is exactly the same as in E. clean-se from clean); so also Dan. rense, to purify, from reen, clean; Swed. rensa, to purify, from ren, clean. adj. is further cognate with G. rein, Goth. hrains, pure, clean; from the Teut. base HRAINYA, pure; Fick, iii. 82. Root unknown.

The prov. E. rench, to rinse, a Northern word, and the form reinse, RIOT, tumult, uproar. (F., = O. H. G.?) M. E. riote, Chaucer, C. T. 4390, 4418; Ancren Riwle, p. 198, last line. = F. riote, 'a brabbling, brawling;' Cot. Cf. Prov. riota, dispute, strife (Bartsch); Stal. riotta, quarrel, dispute; riot, uproar.

β. The orig. sense seems to be 'dispute;' of uncertain origin.

Diez conjectures F. riote to stand for zivote; cf. O. Du. revot, ravot, 'caterua nebulonum, et lupanar, luxus, luxuria;' Kilian. And he refers it to O. H. G. riben (G. reiben), to grate, rub (orig. perhaps to rive, rend); cf. G. sich an einem reiben, to mock, attack, provoke one, lit. to rub oneself against one. The word ribald appears to be of like origin; see Ribald, Rive. Der. riot, verb, M. E. rioten, Chaucer, C. T. 4412, from F. rioter, 'to chide,' Cot.; riot-er, M. E. riotour, Chaucer, C. T.

RIP, to divide by tearing open, cut open, tear open for searching into. (Scand.) 'Rip up griefe;' Spenser, F. Q. i. 7. 39. [It does not seem to be the same word as M. E. rippen, used in the Ormulum in the sense of 'rob;' this is a variant of M. E. ruppen, to rob, Layamon, 10584, and allied rather to Rob than to the present word.] It corresponds to M. E. ripen, used in the secondary sense of to grope, probe, search into, also used occasionally (like the mod. word) with the prep. up. 'Rypande . . the reynes and hert' = searching the reins and heart (said of God), Allit. Poems, B. 592. 'To rype upe the Romayns' = to search out the Romans, Morte Arthure, 'The riche kinge ransakes . . and up rypes the renkes' = the rich king seeks for and searches out the men, id. 3940. 'To ripe thair war'= to search their ware (where two MSS. have ransake), Cursor Mundi, 4893. 'I rype in olde maters, je fouble;' also, 'I ryppe a seame that is sowed;' Palsgrave. A Northern word, of Scand. origin. - Norweg. ripa, to scratch, score with the point of a knife (Aasen); Swed. dial. ripa, to scratch, also to pluck asunder (cf. E. rip open), Rietz; Swed. repa, to scratch, to ripple flax; repa up, to rip up; repa, sb., a scratch; Dan. oprippe, to rip up. Allied to Icel. rifa, (1) to rive, tear, rend, whence rifa aptr, to rip up; (2) to scratch, grasp, whence rifa upp, to pull up. Thus the word appears to be no more than a variant of Rive, q. v. often made, with A.S. ripan (mod. E. reap) does not seem to be well founded; I suppose the root to be different; see Reap. Der. rip, sb.; ripp-le (1), q.v., ripple (3), q.v.

ripe, rype, Chaucer, C. T. 17032.— A. S. ripe; 'and swa swa ripe yro fortreddon' = and trod [all] down like ripe corn; Ælfred, tr. of Beda, i. 12. This adj. signifies 'fit for reaping,' and (like the sb. rip, harvest) whence rijpen, to ripen. +G. reif, O.H.G. rif; whence reifen, to ripen, to reaps; see Reap. +Du. rijp; whence rijpen, to ripen, to ripen, to ripen. Der. ripe-ly, -ness; also ripen, verb, from A.S. ripian, Gen. xviii. 12.

RIPPLE (1), to pluck the seeds from stalks of flax by drawing an iron comb through them. (Scand.) A Northern word; see Jamieson. M. E. ripplen, ripelen. 'Rypelynge of flax, or other lyke, Avulsio;' Prompt. Parv. 'Hoc rupestre, a repylle-stok,' i. e. an implement for cleaning flax; Wright's Vocab. i. 269, col. 2. The cleaning of flax was also termed ribbing (a weakened form of rip-ripple, a flax-comb (Jamieson); and this sb. is derived from rip by help of the suffix -le, sometimes used to express the instrument by which a thing is done, as in beet-le = a beat-er; stopp-le, used for stopping, lad-le, used for lading out, gird-le, used for girding. So ripple = an instrument for ripping off the flax-seeds, from Swed. repa, ripple = an instrument for ripping on the nax-secus, from sweat repa, to ripple flax; see Rip.+Du. repel, a ripple, from repen, to beat flax (Hexham); whence repelen, to ripple.+Low G. repe, a ripple; in the dialect of Brunswick called repel, reppel; Bremen Wörterbuch. + G. riffel, a ripple; whence riffeln, to strip flax. See Ripple (3), Riffe (2). RIPPLE (2), to cause or shew wrinkles on the surface, like running water. (E.) The essential idea in the rippling of water is the significant of the surface.

running water. (E.) The essential idea in the rippling of water is that it shews wrinkles on the surface. It appears to be quite a modern word. The earliest quotation in Richardson and Johnson is the following: 'Left the Keswick road, and turned to the left rimple; 'As gilds the moon the rimpling of the brook,' Crabbe, Parish Register, part I, ed. 1807; where the edition of 1834 has rippling. M. E. rimplen, to wrinkle, whence the pp. rymplyd, explained by 'Rugatus' in Prompt. Parv.; cf. 'a rimpled vecke' = a wrinkled old woman, Rom. of the Rose, 4495. This verb is from the sb. rimple or rimpil; 'Rympyl, or rymple, or wrynkyl, Ruga;' Prompt. Parv. = A. S. hrympelle, to translate Lat. ruga, a wrinkle, in a gloss (Bosworth). See Rumple. + O. Du. rimpel, 'a wrinckle, or a folde,' Hexham; rimpelen, 'to wrinckle;' id. β. The A. S. hrympelle is derived from the strong verb hrimpan, to wrinkle, of which the only trace (in A.S.) is the pp. gerumpen (miswritten for or a late form of gehrumpen), occurring in a gloss (Bosworth). + O. H. G. hrimfan, M. H. G. rimpfen, to bend together, crook, wrinkle; cf. mod. G. rumpfen, to crook, bend, wrinkle.

y. As the verb is a strong one (pt. t. hramp), the Teut. base is HRAMP, a nasalised form of HRAP, answering to Aryan KRAP or KARP, as in Gk. κάρφειν, to wrinkle. The base KRAP is preserved also, in a nasalised form, in the E. Crimp, Cramp, q. v. δ. Closely allied to Rumple, as also to Crumple. Der. ripple, sb., though this (in the form rimple) is really a more orig. word than the verb.

form of Rip, q. v.

BISE, to ascend, go upward. (E.) M.E. risen, pt. t. roos (pl. risen), pp. risen; Chaucer, C. T. 825, 1501. – A. S. risan, pt. t. rás (pl. rison), pp. risen; Grein, ii. 382. + Du. rijzen. + Icel. risa. + O. H. G. risan, to move up, rise; also to move down, fall. + Goth. reisan, to hove ap, rise; also to move down, rain. + Golin.
reisan, pt. t. rais (pl. risum), pp. risans; only in the comp. ur-reisan (-A.S. ά-risan, mod. E. arise).
β. All from Teut. base RIS, to slip away, orig. expressive of motion only; cf. Skt. ri, to distil, ooze (we speak of the rise of a river); see Rivulet. The Du. rijzan even means 'to fall;' het loof rijst, the leaves fall (Hexham). Der. rise, sb., Hen. V, iv. 1. 289; a-rise, q. v.; ris-ing, a tumult, also a tumour, Levit, xiii. 2; also raise, q. v., rear, q. v.

RISIBLE, laughable, amusing. (F., -L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627.

-F. risible, 'fit or worthy to be laughed at;' Cot. - Lat. risibilis, laughable. - Lat. ris-, from ris-um, supine of ridere, to laugh; with suffix -bilis.

β. Perhaps ridere is related to Gk. κρίζειν, to creak; and is of imitative origin. Der. risibl-y, risibil-i-ty. From the same Lat. verb (pp. risus) are ar-ride (rare, = Lat. arridere, to laugh at), de-ride, de-ris-ion, de-ris-ive, ir-ris-ion, rid-ic-ul-ous.

RISK, hazard, danger, peril. (F., -Span., -L.) Spelt risque in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. -F. risque, 'perill;' Cot. Cf. Ital. risico, (in Ariosto, risco), formerly risigo, as in Florio; Span. riesgo, risk; Low Lat. risigus, riscus, risk. B. A maritime word, borrowed from Spanish. - Span. risco, a steep abrupt rock; from whence the sense of 'danger' may easily have arisen among sailors. Hence Span. arriesgar (arriscar in Minsheu), to venture into danger, lit. 'to go against a rock, where the prefix ar- stands for Lat. ad- before r following, as usual; also arriscado, bold, forward (lit. venturesome); Ital. arrischiarsi, to venture oneself, arrischiato, hazardous. - Lat. resecure, to cut back, to cut off short or abruptly; whence the Span. sb. risco (Ital. risico) was formed in the same way as E. scar. an abrupt rock, is formed from the root of the verb to shear or cut off. - Lat. re-, back; and secare, to cut; see Re- and Section. γ. This suggestion, due to Diez, is satisfactory; he strongly supports it by citing mod. Prov. rezeque, risk, rezegá, to cut off; resega, risk, also a saw, in the dialect of Como; Port. risco, risk, also a rock, crag, also a dash with the pen, riscar, to raze out with the pen (= Lat. resecure, i. e. to cut out). And cf. Ital. risico, risk, with risega, a jutting out, risegare, risecare, to cast off; &c. ¶ Devic attempts a connection with Arab. rizq. riches, good fortune, Rich. Dict. p. 731, but a risk is bad fortune; and, when he relies on the Span. arrissgar as shewing a prefix ar-=Arab. def. article al-, he forgets that this prefix really represents the Lat. ad. Besides, the Ital. word is risico, spelt risigo in Florio. Der. risk, verb, risk-y.

RITE, a religious ceremony. (L.) 'With sacred rites;' Spenser, F. Q. i. 12. 36. - Lat. ritus, a custom, esp. a religious custom. Cf. Skt. riti, a going, also way, usage, manner; from ri, to go. — RI, to go, run, let flow; Fick, i. 193; see Rivulet.

The F. rit or rite seems to be quite a modern word. Der. ritu-al, from F. ritual, 'rituall,' Cot., from Lat. ritu-alis, from ritu-, stem of ritus; ritu-al-ly; ritu-al-ism, ritu-al-ist.

BIVAL, a competitor. (F., -L.) For the sense, see Trench, On the Study of Words. In Shak. Two Gent. ii. 4. 174. - F. rival, sb., 'a rival, corrival, competitor in love;' Cot. - Lat. rivalis, sb., out by Richardson, it is a by-form or contraction of the older verb to Lat. rivalis, adj., belonging to a brook.—Lat. riv-us, a brook. rimble: 'As gilds the moon the rimpling of the brook,' Crabbe, stream; with suffix -alis. See Rivulet. Der. rival, adj., rival, verb, K. Lear, i. 1. 194; rival-ry, a coined word.

RIVE, to split, tear, slit, rend. (Scand.) M.E. riven, rynen (with u=v), Chaucer, C. T. 12762.—Icel. rifa, pt. t. rif, pp. rifinn =E. riven), to rive, tear; Dan. rive; Swed. rifva, to scratch, tear. + Du. rijven, to grate, to rake. + G. reiben, O. H. G. riban, to grate, β. Allied to Gk. ερείπειν, to throw or dash down, tear rub. down; from a base RIP. γ. Further, the form έρείπειν appears to be parallel to ἐρείπειν, to tear, break, rend, rive, from γ RIK, to tear, whence also Skt. likh, to scratch, Lithuan. rēkti, to cut, to plough a field for the first time. Der. rif-t, q.v. And see rip, ripple (1), ripple (2), riple (2), rivel; perhaps rib-ald, river.

RIVEL, to wrinkle. (E.) 'Praise from the rivell'd lips of toothless, bald Decrepitude;' Cowper, Task, b. ii. l. 488. 'And rivell'd up with heat;' Dryden, Flower and the Leaf, 378. M. E. rivelen (with u for v); 'Al my chekes... So riveled;' Gower, C. A. iii. 370. - A. S. ge-riftian, to wrinkle (Somner); a frequentative form from Rive, q. v. See note to Rifle (2).

RIVER, a large stream of running water. (F., -L.) M. E. riuer (with u=v); Chaucer, C. T. 3020; Rob. of Glouc., p. 1, l. 1. -O. F. riviere, mod. F. rivière, a river, stream. It is the same word as Span. ribera, a shore, strand, sea-coast, Port. ribeira, a meadow near the bank of a river (whence ribeiro, a brook), Ital. riviera, the sea-shore, a bank, also a river.

$\begin{align*} \beta \text{the sense of 'river' is} \end{align*} \begin{align*} \beta \text{the sense of 'river' is} \end{align*} unoriginal, and was perhaps due to confusion between Low Lat. (and Ital.) riva, a bank (= Lat. ripa), and Lat. rivus (Ital. rivo), a river. -Low Lat. riparia, (1) sea-shore or river-bank, (2) a river, Ducange; fem. of riparius, adj., formed from ripa, a bank.

Y. The etymology of ripa is doubtful; Corssen derives it from R1, to flow, with a suffix -pa. It seems far better to consider it as equivalent to Gk. ἐρίπ-νη, a broken cliff, scaur (hence, a steep edge or bank), from the base RIP, to rive, rend, tear off, seen in Gk. ἐρείπειν, to tear down, and in E. rive; see Rive. Cf. E. rift, a fissure, from the same source. Der. river-horse, the hippopotamus, Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. viii. c. 25. Also (from Lat. ripa) ar-rive, q. v. allied to rivulet.

RIVET, an iron pin for fastening armour, &c. together. (F., - Scand.) 'The armourers, With busy hammers closing rivets up.' Hen. V, iv. chor. 13. 'With a palsy-fumbling at his gorget Shake in and out the rivet;' Troil. i. 3. 175. Ryvet, revet, Palsgrave. - F. rivet, 'the welt of a shooe,' Cot. It also meant a rivet, as in 'si la broche n'est pas rivée à deux rivectz en couverture,' since it is here joined to the verb river; this occurs in a quotation dated by Littré August, 1489. In Hamilton's F. Dict. rivet is explained by 'rivet," and marked as a farrier's term. - F. river, 'to rivet, or clench, to fasten or turne back the point of a naile, &c.; also, to thrust the clothes of a bed in at the sides; Cot.

B. The F. etymologists give no satisfactory account of the word; Littré gives it up, and considers that the suggestion of Diez, viz. to connect the word with Icel. hrifa, a rake, does not much help us; there being no obvious connection in the sense. y. But the word is Scand., as shewn by the Aberdeen word riv, to rivet, clench, Shetland riv, to sew coarsely and slightly; which see in Jamieson. — Icel. rifa, to tack together, sew loosely together; rifa saman, to stitch together, an expression which occurs in the Edda, i. 346. Der. rivet, verb, expression which occurs in the Edda, i. 346. Der. rivet, verb, Hamlet, iii. 2. 90; Palsgrave has: 'I revet a nayle, Je rive;' also: Ryvet this nayle, and then it wyll holde faste.

RIVULET, a small stream. (L.) In Milton, P. L. ix. 420; Drayton, Muses' Elysium, Nymph. 6 (R.); and see quotation s. v. Rill. Not F., but an E. dimin., formed with suffix -et from Lat. riuul-us, a small stream, dimin. of riuus, a stream, river. (Prob. suggested by the similar word riveret, for which see Richardson, which is, however, a dimin. of River, and therefore from a different source, viz. Lat. ripa, a bank.)

B. The Lat. ri-uus is from ARI, to distil; cf. Skt. ri, to distil, coze, drop; whence also Liquid, q.v.

Der. (from Lat. riu-us) riv-al, q. v., de-rive, q. v. And see rite.

RIX-DOLLAR, the name of a coin. (Du., -G.) 'He accepted of a rix-dollar; Evelyn's Diary, Aug. 28, 1641; Evelyn was then at Leyden. - Du, rijks-daalder, a rix-dollar, Hexham gives rijcksdaelder, 'a rix-daller, a peece of money of five schillings, or 50 stivers.' - G. reichsthaler, 'a dollar of the empire.' - G. reichs, gen. case of reich, empire, allied to reich, rich, powerful; and thaler, a dollar; see Rich and Dollar.

ROACH, a kind of fish. (E.) Allied to the carp, but confused with the ray and the skate; fish-names being very vaguely used. M. E. roche. 'Roche, fysche, Rocha, Rochia;' Prompt. Parv. - A. S. reohhe' (perhaps for rohhe, as suggested by Ettmüller); we find 'Fannus, reohhe' in a list of fishes, in Wright's Vocab, i, 56, col. 1; spelt reohhe' in a list of fishes, in Wright's Vocab. i. 56, col. 1; spelt reohche, id. 77, col. 2. + Du. rog, a ray; O. Du. roch, 'a fish called a one who uses the same brook as another, a near neighbour, a rival. - & scait, Hexham. + Dan. rokke, a ray. + Swed. rocka, a ray, thornback. + G. roche, a roach, ray, thorn-back. + Lat. rūia (for rag-ia), a the Span. form. Doublet, ray (2).

ray; see Ray (2). Root unknown. ROAD, a way for passengers. (E.) Also used of a place where ships ride at anchor; this is the same word, the F. rade being borrowed from Teutonic. Also used in the sense of raid or foray; I Sam. rowed from feetonic. Also used in the sense of raid of foray; I Sam. xxvii. 10. Shak. has the word in all three senses; (1) Much Ado, v. 2. 33; (2) Two Gent. i. 1. 53; (3) Cor. iii. 1. 5. M. E. roode (for ships), Prompt. Parv.; rode (for horses); Cursor Mundi, 11427.—A. S. rád, a journey, riding expedition, road; Grein, ii. 362.—A. S. rád, pt. t. of ridan, to ride; see Ride. Der. road-stead, road-way, road-ster (for the suffix, see Spinster); also in-road. Doublet, raid. ROAM, to rove about, to ramble, wander. (E.) M. E. romen, P. Plowman, B. xi. 124; K. Alisaunder, 7207; Seven Sages, 1429 (in Weber's Met. Romances, vol. iii); Havelok, 64; Will. of Palerne, 1608. The older form is ramen, preserved in the derivative Ramble, q.v. In Layamon, 7854, in a description of a shipwreck, we are told that the ships sank, and the Romans 'rameden seond upen,' i. e. roamed (or floated about) over the waves. Here the vowel a is long, and the corresponding A.S. vowels can only be δ , d, or d. β . The etymology is (I think) from an A.S. (theoretical) form rámian*, to stretch out after, tend towards, spread, hence, to try to reach, go towards, and so to journey or rove about. The evidences for the existence of such a verb are considerable, as will presently appear. We still have rame, to roam, ramble, as a Yorkshire word (Halliwell); Ray, in 1691, mentions ream, to stretch out the hand to take anything, to reach after, rame, to reach; Thoresby, in 1703, mentions raume, to reach; Brockett has rame, raim, rawm, to reach anything greedily, to stretch after; the Holderness Glossary (E.D.S.) has rame, to gad about, to sprawl, to spread out too much; 'These branches is ramin all ower walk ommost [almost], we mun hev 'em cut.' Cf. Exmoor ream, to stretch (Grose). y. In Anglo-Saxon we find the derived verb å-råman, explained by Grein 'se erigere, surgere, se levare;' but it may be better explained by the notion of spreading or stretching out; thus, in Cædmon, ed. Thorpe, p. 174, l. 10, we have 'dæges briddan up ofer deóp wæter ord åræmde' = up over the deep water the beginning of the third day extended (or spread out like a growing light). Again, in Cædmon, ed. Thorpe, p. 203, l. 29, we have 'up aramde se eorl' = the earl (Abraham) stretched himself up (i. e. arose). Again, in the same, p. 23, l. 15, we have the passage, where Satan laments the loss of heaven: 'beah wé hine, for þám alwealdan, ágan ne moston, rómigan úres ríces,' which may mean 'though we, because of the Almighty's opposition, cannot get possession of it (heaven), cannot win our kingdom (or even perhaps, cannot roam over our kingdom).' That is, there is nothing against our taking A.S. rómigan as nearly the equivalent of mod. E. roam; it only occurs in this sole passage, but it is believed to be borrowed from the O. Sax. rómón, mentioned below. cognate languages, the word is clearer, but not too clear. We have O. Du. ramen, to stretch cloth (Hexham); Du. ramen, to hit, plan, aim; O. Sax. rómón, to aim at, strive after; O. Fries. ramia, to strive after; O. H. G. rámén, to aim at, strive after. The O. H. G. rámén (also ráman) is a weak verb, and derived from the sb. rám, an aim, object, a striving after; the orig. sb., preserved in no other language. I may add that this view, as to the source of the E. roam, agrees with that given by E. Müller; it deserves to be further worked out. Wedgwood suggests a connection with E. room, A. S. rúm; this is obviously wrong, and deals with the wrong vowel-sound, as shewn by the derivative ramble; the form of the base is RÂM, not RÛM, which excludes that theory at once. B. At the same time, it can hardly be doubted, that the use of the word was largely and early influenced by the word Rome, on account of the frequent pilgrimages to it. Not only the Ital. romeo, a pilgrim, is derived from Roma, Rome, and denoted a pilgrim to Rome; but even in P. Plowman we have religious romares = religious pilgrims, B. iv. 120, which the author probably himself regarded as an equivalent to Rome-renneres = runners to Rome, B. v. 128 (only 8 lines below). This is probably why the orig. sense of 'extend' or 'seek after' or 'strive after' or 'reach towards' is now utterly lost sight of, and the sense of purposeless wandering alone left. But we can still say 'a great rambling house' in the sense of a house that is spread over a considerable space of ground. Der. roam-er, as above; and ram-b-le.

BOAN, the name of a mixed colour, with a decided shade of red. (F.) 'Roen, colour of an horse, roven;' Palsgrave. In Shak. Rich. II, v. 5. 78; I Hen. IV, ii. 4. 120. Explained by Schmidt as 'dark dappled-bay.' = O. F. rouën; 'Cheval rouën, a roane horse;' Cot. Perhaps there was an O. F. form roan*, as intimated by Scheler; the mod. F. word is rouan. Cf. Span. ruano, sorrel-coloured, roan; Ital. roano, rouano, 'roane,' Florio. β. Origin unknown; the Ital. rouano looks like an extension from O. Ital. rufo, red (Florio);

¶ Taylor (Words and Places) says: 'A curious instance of change of application in a name occurs in the case of the strong Normand horses which were imported from Rouen. They were called Rouens or Roans, a word which has now come to denote the colour of the horse rather than the breed.' He does not adduce one tittle of evidence, nor deign to name any authority. It was suggested by the fact that the name of Rouen is spelt Roan in 1 Hen. VI, i. 1. 65 (first folio), and in Minsheu's Dictionary, &c. But if this be the right solution, it is strange indeed that the French dictionaries should know nothing about it. Nares mentions this 'etymology' only to declare against it.

ROAN-TREE, ROWAN-TREE, the mountain-ash. (Scand.) A Northern term, and of Scand. origin. Spelt roun-tree, roan-tree, rowan-tree in Jamieson. - Swed. rönn, O. Swed. rönn, runn (Ihre), the mountain-ash; Dan. ron, the service, sorb, mountain-ash; Icel.

reynir, the same. Cf. Lat. ornus, the same.

ROAR, to cry aloud, bellow. (E.) M. E. roren, Wyclif, Rev. x. 3. - A. S. rárian, Ælfric's Homilies, i. 66, l. 18; and in Sweet's A. S. Reader. + M. H. G. réren. β. A reduplicated imitative word from A RÅ, to bellow, whence Skt. rá, to bellow, Lithuan. rë-ju, I scold, chide, and Lat. latrare, to bark. Der. roar, sb.; roar-ing.

ROAST, to cook meat before a fire. (F., -G.?) M.E. rosten, Legends of the Holy Rood, ed. Morris, p. 58, l. 504; Legend of St. Christopher, l. 203; Chaucer, C. T. 385.—O. F. rostir, 'to rost, broile, tost,' Cot. Mod. F. rôtir. Prob. from G. rösten, to roast, a weak verb formed from rost, a grate, grid-iron. β . But the word may be Celtic; we find Irish roistin, a grid-iron, rostain, I roast, rost, roast meat; Gael. rost, roist, W. rhostio, Bret. rosta, to roast. The difficulty is to assign the root of it. Der. roast, sb.; roast-meat (=roast-ed meat).

ROB, to plunder, steal, spoil. (F., -O. H. G.) In early use. M. E. robhen, Havelok, 1958; Ancren Riwle, p. 86, l. 13. -O. F. robber, 'to rob,' Cot. Usually spelt rober. The orig. sense was to despoil the slain in battle, to strip, disrobe; so that the verb is merely formed from the sb. robe, spelt robbe in Cotgrave, a robe. See Robe. ¶ The E. verb reave (usually bereave) is formed, in a precisely similar way, from the A.S. sb. reúf, clothing. Der. robber, M. E. robbour, Rob. of Glouc., p. 94, l. 17, from O. F. robbeur, 'a robber, Cot.; robbere, M. E. roberie, O. Eng. Homilies, ii. 61, 1. 27, from F. robberie, 'cothere,' Cot. Doublet, reave.

ROBE, a garment, dress. (F., -O. H. G.) M. E. robe, Rob. of Glouc., p. 313, l. 1; P. Plowman, B. ii. 15. -F. robe, a robe; spelt robbe in Cotgrave. - M. H. G. roub, roup, O. H. G. raup (G. raub), booty, spoil; hence, a garment, because the spoils of the slain consisted objects of clothing. A S. roth gradient leads in Landau. sisted chiefly of clothing. + A.S. reif, spoil, clothing. + Icel. rauf, spoil.

ROBIN, a singing-bird, the red-breast. (F., -O. H. G.) 'Robyn redbrest;' Skelton, Phyllyp Sparowe, 399. 'The most familiar of our wild birds, called Robin red-breast, from Robin (the familiar version of Robert), on the same principle that the pie and the daw are christened Mag (for Margery) and Jack. In the same way the parrot takes its name from Pierrot, the familiar version of Pierre; Wedgwood. Robin Hood is mentioned in P. Plowman. B. v. 402. F. Robin, a proper name (Cotgrave); a pet name for Robert, which was early known in England, because it was the name of the eldest son of Will. I. β. Robert is a Frankish name, from O. H. G. Ruodperht (G. Ruprecht, whence our Rupert), meaning 'fame-bright, i. e. illustrious in fame.

7. The syllable perhi is cognate with E. Bright, q. v. The syllable Ruod- is cognate with Icel. hrothr, praise, fame; it occurs also in Rud-olf, Rud-iger, Ro-ger. Cf. Goth. hrotheigs, victorious, triumphant, 2 Cor. ii. 14. And see Hobgoblin.

ROBUST, vigorous, in sound health. (F., -L.) 'A robust boysterous rogue knockt him down;' Howell, Famil. Letters, b. i. sect. 3. let. 21; dated 1623. – F. robuste, 'strong, tough;' Cot. – Lat. robustus, strong; formed by adding -tus (Aryan -ta) to O. Lat. robus (later robur), strength.

β. The O. Lat. robus is allied to Skt. rabhas, strength, force, from γ RABH (Skt. rabh), to seize.

Description: robust-ness. Also (obsolete) robust-i-ous, Shak. Haml. iii. 2. 10, better spelt robusteous, as in Blount, directly from Lat. robusteus, oaken (hence, strong), by the change of -us into -ous, as in numerous other words, ROC, a huge bird. (Pers.) See Rook (2).

ROCHET, a surplice worn by bishops. (F., – O.H.G.) In the Rom. of the Rose, 4757. – F. rochet, 'a frock, loose gaberdine; .. also, a prelates rochet; 'Cot. – O.H.G. roch, hroch (G. rock), a coat, frock. Root roano, roano, roano, from C. Span. ruano, sorret-conoured, roan ; ital. roano, roano, roano, from C. Span. ruano, sorret-conoured, roan ; ital. roano, roano, roano, from C. Ital. rufo, red (Florio); which is from Lat. rufus, red. Mahn (in Webster) suggests Lat. ratus, gray-yellow, which seems impossible, esp. as compared with cent., Littré), commonly roche, a rock; the masc. form roc is later, and only dates from the 16th century. Cf. Prov. roca, Span. roca, Port. roca, rocha, Ital. rocea, roceia, a rock. Perhaps (says Littré) of Celtic origin.—Irish and Gael. roc, a rock; Breton roch, pronounced with guttural ch, indicating that the word is Celtic, and not borrowed from French. That the word is lost in W. may be due to the use of eraig, a crag, in preference. B. Macleod and Dewar note that the Gael. roc, in the sense of 'rock,' is English; however, the word occurs in Irish and Breton. The Gael. and Irish roc, in the sense of 'wrinkle' (E. ruck), are certainly purely Celtic, being cognate with Lat. ruga. Whether there is any connection between these latter words and rock, I cannot say. y. Diez suggests a theoretical Low Lat. rupica* (from rupes, a rock), to account for Ital. rocea, and a form rupea* to account for F. rockwhich is hardly satisfactory. The M.E. rocke, in Gower, C.A. i. 314, is from F. roche. Der. rock-pigeon, -salt, -work; rock-y, rock-i-ness. ROCK (2), to move backward and forward, to cause to totter, to totter. (Scand.) M. E. rokken, Chaucer, C. T. 4155; Ancren Riwle, p. 82, l. 19. — Dan. rokke, to rock, shake; allied to Dan. rykke, to pull, tug, from ryk, a pull, a tug; Swed. rockera, a frequentative form, to rock, allied to rycka, to pull, from ryk, a pull, jerk. Cf. Icel. rykkja, to pull roughly and hastily, from ryk, a pull, jerk. Cf. Icel. rykkja, to pull roughly and hastily, from ryk, a pull, slos a spasm. Also G. rücken, to move by pushing; from ruck, a pull, jolt, jerk. Note also Icel. rugga, to rock a cradle. All from a Teut. base RUK, descriptive of a jolt, jerk, sudden movement. Der. rock-er, rock-ing-chair.

ROCK (3), a distaff. (Scand.) In Dryden, tr. of Ovid, Metam. b. viii., Meleager, l. 257. M. E. rokke. 'Rokke, of spynnyng, Colus;' Prompt. Parv. — Icel. rokkr, a distaff; Swed. rock; Dan. rok. + G. rocken, M.H.G. rocke, O.H.G. rocken, a distaff. Root unknown. Perhaps from Dan. rokke, to rock; see Rock (2). Der. rock-et (1), q. v.

The rocket seems to have been named from its long thin shape, bearing some resemblance to a quill or bobbin for winding silk, and so to a distaff. The Ital. rocchetto is the dimin. of rocca, 'a distaffe or rocke to spinne with;' Florio. — M. H. G. rocke, a distaff: see Bock (2).

Florio. – M. H. G. rocke, a distaff; see Rock (3).

ROCKET (2), a plant of the genus Eruca. (F., – Ital., – L.) In Levins. Spelt rokat in Sir T. Elyot, Castle of Helth, b. ii. c. 9. – F. roquette, 'the herb rocket;' Cot. – Ital. ruchetta, 'the herb called rocket;' Florio. Dimin. of ruca, garden-rocket, Meadows (omitted in Florio). – Lat. eruca, a sort of cole-wort (White); whence the Ital. ruca, by loss of e. Root unknown.

ROD, a slender stick. (E.) M. E. rod, Gower, C. A. i. 310, l. 4. The word is a mere variant of rood, by a shortening of the vowel-sound of which we have a few other examples, viz. in gosling from A. S. gósling, blossom from A. S. blóstma, shod from A. S. gescód, fodder from A. S. fódor; not very dissimilar are blood, mother, from A. S. blód, módor. In the Owl and Nightingale, l. 1644 (or 1646), we have rod used in the sense of rood or gallows. 'Thou seist that gromes the i-foö, An heie on rodde the an-hoō' = thou (the owl) sayest that men take thee, and hang thee high on a rod (rood). See further under Rood. Doublet, rood.

RODENT, gnawing. (L.) A scientific term. — Lat. rodent-, stem of pres. part. of rodere, to gnaw. Akin to radere, to scratch; from ARAD, to scratch; see Rase. Cf. Skt. rada, a tooth. Der. (from Lat. rodere) cor-rode, e-rode. And see rostrum, rat.

RODOMONTADE, vain boasting. (F., = Ital.) 'Crites. And most terribly he comes off, like your rodomontado;' Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, Act v. sc. 2. 'And triumph'd our whole nation In his rodomont fashion;' id. Masque of Owls, Owl 5. — F. rodomontade, 'a brag, boast;' Cot. — Ital. rodomontada, 'a boaste, brag;' Florio. A proverbial expression, due to the boastful character of Rodomonte, in the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, bk. xiv; called Rodomonte by Bojardo, Orlando Innamorato, ii. 1. 56. Said to be coined from Lombard rodare (= Ital. rodare), to turn about, and monte, a mountain. See Rotary and Mount (1).

ROE (1), a female deer. (E.) M. E. ro; Chaucer, C. T. 4084, purposely gives the Northern E. ra. — A. ROE (2), the eggs or spawn of fishes. (Scand.) The form roe is in Shak. Rom. ii. 4. 39. But it is due to a curious mistake. The true form is roan (with oa as in oak), but it seems to have been regarded as a plural, like oxen, eyne (eyes), shoon (shoes), so that the n was dropped. This is unusual (perhaps unique) in the case of apparent plurals in -en or -n, but common with plurals (or rather supposed plurals) in -s; as shewn under cherry, sherry, pea. ROGATION, supplication. (F., - L.) Particularly used in the phr. Rogation-days; see the Prayer-book, Hooker, Eccl. Polity, b. v. s. 41, Foxe, Acts and Monuments, p. 914, Hen. VIII (R.) - F. rogation; pl. rogations, 'rogation-daies;' Cot. - Lat. rogationem, acc. of rogatio, a supplication, an asking. - Lat. rogatus, pp. of rogare, to ask. Root uncertain. Der. rogation-days. Also (from rogare) ab-rogate, ar-rogate, ar-rogate, de-rogate, inter-rogate, pre-rogat-ive, pro-rogue, super-e-rogat-ion, sur-rogate.

ROGUE, a knave, vagabond. (F., - C.) The word sometimes meant merely a wandering mendicant; see K. Lear, iv. 7. 39, and Trench's Select Glossary. Shak, also has roguing, roguish, vagrant; Per. iv. 1. 97; K. Lear, iii. 7. 104. Cotgrave has: 'Roder, to roam, wander, vagabondize it, rogue abroad.' But the E. roguish also has the sense of arch, pert, and this can only be due to F. rogue, 'arrogant, proud, presumptuous, malapert, saucie, rude, surly;' Cot. Thus the sense of 'surly fellow' would seem to be the original one, easily transferred to beggars as a cant term; and then the verb to rogue abroad would mean 'to go about as a beggar.' B. That a rogue was a common cant term may be seen in Harmán's Caueat, ed. Fumivall; he devotes cap. iv (pp. 36-41) to the description of 'a roge,' and cap. v to the description of 'a wylde roge.' He concludes by saying: 'I once rebuking a wyld roge because he went ideally about he shewed me that he was a heave he interest he interests he in the protection of the concludes by saying: 'I once rebuking a wyld roge because he went ideally about he shewed me that he was a heave he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he went interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interests he interes cludes by saying: 'I once rebuking a wyld roge because he went idelly about, he shewed me that he was a begger by inheritance; his grandfather was a begger, his father was one, and he must nedes bone by good reason.' It just corresponds to the modern tramp. \(\gamma\). [The M. E. roge, cited in Halliwell, is of unknown meaning; it rimes with dog, so that it may not be the same word; the M. E. roge, in Morte Arthure, 3272, seems to be O. Swed. roge, a crowd. I do not think these words belong here at all.]

8. The F. rogue is referred by Diez to Icel. hrókr, but this word means lit. 'a rook,' and secondarily, a croaker, long-winded talker; which does not suit the sense. Littré and Scheler refer it, much more suitably, to Bret. rok, rog. arrogant, proud, haughty, brusque, which is obviously right.

6. The Bret. form rok could not have come out of the F. form, and that the word is Celtic is borne out by Irish and Gael. rucas, pride, arrogance. Der. rogu-ish, -ly, -ness; rogu-er-y.

ROIL, RILE, to vex. (F.,?-L.?) That rile is the same word as roil, to vex, is certain; similarly toil, soil, are occasionly pronounced title, sile. But the old word roil seems to shew two distinct meanings, (1) to disturb, vex, trouble, and (2) to wander about, to romp. I have given numerous examples in my note to P. Plowman, C. vi. 151. Mr. Atkinson suggests Icel. rugla, to disturb, as the possible origin of roil in the former sense; but this is not satisfactory, for it is difficult to see how the diphthong oi could have come out of ug. \(\beta\). It occurs to me that the suggestion in Stratmann as to roil, to wander about, may perhaps serve for the word in all its senses. His suggestion is that it arose from O. F. roeler, another form of O. F. roler, whence E. roll. To roll a thing about is to disturb it; to roll one-self about is to wander. See Roll.

ROISTERING, turbulent, blustering. (F., = L.) Todd cites from Swift (no reference): 'Among a crew of roist'ring fellows.' Shak. has roisting, Troil. ii. 2. 208; and Levins has royst, vb. We have Udall's play of Roister Doister, written before 1553; and the sb. roister is in the Mirror for Magistrates (Nares). Roister, a bully, a ruffian or turbulent fellow, seems to be the orig. word which gave rise to the verb roist on the one hand, and the adj. roistering, i. e. ruffianly, on the other. = F. rustre, 'a ruffin, royster, hackster, swaggerer, sawcie fellow;' Cot. This Littré explains as being another form of O. F. ruste, a rustic, the r being 'epenthetic.' = Lat. rusticus, acc. of rusticus, rustic, hence clownish. See Rustic.

ROLL, to turn on an axis, revolve, move round and round. (F., -L.) In early use; M. E. rollen, Layamon, 22287, later text; Chaucer, C. T. 12772.—O. F. roler, later rouler, to roll.—Low Lat. rotulare, to roll. revolve.—Lat. rotula, a little wheel; dimin. of rota, a wheel. See Rotary. Der. roll, sb., M. E. rolle, Ancren Riwle, p. 344, l. II, from O. F. rolle, later roule, 'a rowle,' Cot., which from Low Lat. rotulum, acc. of rotulus, a roll (preserved in the phrase custos rotulorum). Also roll-er, roll-ing, roll-ing-pin, rolling-press. Also (from F. roule) roul-eau, roul-eite. Also cont-rol, q. v.; perhaps roil.

ROMANCE, a fictitious narrative. (F., — L.) The French

ROMANCE, a fictitious narrative. (F., - L.) The French originals from which some E. poems were translated or imitated are often referred to by the name of the romance. Rob. of Glouc. (p. 487, last line), in treating of the history of Rich. I, says there is more about him 'in romance;' and, in fact, the Romance of Richard Cuer de Lion is extant in E. verse; see Weber's Met. Romances. — O. F.

romans, a romance (Burguy). This peculiar form is believed to have arisen from the late Lat. adv. romanice, so that romanice loqui was translated into O. F. by parler romans. It then became a sb., and passed into common use. The Prov. romans occurs (1) as an adj. = Lat. Romanus, (2) as a sb., the 'Roman' language, and (3) as a sb., tati. Romanus, (2) as a so, the Roman language, and (3) as a so, a romance.

B. By the 'Roman' language was meant the vulgar tongue used by the people in everyday life, as distinguished from the 'Latin' of books. We now give the name of Romance Languages to the languages which are chiefly founded on Latin, or, as they are also called, the Neo-Latin languages.

7. The late Lat. Romanice, i. e. Roman-like, is formed from the adj. Romanus, Roman.

Lat. Roma, Rome. Der. romance, verb, romanc-er. Also (from Romanus) Roman, Roman-ist, Roman-ism, Roman-ise; also roman-esque, from F. romanesque, 'Romish, Roman,' Cot., from Ital. Romanesco, Romanish. Also (from Roma) Rom-ish. And see Romaunt.

ROMAUNT, a romance. (F., - L.) The Romaunt of the Rose, usually attributed, on insufficient grounds, to Chaucer, is a wellknown poem. It is a translation of the French poem La Roman de la Ross. Thus romaunt answers to F. roman. The final t is excrescent after n, as in tyrant, but is found in F. as well as E.; the O. F. form was (occasionally) romant, or even roumant, as in Bartsch, Chrestomathie Française, col. 401, l. 10. Another O. F. form of the same word was romans (whence E. romance), so that romans, roman, romant are three forms of the same word; I have here mentioned them in their chronological order. See further under Romance. Der. romant-ic, spelt romantick in Phillips, ed. 1706, from mod. F. romantique, romantic, an adj. formed from romant, another form of roman, as explained above; romant-ic-al-ly. ROMP, to play noisily. (F., – Teut.) In the Spectator, no. 187, we find a romping girl, and rompishness. The older spelling was Ramp, q.v. Pethaps we may compare A. S. rempend, hasty, Ælfred. The change from a to o before Past. Care, c. xx (p. 148, l. 10). m occurs also in from (orig. fram), comb (orig. camm), womb (Scotch wame); before n, it is tolerably common. Der. romp, sb., romp-ish, romp-ish-ly, romp-ish-ness.

RONDEAU, a kind of poem. (F., - L.) Borrowed from mod. F. rondeau. The M. E. word was Roundel, q. v. roundel.

ROOD, the holy cross: a measure of land. (E.) The same word as rod, as shewn under Rod. Hence its use as a measure of land, because measured with a measuring-rod or 'pole,' of the length of 51 yards, giving a square rod of 301 square yards, and a square rod of 40 square rods, or a quarter of an acre. For the sense of 'cross,' see Legends of the Holy Rood, ed. Morris. - A. S. ród, a gallows, cross, properly a rod or pole; Matt. xxvii. 40, John, xix. 17. + O. Fries. rode, O. Sax. roda, gallows, cross. + Du. roede, a rod, perch, wand, yard. + G. ruthe, O. H. G. riuti, a rod of land. + Lat. rudis (for rudhis?), a rod, staff. Cf. Skt. nyag-rodha, the Indian fig-tree, lit. 'growing downwards,' from nyanch, downwards, and rudh, old form of ruh, to grow. 'Rudis, a staff, certainly belongs to the RUDH (also Skt. ruh), to grow; for it corresponds to A.S. ród-(a), O. H. G. ruota, which require an ante-Teutonic dh. Add Zend. rud, grow, liudan, to grow (with I), Church Slav. roditi, parere; 'Curtius, Der. rood-loft (Nares).

BOOF, the covering of a house. (E) Put for hroof, initial h being lost. M. E. rof, Havelok, 2082; rhof, Ormulum, 11351.—A. S. hrof, a roof, Mark, ii. 4. + O. Fries. hrof. + Du. roef, a cabin. + Icel. hróf, a shed under which ships are built or kept. β. We find also Russ. hrov', a roof. Perhaps allied to Gk. κρύπ-τειν, to hide; see Crypt. Der. roof, verb; roof-ing, roof-less.

BOOK (1), a kind of crow. (E.) M. E. rook, Prompt. Parv.—

A. S. Aróc; Ps. 146, 10; ed. Spelman. + Icel. Arókr. + Dan. raage. + Swed. roka. + Irish and Gael. rocas. + M. H. G. ruoch, O. H. G. hruoh; cf. G. ruchert, a jackdaw (Flügel).

B. The word means croaker; cf. Goth. hruhjan, to crow as a cock; Skt. hrug, to cry out; Gael. roc, to croak. A word of imitative origin; see Croak, Crow. Der. rook-er-y.

ROOK (2), a castle, at chess. (F., - Pers.) Roke of the chesse, roc; 'Palsgrave. M. E. rook, Prompt. Parv. F. roc, 'a rook at chesse,' Cot. Pers. rokk, 'the rook or tower at chess;' Rich. Dict. p. 727. The remoter origin of this word is unknown; Devic cites d'Herbelot as saying that in the language of the ancient Persians, it signified a warrior who sought warlike adventures, a sort of knight-market. errant. The piece was orig. denoted by an elephant carrying a castle on his back; we have suppressed the elephant. There seems to be nothing to connect this with the famous bird called the roc or rukh; except that the same word rukh, in Persian, means 'a hero, a knight-errant (as in d'Herbelot), a rhinoceros, the name of a bird of mighty wing, a beast resembling the camel, but very fierce,' &c.; Rich. (as above).

ROOM, space, a chamber. (E.) The older meaning is simply 'space;' hence a place at table, Luke, xiv. 7. M. E. roum; 'and hath roum and eek space, Chaucer, Legend of Good Women, 1995. - A. S. rúm; 'næfdon rúm' = they had no room. Lulie, ii. 7. We also find A.S. rum, adj., spacious; 'se weg is swide rum' = the way is very broad or spacious, Matt. vii. 13. + Du. ruim, adj., spacious; sb., room. + Icel. rumr, spacious; rum, space. + Dan. and Swed. rum, adj. and sb. + Goth. rums, adj. and sb., Matt. vii. 13; Luke, ii. 7. + G, raum, O.H. G. rum, space. B. All from the Teut. type RU-MA, spacious; or, as a sb., space; Fick, iii. 258. Allied to Lat. rūs, open country, Russ. raviina, a plain, Zend ravanh, wide, free, open, ravan, a plain; Fick, i. 197. Der. room-y, Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, st. 153, l. 609, a late word, substituted for the M. E. adj. roum (room); room-i-ly, room-i-ness. Also room-th (Nares), obsolete.

Also rumm-age, q. v.

ROOST, a place where fowls rest at night. (E.) Frequently applied to the perch on which fowls rest; as to which see below. Most common in the phr. to go to roost, i. e. to seek a sleeping-place. 'They go to roost;' Skelton, Elynour Rummyng, 191. 'Roost for capons or hennes;' Palsgrave. - A.S. hróst; Lye gives henna hróst, a hen-roost, but without authority. Yet it would appear to be the correct form, as the palsied man healed by Christ is let down through the roof; or, as in the original, thurh thes huses hrost, through the housetop. Here Heyne prints hrost, from a notion that the word is cognate with G. horst, which he explains by 'underwood;' but the latter is the familiar Kentish word hurst, and is a different word altogether. + O. Du. roest, or hinnen-kot, 'a hen-roest;' roesten, 'to goe to roest, as hens;' Hexham.

Y. In the Heliand, the sense of hróst comes close to that of 'roof;' and I suspect that A.S. hró-st and A.S. hró-f are from the same source, and are related words. At any rate, roost is certainly related to Goth. hrot, Icel. hrot, a roof; we also find Icel. rót, the inner part of a roof of a house, where fish are hung up to dry, and this is the same as Norweg. rot, the inner part of a roof, a cock-loft (Aasen); cf. rost, a roofing (id.), Scotch roost, the inner roof of a cottage, composed of spars reaching from δ. We may here find the exone wall to the other (Jamieson). planation of the whole matter; roo-st, Goth. hro-t, and roo-f are related words; and the orig, roosting-place for fowls was on the rafters of the inner roof. This is how roost acquired the sense of rafters of the inner roof. perch. Der. roost, verb.

ROOT (1), the part of a plant in the earth, which draws up sap from the soil, a source, cause of a matter. (Scand.) M. E. rote, Chaucer, C.T. 2; Ancren Riwle, p. 54, l. 12.— icel. rói, a root; Swed. rot; Dan. rod. β . Hence Icel. róta, to root up, rout up, as a ror; Dan. roa.

p. Hence Icel. rota, to root up, rout up, as a swine, corresponding to prov. E. wrout, to dig up like a hog (E. D. S. Gloss. B. 7), M. E. wroten, a word used by Chaucer of a sow, Persones Tale (Six-text, Group I, 157), A. S. wrotan; see Root (2). This proves that the Icel. rot stands for wrot, it being a characteristic of that language to drop v in the (initial) combination vr. Y. Further, $vr\delta t = v\delta rt$, and is allied to Goth. waurts, a root, A.S. wyrt, a wort, a root; see Wort. 8. Also E. wort is cognate with Lat. work, a root, see Wolfe. As it works contact the fact radix, W. gwreiddyn, O. Corn. grueiten, a root, and with Gk. $\beta(\hat{a})$ (for $f\rho(\delta,ya)$, a root. Fick gives the Teut. base of root as WRÔTA, and that of wort as WORTI, iii. 294; thus they are not quite the same, but come very near together. The orig. sense was perhaps 'twig;' see Curtius, i. 438. The form of the root is WRAD or WARD; we can hardly compare the above words with Skt. vridh, to grow. Der. root, verb, Wint. Tale, i. 1. 25; also roo', vb., in the sense 'to grub up,'

ROOT (2), root-less, root-let. Doublets, radix, wort.

ROOT (2), ROUT, to grub up, as a hog. (E.) In Shak. Rich.

III, i. 3. 228.—A. S. wrótan, to grub up, Ælfric's Grammar, ed.

Zupitza, p. 176, l. 12. + O. Du. wroeten, 'to grub or root in the earth as hogs doe;' Hexham. + Icel. róta, to grub up, from rót, a root; Dan. rode, to root up, from rod, a root. See Root (1).

ROPE, a thick twisted cord. (E.) M. E. rope, roop; spelt rop. Rob. of Glouc., p. 488, l. 17.—A. S. ráp, Judges, xv. 14, xvi. 9.+
Du. reep. + Icel. reip. + Swed. rep. + Dan. reb. + G. reif, a circle, hoop (of a barrel), ring, wheel, ferrule; occasionally, a rope.
from the Teut. base RAIPA, a rope, hoop; Fick, iii. 247. Root uncertain. Perhaps related to Gi. Anglés bent dealess. to turn uncertain. Perhaps related to Gk. βαιβός, bent, βέμβειν, to turn round; so that the sense may be 'twisted.' Der. rope, vb., roper, a rope-maker, P. Plowman, B. v. 336, rop-er-y, rope-maker, rope-walk; also rop-y, adj., stringy, glutinous, adhesive, lit. rope-like, Skelton, Elinour Rummyng, 24; rop-ing, Hen. V, iii. 5. 23.

ROSE, the name of a flower. (L., -Gk., -Arab.) M.E. rose; the old plural was rosen, as in Ancren Riwle, p. 276, l. 12. - A.S. rose, pl. rósan; Grein, ii. 384. – Lat. rosa, a rose. β. This is not a true Lat. word, but borrowed from Gk βόδον, a rose, whence a form βοδία* β. This is not a true (not found), which passed into Lat. rosa; cf. Lat. Clausus with Claudius. γ. Again, the Gk. βόδον, Æolic form βρόδον, is not L 1 2 even an Aryan word, but of Semitic origin. = Arab. ward, a rose, flower, petal, flowering shrub; Rich. Dict. 1638. This word, in passing into Gk., became, as a matter of course, βόρδον, βρόδον, βρό flower, petal, flowering shrub; Rich. Dict. 1638. This word, in passing into Gk., became, as a matter of course, βίρδον, βρίδον, βίδον. See Curtius, i. 438; Max Müller, letter in Academy for 1874, v. 488, 576. Der. ros-ac-e-ous, from Lat. rosaceus (Pliny); ros-ar-y, M. E. rosarie, Chaucer, C. T. 16897, from O. F. rosarie* (not recorded), later form rosaire = Low Lat. rosarium, a chaplet, also the title of a treatise on alchemy by Arnoldus de Villa Nova and of other treatises; ros-e-ate, a coined word; ros-ette, from F. rosette, 'a little rose,' Cot.; rose-water, rose-wood, ros-y, ros-i-ness.

ROSEMARY, a small evergreen shrub. (F., -L.) In Skelton, Garl. of Laurel, 980; and in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 9. Gower has the form rosmarine, C. A. iii. 132, where the Lat. marginal note has rosa marina. -O. F. rosmarin, 'rosemary,' Cot.; mod. F. romarin. - Lat. rosmarinus, rosemary, iit. marine dew, or sea-dew; called in Ovid ros maris, Metam. xii. 410. - Lat. ros, dew; and marinus, marine. + Russ. rosa, dew. + Lithuan. rasa, dew (Nesselman). + Skt. rasa, juice, essence: cf. ras, to taste. And see Marine.

Named from some fancied connection with 'seaspray;' in English, it seems to have been altered from rosmarine to rosemary from a popular etymology connecting it with a rose of Mary.
ROSIN, the same as Resin, q. v.

ROSTRUM, a platform for an orator to speak from. (L.) *Rostrum, the beak of a bird, prow of a ship, nose of an alembic; Phillips, ed. 1706. - Lat. rostrum, a beak, prow; pl. rostra, the Rostra, an erection for speakers in the forum, so called because adorned with the beaks of ships taken from the Antiates, A.U.C. 416; Livy, viii. 14 (White). Put for rod-trum, as being the organ wherewith the bird pecks. - Lat. rodere, to gnaw, peck; see Rodent. Der. rostr-ate. rostri-form.

ROT, to putrefy. (E.) A weak verb; pt. t. rotted; pp. rotted, as in Shak. Mid. Nt. Dream, ii. 1. 95. This pp. is little used, its place being supplied by rotten, a Scand. form; see Rotten. M. E. roten, rotien, Chaucer, C. T. 4405; pt. t. rotede, Genesis and Exod., ed. Morris, 3342; pp. roted, Will. of Palerne, 4124.—A. S. rotian, pt. t. rotode, pp. rotod; Exod. xvi. 24. + Du. rotten. β. Further allied to Icel. rotna, Swed. ruttna, Dan. raadne, to become rotten, B. Further verbs which are formed from the old strong pp. appearing in Icel. rotinn, Swed. rutten, Dan. raaden, rotten. See Rotten, which belongs to a more original type.

Der. rot, sb., dry-rot.

ROTARY, turning like a wheel. (L.) A modern coined word; in Bailey's Dict., vol. ii. ed. 1731. As if from a Lat. rotarius*, from rota, a wheel. + Gael. and Irish roth, W. rhod, a wheel. + Lithuan. ratas, a wheel; pl. ratai, a cart, wheeled vehicle. + G. rad, a wheel. Cf. Skt. ratha, a car, chariot, vehicle; formed with suffix -tha from ri, to go (Benfey). \longrightarrow RA, for older \longrightarrow AR, prob. in the sense to go, to run; cf. Skt. ri, to go. \P Fick proposes \longrightarrow AR, to fit, and compares Gk. $\alpha \rho \mu \alpha$, a chariot. The sense of 'runner' seems more consistent with the idea of 'wheel.' For the metathesis of r, see Run. Der. rot-ate, from Lat. rotatus, pp. of rotare, to revolve like a wheel; rot-at-ion, from Lat. acc. rotationem; rot-at-or-y, formed with suffix -y from Lat. rotator, a whirler round. And see rotund-i-ty, rond-eau, round, round-el, rund-let, roué, roll, row-el, rouleau, roulette. ROTE (1), routine, repetition of the same words. (F., -L.) 'And euery statute coude he plaine bi rote = and he knew the whole of every statute by rote; Chaucer, C. T. 329. '[He] can noust well reden His rewle... but be pure rote' = he cannot well read the rule of his order except merely by rote; P. Plowman's Crede, 377. - O. F. rote (Burguy), mod. F. route, a road, way, beaten track. Hence the dimin. O. F. rotine, mod. F. routine, as in the proverbial expression par rotine, 'by rote;' Cot. Hence by rote = along a beaten track, or with constant repetition; see Rut (1). β. The orig. sense of O. F. rote is 'a great highway in a forest, Cot., cognate with Ital. rotta. which, however, means a breaking up, a rout, defeat. The O.F. rote is really the fem. of rot, old pp. of rompre, to break (see Burguy), and thus rote = Lat. rupta, lit. broken. As Diez says, the F. route, a street, way = uia rupta, a way broken through, just as the O. F. brisée (lit. broken) means a way. Orig. applied to a way broken or cut through a forest. - Lat. rupta, iem. of ruptus, pp. of rumpere, to break; see Rupture. ¶ By rote has nothing to do with O.F. way of further illustration, we may note that the Dict. of the French Academy (1813) gives: 'Router, habituer quelqu'un à une chose, l'y exercer. Les cartes se routent, pour dire qu'On a beau les mêler, les mêmes combinaisons, les mêmes suites de cartes reviennent souvent. And again: 'Il ne sait point de musique, mais il chante par routine;' id. The latter passage expressly shews that to sing by rote is to sing without a musical instrument! Note also Port. rota, the course of a vessel at sea; whence the phr. rota batida, with all speed, without touching at any port. It is clear that rota batida is lit. a beaten prondeau; see Rondeau. M. E. roundel, Chaucer, C. T. 1531;

'Wel coude he singe and plaien on a role;' Chaucer, C. T. 236. 'Playing on a role;' Spenser, F. Q. iv. 9. 6. - O. F. role, a musical instrument mentioned in La Roman de la Rose, as cited by Roquefort. Burguy explains that there were two kinds of rotes, one a sort of psaltery or harp played with a plectrum or quill, the other much the same as the F. vielle, which Cotgrave calls 'a rude instrument of music, usually played by fidlers and blind men,' i. e. a kind of fiddle. Roquefort absurdly connects rote with the Lat. rota, as if it were a kind of hurdy-gurdy, which it never was, and this has probably helped on the notion that E. rote in the phr. by rote must also have to do with the turning of a wheel, which is certainly not the case.—O. H. G. hrota, rotá, M. H. G. rotte, a rote; spelt chrotta in Low Lat. (Ducange). Of Celtic origin; W. crwth, Gael. cruit, a harp, violin; see Crowd (2). Middle Ages, p. 217 of E. translation.

ROTTEN, putrid. (Scand.) M. E. roten, Chaucer, C. T. 4404;

ROTTEIN, putrid. (Scand.) M. E. roten, Chaucer, C. T. 4404; Ancren Riwle, p. 84, note d, where the text has roted. — Icel. rotinn, rotten; Swed. rutten; Dan. raaden. β. Apparently Icel. rotinn is the pp. of a lost verb rjóta*, pr. t. raut*, of which the base would be RUT, to decay. Fick (iii. 255) further suggests that this base may be related to Lat. ruere; see Ruin. And see Rot. Der. rotten-ness. ROTUNDITY, roundness. (F., — L.) In K. Lear, iii. 2. 7. Adapted from F. rotondité, Cot.—Lat. rotunditatem, acc. of rotunditas, roundness.— Lat. rotundus, round; see Round. Der. (from Lat. rotundus) rotundit setundit and round building.

ROUBLE, RUBLE, a Russian coin. (Russ.) Spelt rubble, Hackluyt's Voyages, vol. i. p. 256; roble, id. i. 280, under the date Aug. 1, 1556. – Russ. ruble, a ruble, 100 copeks; worth about 3s. 4d. The orig. sense is 'a piece cut off.' – Russ. rubite, to cut.

ROUE, a profligate. (F., -L.) Merely F. roué, lit. broken on the wheel; a name given, under the regency (A.D. 1715-1723), to the companions of the duke of Orleans, men worthy of being broken on the wheel, a punishment for the greatest criminals. Pp. of rouer, lit. to turn round (Lat. rotare). - F. roue, a wheel. - Lat. rota, a wheel. See Rotary.

ROUGE, red paint. (F., - L.) Modern; added by Todd to Johnson. = F. rouge, red. = Lat. rubeus, red; whence rouge is formed like rage from Lat. rabies (Littré). Allied to ruber, rufus, red; from a stem RUBH, parallel to RUDH; the latter appears in Gk. ξρυθρός, red, cognate with E. red; see Red, Ruby. Der. rouge, verb.

ROUGH, shaggy, not smooth, uneven, violent, harsh, coarse, rugged. (E.) In Chaucer, C. T. 3736 (Six-text, A. 3738), the MSS. have rough, rough, row. Other spellings are ruh, rugh, ru, rou, rus; see Stratmann, s. v. ruh. — A. S. rúh, rough, hairy; Gen. xxvii. 11. Cf. A. S. rúw, rough; Gen. xxvii. 23. + Du. ruig, hairy, rough, harsh, rude; O. Du. ru (Oudemans). + Dan. ru. + Low G. rung (Bremen Wörterbuch). + O. H. G. rúh, M. H. G. rúch, hairy; cf. G. rauh, rough. β. Cf. also Lithuan. rauhas, a fold, winkle, ruhti, to wrinkle; the orig. sense may have been uneven, like a ploughed field, or newly dug up ground; as suggested by Gk. δρίνσσειν = δρύκγειν, to dig up.

¶ In German, there is a tendency to confuse rauh, rough, with roh, raw, but they are quite distinct; the latter should rather be ro, the final h being unoriginal. Moreover raw stands for hraw, with initial h (Aryan base KRU); whilst rough is A.S. ruh with final h (Aryan base RUK). Der. rough-ly, -ness; rough, verb, rough-en; rough-hew (rougheheawe in Palsgrave); rough-

ROULEAU, a roll of coins in paper. (F., - L.) From F. rouleau, 'a roll of paper; 'Cot. Rouleau stands for an O. F. roulei*, rolei*, not found, but a regular diminutive from O. F. role, later roule, a roll : see Roll.

ROULETTE, a game of chance. (F., - L.) From F. roulette, named from the ball which rolls on a turning table; fem. of roulet, dimin. of F. roule, a roll; see Roll.

ROUN, ROWN, ROUND, to whisper. (E.) Shak. has rounded, whispered, K. John, ii. 566; but the d is excrescent. M. E. rounen, Chaucer, C. T. 5833; P. Plowman, B. iv. 13. — A. S. rúnian, to whisper; rúnedon — Lat. susurrabant, Ps. xl. 8, ed. Spelman. — rondel, Legend of Good Women, 423. - O. F. rondel, later rondeau, which Cotgrave explains as 'a rime or sonnet that ends as it begins.' For a specimen of a roundel, in which the first line recurs after the fifth, see Chaucer, ed. Morris, vi. 304. So called from the first line coming round again. Dimin. from F. rond, round; see Round. Der. roundel-ay, Spenser, Shep. Kalendar, June, 49, from F. rondelet, dimin. of O. F. rondel (Cot.); the E. spelling is prob. due to confusion with lay.

ROUND, circular, globular. (F., - L.) M. E. round, Chaucer, C. T. 3932. - O. F. round, mod. F. rond, round. - Lat. rotundus, round; formed, with suffix -undus, from rot-a, a wheel; see Rotary. Der. round, sb., round, verb; round-about, in Levins; round-head, from the Puritan fashion of having the hair cut close to the head;

ROUSE (1), to raise up, excite, awaken, rise up. (Scand.) 'To rouse a deare' [deer]; Levins. It was a term of the chase; cf. Rich. II, ii. 3. 128. 'Some like wilde bores, new rouz'd out of the brakes;' Spenser, F. Q. ii. 11. 10. But the verb was orig. intransitive; and an animal was said to rouse when it rushed out of its covert. At the laste This hart rused, and staal away Fro alle the houndes a prevy way '= the hart roused (rushed out) and stole away; Chaucer, Book of the Duchess, 380. 'I rouse, I stretche myselfe;' Palsgrave. -Swed. rusa, to rush; rusa frem, to rush forward; O. Swed. rusa, to rush, go hastily (Ihre); Dan. ruse, to rush. Cognate with A. S. kreosam, to rush, also to fall down, 'to come down with a rush;' Grein, β. The base is clearly HRUS, to shake, push, Fick, iii. 84; the orig. sense was prob. to start forward suddenly, to burst out. See further under Rush (1), which is not quite the same word as the present, but an extension of it. Hence also rouse is to wake a sleeper, viz. by a sudden movement. ¶ Not connected with raise or rise; nor with the Lowland Scotch roose, to praise, from Icel. krósa, Swed. rosa, Dan. rose, to praise, which is rather connected with Rouse (2) below. Der. a-rouse.

ROUSE (2), a drinking-bout. (Scand.) In Shak. Hamlet, i. 2. 127; i. 4. 8; ii. 1. 58; Oth. ii. 3. 66. — Swed. rus, a drunken fit, drunkenness; rusa, to fuddle; Dan. ruus, intoxication, sove rusen ud (to sleep out one's rouse), to sleep oneself sober. We find also Du. roes, drunkenness; eenen roes drinken (to drink a rouse), 'to drink till one is fuddled' (Sewel); but it does not seem to be an old word in Dutch, being omitted by Hexham. B. I have little doubt that the orig. sense was simply 'noise,' or uproar; and that it is that the orig. sense was simply noise, or uproal, and that it connected with Icel. hrosa, to praise, Swed. ros, Dan. ros, praise, fame. These words are probably allied to Icel. hrofor, praise, fame, from KAR, to proclaim; see Fick, i. 521, iii. 85. ¶ That we got the word from Denmark is shewn by a curious quotation in Todd's Johnson: 'Thou noblest drunkard Bacchus, teach me how to take the Danish rowza; Brand's Pop. Antiq. ii. 228 (ed. Bohn, ii. 330). See Row (3). ROUT, (1) a defeat, (2) a troop or crowd of people. (F., - L.) Notwithstanding the wide difference of sense, the word is but one. More than that, it is the same word as Route, q. v. 1. Shak. has rout, i.e. disordered flight, 2 Hen. VI, v. 2? 31; Cymb. v. 3. 41; and rout, verb, to defeat and put to disorderly flight, Cymb. v. 2. 12. This does not seem to occur much earlier. 2. M. E. route, a number of people, troop, Chaucer, C. T. 624, Will. of Palerne, 1213; Layamon, 2598, later text. - F. route, 'a rowt, overthrow, defeature; . also, a rowt, heard, flock, troope, company, multitude of men or beasts; . . also, a rutt, way, path, street, course; Cot. - Lat. rupta, fem. of ruptus, broken.

B. The different senses may be thus exfem. of ruptus, broken. plained.

1. A defeat is a breaking up of a host, a broken mass of flying men.

2. A small troop of men is a fragment or broken piece of an army; and the word is generally used in contempt, of a company in broken ranks or disorderly array. The phrase in disorder nearly expresses both these results.

8. A route was, originally, a way broken or cut out through a wood or forest. See Rote (1), Route. ¶ The G. rotte, a troop, is merely borrowed from the Romance languages. Cf. Ital. rotta, Span. rota, a rout, defeat. It is remarkable that the mod. F. route has lost the senses both of defeat' and 'troop.' Der. rout, verb, as above.

ROUTE, a way, course, line of march. (F., -L.) Not much used in later authors, but it occurs very early. M. E. route, spelt rute, Ancren Riwle, p. 350, l. I. – F. route, 'a way, path, street, course . . also, a glade in a wood;' Cot.

B. The sense of 'glade' is the fem. of ruptus, pp. of rumpere, to break. See Rote (1), Rout, Rupture. Der. rout-ine. Doublets, rote (1), rout, rut (1).

ROUTINE, a beaten track, a regular course of action. (F., -L.) Modern. - F. routine, a usual course of action; lit. a small path, pathway; dimin. of route, a route, way; see Route.

ROVER, a pirate, wanderer. (Du.) M. E. rover, rovare. 'Robare, or robbar yn the see, rovare, or thef of the se, Pirata;' Prompt.

Parv. p. 437.—Du. roover, 'a rober, a pyrate, or a theef;' Hexham.

Du. rooven, to rob.—Du. roof, 'spoile;' id.

B. The Du. rooven is cognate with A.S. reaffan, to reave, rob; and Du. roof = A.S. reaff, spoil, plunder. See Reave, Rob. Der. rove, verb; 'To roue, robbe, Rapere; to roue about, Errare, vagari;' Levins. The second sense was easily developed; the sb. rover is the older word in English though etymologically due to the verb.

ROW (1), a line, rank, series. (E.) M. E. rowe, Amis and Amiloun, 1900 (Weber's Met. Rom. vol. ii); rewe, Chaucer, C. T. 2868; raw, Barbour's Bruce, v. 590. - A.S. raw, rawe, or rawe, a row; a scarce word. Leo cites: 'on bá brádan ræwe' = on the broad row, scarce word. Leo cites: 'on pa bradan resus' = on the broad row, Kemble's A. S. Charters, 1246; hege-rawe, a hedge-row, id. 272. β. Perhaps from ARA, to fit. ¶ Quite distinct from Du. rij, O. Du. rijg, rijge (Oudemans), Low G. rige, rege, G. reihe, a row. The G. reihe is from O. H. G. rihan, to string together, to arrange things (as beads) by passing a string or rod through them; a strong verb, from the Teut. base RIH, to pierce, string together; Fick, iii. 253. BOW (2), to propel a boat with oars. (E.) M. E. rowen, Polit Songs, ed. Wright, p. 254; Wyclif, Luke, viii. 26. — A. S. rówan, to

Der. row, sh., row-er; Der. row, sb., row-er; also row-lock (prom. rul'uk), a contrivance for locking the oar in its place so that it may not shift about. Also rudder, q.v.

ROWAN-TREE, the same as Roan-tree, q. v.

ROWEL, a little wheel with sharp points at the end of a spur. (F., - L.) 'A payre of spurres, with a poynte without a rowell;' Berners, tr. of Froissart, vol. ii. c. 245 (R.) 'Rowell of a spurre;' Palsgrave. - F. rouelle, 'a little flat ring, a wheel of plate or iron, in horses bitts;' Cot. [He gives mollette as the O. F. word for a rowel; on the other hand, Spenser uses rowell for a part of a horse's bit; F. Q. i. 7. 37.] - Low Lat. rotella, a little wheel, dimin. of rota, a wheel; see Rotary.

ROYAL, kingly. (F., - L.) M. E. real, Chaucer, C. T. 1020 (Six-text, A. 1018), where some MSS. have roial. - O. F. real, roial; spelt royal in Cotgrave, and explained as 'royall, regall, kingly.'-

RUB, to move over a surface with pressure, scour, wipe. (C.) M. E. rubben, Chaucer, C. T. 3745; P. Plowman, B. xiii. 99. Of Celtic origin. — Gael. rub, to rub, Irish and Gael. rubadh, a rubbing; W. rhwbio, to rub, rhwb, a rub. Cf. Irish ruboir, Gael. rubair, a rubber. (Hence also Dan. rubbe, to rub.) Der. rub, sb., Mach, iii. I. 134; rubb-er. • Not connected with G. reiben, which is I. 134; rubb-er. related to Rive.

RUBBISH, broken stones, waste matter, refuse; nonsense. (F., = O. H. G.) Prov. E. rubbage, as in Norfolk (Forby). Palsgrave has 'robrisshe of stones, plastras;' and Cotgrave explains the F. plastras by 'rubbish, clods or pieces of old and dry plaister.' Horman, in his Vulgaria (as cited by Way, note to Prompt, party, party of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the content of the cont p. 435) says that 'Battz [brick-bats] and great rubbryshe serueth to fyl up in the myddell of the wall.' These quotations shew that rubbrish was used in the exact sense of what we now usually call rubble; and the two words, rubble and rubbish, are closely connected.
 β. In the form rubbrish, the latter r is intrusive, since it disappears in earlier, as well as in later English. The M. E. form is robows, or robows; as, 'Robows, or coldyr, Petrosa, petro,' where coldyr is an old word for rubble; Prompt. Parv. Way adds: in the Wardrobe Account of Piers Courteys, Keeper of the Wardrobe 20 Edw. IV. (1480), occurs a payment to John Carter, for cariage away of a grete loode of robeux, that was left in the strete after the reparacyone made uppon a hous apperteigning unto the same Warderobe; 'Harl. MS, 4780.

Y. The spelling robeux furnishes the key to the solution of the word. It is a F. plural form. from a sing. robel*, dimin. of robe. Here robel* is exactly the mod. E. rubble, and the pl. robeux (or robeaux) became robows, as in the Prompt. Parv., and was easily corrupted into rubbage and rubbish, and even into rubbrish (with intrusive r). In this view, rubbish is the pl. of rubble, and was accordingly at first used in the same sense. 8. At what time the word robeux first appeared in English we have no exact means of knowing, but I find an earlier trace of it in the fact that it was absurdly Latinised as rubbosa (as if it were a neuter plural), in accordance with its plural form, as early as A. D. 1392 or 1393. Blount, in his Nomolexicon, s.v. lastage, cites an act against throwing rubbish into the Thames, in which are the words 'aut fimos, fimaria, sterquilinia, sordes, mucos, rubbosa, lastagium, aut alia sordida; Claus. 16 Rich. II. dors. 11. 4. The only difficulty alia sordida; Claus. 16 Rich. II. dors. 11.

4. The only difficulty is that the O. F. robe!* is not preserved; but it must have been a dimin. of robe in the sense of 'trash' which is found in the cognate Ital. roba, though lost in French. The lit. sense is 'spoil,' hence a garment, or any odds and ends seized as booty. It may be noted

Robe, Rob. It is doubtless the case that rubble and rubbish have long been associated in the popular mind with the verb to rub; but it is equally certain that the words rubble and rubbish can only be explained by French. The sense of 'broken stones' is still preserved; see examples in Todd's Johnson.

RUBBLE, broken stones, rubbish. (F., -O. H. G.) 'Rubble, or rubbish', Minsheu, ed. 1627. 'Rubble, or rubbish of old houses also, 'carrie out rubble, as morter, and broken stones of old buildings;' Baret's Alvearie, ed. 1580. Grammatically, rubble is the singular of robows or robeux, the old form of rubbish; see the whole account, under Rubbish.

RUBRIC, a direction printed in red. (F., - L.) the Book of Common Prayer, and (earlier) in the Missal, &c., were so called from being usually written or printed in red letters. [M. E. rubriche, Chaucer, C. T. 5928; this is an O. F. form; cf. rubriche, 'rudle, oaker;' Cot.] = F. rubrique, 'a rubrick; a speciall title or sentence of the law, written or printed in red;' Cot. = Lat. rubrica, red earth; also a rubric, a title of law written in red. Formed as if from an adj. rubricus*, extended from rubro-, crude form of ruber, red; see Ruby.

RUBY, a red gem. (F., -L.) M. E. ruby, P. Plowman, B. ii. 12. - O. F. rubi (13th cent., Littré), also rubis, 'a ruby,' Cot. [The s is the old sign of the nom. case, and is still preserved in writing, though not pronounced.] Cf. Span. rubi, rubin, Port. rubim, Ital. rubino, a ruby. - Low Lat. rubinum, acc. of rubinus, a ruby: named from its colour. - Lat. ruber, red; cf. rubere, to be red. B. From a base RUBH, parallel to RUDH, whence Lat. rufus, Gk. έρυθρός, red; see Rouge, Red. Der. (from Lat. rub-ere) rub-esc-ent, growing red, from the pres. part. of inceptive vb. rubescere; rub-ic-und, ruddy, from F. rubicunde, very red (Cot.), which from Lat. rubicundus, very red, with suffixes -c- and -undus; rub-r-ic, q.v. RUDDER, the instrument whereby a ship is steered. (E.) Orig. a paddle, for rowing as well as steering; hence the etymology. M. E. roder, or (more usually) rother, Gower, C. A. i. 243, l. 16; Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 419.—A. S. rober, a paddle; 'Palmula, robres blad' = blade of a paddle; 'Remus, steor-roper,' lit. a steeringpaddle; Wright's Vocab. i. 48, col. 1. B. Here ro-ver = rowingimplement; from A. S. rów-an, to row, with suffix -ver (Aryan-tar), denoting the agent or implement. + Du. roer (for roder), an oar, rudder. + Swed. roder, also contr. to ror. + Dan. ror (for roder). + G. ruder. Also as a verb: 'Whilst the proud bird, ruffing [ruffling] his fethers wyde;' F. Q. iii. 11. 32. 'Ruffe of a shirt;' Levins. β. So called from its uneven surface; the root appears in Icel. rjúfa (pt. t. rauf), to breek rin up. breek a hole in A. This is verified by the cognate Lithuan. rupas, adj. rough, uneven, rugged, esp. used of a rough road or a broken surface; whence ruple, the rough bark of trees, corresponding to E. ruffle (1). Cf. also Icel. ruffun, rough, uncombed; Ital. arruffare, to disorder, ruffle the hair, a word of Toutonic origin.

The Lithuan. ruple, the rough bark on old trees, is a cognate word; so also is rauple, a rough scab or blister; both of which are extensions from Lithuan. rupas, rough, uneven. See Ruff (1). A parallel form is Rumple, q.v. Der. ruffle, sb., a wrinkle, a ruff.

RUFFLE (2), to be noisy and turbulent, to bluster. (O. Du.) 'To ruffle in the commonwealth of Rome;' Titus Andron. i. 313. Cf. 'the ruffle [bustle] . . . of court;' Shak. Lover's Complaint, $8. 'Twenty or more persons were sleyne in the ruffle;' Hall's Chron. Hen. VIII, an. 19 (R.) RULE, a maxim, state, order, government. (F., -L.) M.E. reule, Chaucer, C.T. 173. Earlier riwle, as in the Ancren Riwle - Rule of (female) Anchorites. - O. F. riule, reule, also riegle (Burguy); mod. F. règle, a rule. - Lat. regula, a rule (whence also was borrowed A.S. regol, a rule). - Lat. regere, to govern; see Regal. Der. rule, verb,

M. E. reulen, earlier riwlen, Ancren Riwle, p. 4; rul-er, rul-ing.
RUM (1), a kind of spirituous liquor. (Malay?) In Dampier's Voyages; Voyage to Campeachy, an. 1675; see quotation in R. We find also Port. rom, Span. ron, Ital. rum, F. rhum. Sometimes said to be a W. Indian or American word, for which there is not the slightest evidence. The etymology of this word has never been pointed out; I think it is obviously a corruption of the Malay brum. or bram, the loss of b being due to want of familiarity with the Malay language. — Malay bram, brum, 'an intoxicating liquor made from burnt palm-sugar or molasses, and fermented rice;' Marsden's Dict. p. 39. This is precisely what rum is, viz. a liquor made from sugar or molasses. Moreover, the probability that rum is a Malay word, is rendered almost a certainty by the fact that it is much the same as ratafia, which is certainly Malay. See Ratafia. B. Wedgwood suggests that rum is due to the cant term rum booze, good drink, wine, noticed under Rum (2). Perhaps this cant term modified the Malay word.

RUM (2), strange, queer. (Hindi.) 'Rum, gallant; a cant word;' Bailey's Dict., vol. i. ed. 1735. I suppose that rum means no more than 'Gypsy'; and hence would mean 'good' or 'gallant' from a Gypsy point of view, and 'strange' and 'suspicious' from an outsider's point of view. Hence rome bouse, wine, Harman's Caveat, ed. Furnivall, p. 83, spelt rambooz in Phillips; rome mort, the queen, id. p. 84 (where mort = a female). Cf. rom, a husband, a Gypsy, rómmani, adj. Gypsy. The Gypsy word rom answers to the Hindi word dom (with initial cerebral d); see English-Gipsy Songs, by Leland, Palmer, and Tuckey, pp. 2, 269. Cf. Skt. domba (with cerebral d), 'a man of a low caste, who gains his livelihood by singing and dancing; Benfey. Also Hindustani dom, 'the name of a low caste, apparently one of the aboriginal races;' H. H. Wilson, Gloss.

of Indian Terms, p. 147.

RUMB, RHUMB, a line for directing a ship's course on a map; a point of the compass. (F., Span., L., Gk.?) This is a very difficult word, both to explain and derive. The view which I here present runs counter to that in Littré and Scheler, but is recognised as possible by Diez. 'Rumb or Rhumb, the course of a ship . . also, one point of the mariner's compass, or 111 degrees. line, a line described by the ship's motion on the surface of the sea, steering by the compass, so as to make the same, or equal angles with every meridian. These rumbs are spiral lines proceeding from the point where we stand, and winding about the globe of the earth, till they come to the pole, where at last they lose themselves; but in Mercator's charts, and the plain ones, they are represented by straight lines,' &c.; Phillips, ed. 1706. These lines are called rumb-lines. See Rumb in the Engl. Encyc. (Div. Arts and Sciences), where it is said to be a Portuguese word, and where we find: 'a rumb certainly came to mean any vertical circle, meridian or not, and hence any point of the compass. . . . To sail on a rumb is to sail continually on one course. Hence a rumb-line is a line drawn in [on?] the sphere, such as would be described by a moving point which always keeps one course; it is therefore the spiral of Mercator's projection, and is that which is also called the loxodromic course.' It is spelt roomb, roumb, and roumbe in Minsheu, ed. 1627. - F. rumb, 'a roomb, or point of the compasse, a line drawn directly from wind to wind in a compasse, travers-boord, or sea-card; Cot. He adds the phr.
woguer the rumb en rumb, 'to saile by travers.'—Span. rumbo, 'a course, a way; rumbo derecho, the right course;' Minsheu's Span.
Dict., ed. 1623; also, a point of the compass, intersection of the plane of the horizon, represented by the card of a compass, the course of a ship; Neuman. Cf. Port. rumbo, rumo, a ship's course; quarto do rumo, a point of the compass; Ital. rombo. - Lat. rhombum, acc. of rhombus, a magician's circle, a rhombus (White). - Gk. ρόμβος, a top, a magic wheel, whirling motion of a top, swoop of an B. In this view, the eagle; also, a rhombus; see Rhomb. sense of spiral motion comes first; then the delineation of such motion on a chart; and lastly, the sense of a point of a compass; BUMMER, a sort of drinking-glass. (Du., = G., = L.?) 'Rummer.

BUGOSE, full of wrinkles. (L.) The form rugosous is in Blount's which is the simple and natural order. Milton has the very word Gloss., ed. 1674; Phillips has the sb. rugosity. — Lat. rugosus, wrinkled. — Lat. ruga, a wrinkle. — Irish and Gael. rug, a wrinkle. Root unamong the early Spanish and Portuguese navigators, is in the highest degree probable. degree probable.

7. The view taken by Scheler and Littre seems to me obviously wrong; they refer F. rumb (also spelt rum) to the Du. ruim, E. room, on the ground that a rumb is the 'room' space between two winds; thus taking the last sense first. I cannot find that the Du. ruim ever had this sense; indeed Sewel, as late as 1754, can only render rumb into Dutch by een punt van't kompas; and Hexham mentions no such use of the O. Du. ruym. I therefore hold to the simple solution of the word from Gk. ρόμβος, instead of regarding the final b (found in Ital., Span., Port., and F.) as merely 8. The fact seems to be that Littre and Scheler are excrescent. thinking of quite another matter, viz. the O. F. rum, 'the hold of a ship,' Cot. This is certainly the Du. ruim, since Sewel gives the very phrase ruim van een schip, the hold of a ship, i. e. its room, capacity for stowage. The very fact that the Dutch used ruim as a seaphrase in this connection renders it very improbable that they would also have used it in a totally different connection. Until at least some evidence can be shewn for the alleged use of Du. ruim, I do not see why the assertion is to be admitted. e. I also regard as purely fabulous the suggestion that a rumb was so named because, in old charts, the points of the compass were marked by lozenges or rhombs; the mark for the north-point, with which we are familiar, reminds one more of a fleur-de-lis than a rhombus, and there is nothing in the F., Span., Ital., or Port. words to suggest this very limited sense of them.

$\color{L}$. Finally, the spelling \(\text{rumb} \) seems better than rhumb; it is more usual, and suits the Spanish; the Greek word being only the ultimate source.

¶ Brachet derives F. rumb from E. rumb, evading the difficulty. Yet this is quite possible, as we may have taken the word immediately from the Spanish. Der. rumb-line. Doublet, rhomb.

RUMBLE, to make a low and heavy sound. (E.) blen, to mutter. Chaucer, C.T. 14453; to rumble like thunder, Legend of Good Women, 1216. Cf. prov. E. rommle, to speak low or secretly (Halliwell); rummle, to rumble; id. The word romblen likewise stands for romlen, the b being excrescent, as usual after m; and the suffix -len has the usual frequentative force. Thus the word signifies to repeat the sound rom or rum; from the base RUM, significant of a low sound; which from \(\sqrt{RU}, \) to make a humming or lowing noise. Cf. Skt. ru, to hum, to bray; Lat. ad-rum-are, to make a murmuring noise (Festus); see Rumour. + Du. rommelen, to rumble, buzz. + Dan. rumle, to rumble. And cf. Swed. ramla, to rattle, Ital. rombare, to rumble, hum, buzz. Der. rumble, sb., rumbl-ing.

RUMINATE, to chew the cud, meditate. (L.) ruminate it in his mynde a good space after; 'Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. i. c. 2 (R.) - Lat. ruminatus, pp. of ruminare or ruminari, to chew the cud, ruminate. - Lat. rumin-, stem of rumen, the throat, gullet; cf. rūmare, used (according to Festus) in the same sense as ruminare. B. Probably rumen = rug-men *, allied to O. Lat. erugare, to belch, rugire, to roar, bray; from ARU, to hum, bray. See Rumble, Rumour. Der. ruminat-ion, As You Like It, iv. 1. 19, from Lat. acc. ruminationem; also rumin-ant, from the stem of the pres. part. of ruminare.

RUMMAGE, to search thoroughly among things stowed away.

E.; with F. suffix.) 'Searcheth his pockets, and takes his keyes, (E.; with F. suffix.) 'Searcheth his pockets, and takes his keyes, and so rummageth all his closets and trunks;' Howell, Famil. Letters, vol. i. sect. 5. let. last. This is altogether a secondary sense; the word is merely due to the sb. room-age, formed by suffix -age (of F. origin) from E. room, space. Roomage is a similar formation to stowage, and means much the same thing. It is an old nautical term for the close packing of things in a ship; hence was formed the verb to roomage or romage, i. e. to find room for or stow away packages; and the mariner who attended to this business was called the roomager or romager.

B. The history of the word is in Hackluyt's Voyages. 'To looke and foresee substantially to the roomaging of the shippe;' vol. i. p. 274. 'They might bring away [in their ships] a great deale more then they doe, if they would take paine in the romaging; vol. i. p. 308. 'The master must prouide a perfect mariner called a romager, to raunge and bestow all merchandize in such place as is convenient; vol. iii. p. 862. 'To rummage (sea-term), to remove any goods or luggage from one place to another, esp. to clear the ship's hold of any goods or lading, in order to their being handsomely stowed and placed; whence the word is us'd upon other occasions, for to rake into, or to search narrowly;' Phillips, ed. 1706. See further under Room. Cf. Du. ruim, room, also the hold of a ship; ruimen, to empty, clear, lit. to make room. Der. prov. E. rummage, humber, rubbish, lit. a clearance.

a sort of drinking-glass, such as Rhenish wine is usually drunk in; ru-mor, a rumour) from \(\sqrt{RU}\), to buzz, hum, bray; see Rumour also, a brimmer, or glass of any liquor filled to the top; Phillips | Der. run-ic, roun.

ed. 1706. 'Rhenish rummers walk the round;' Dryden, Ep. to Sir | RUNG, one of the rounds of a ladder. (E.) Also a staff (Halli-G. Etherege, 1. 45. - Du. roemer, romer, a wine-glass (Sewel); römer, a sort of large wine-glass (Brem. Wörterbuch). So also G. römer; Swed. remmare. The G. römer also means 'Roman;' I am told that the glasses were so called because used in former times in the Römersaal at Frankfort, when they drank the new emperor's health. If so, the word is really Latin, from Lat. Roma, Rome.

RUMOUR, report, current story. (F.,-L.) M. E. rumour, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, b. ii. pr. 7, l. 1577. - F. rumeur, 'a rumor;' Cot. - Lat. acc. rumorem, from nom. rumor, a noise, rumour, murmur. Cf. Lat. rumificare, to proclaim; rumitare, to spread reports; all from the base RUM, significant of a buzzing sound. - VRU, to make a humming or braying noise. See Rumble. Der. rumour, verb. Rich. III, iv. 2. 51. RUMP, the end of the backbone of an animal with the parts adjacent. (Scand.) M. E. rumpe, Prompt. Parv.—Icel. rumpr; Swed. rumpa; Dan. rumpe. + Du. rompe, 'the bulke of a body or corps, or a body without a head;' Hexham. Der. rump-steak.

RUMPLE, to wrinkle, crease. (E.) Cotgrave explains F. foupir by to rumple, or crumple. The M. E. form is rimplen; rimple and rumple are parallel forms, like wrinkle and prov. E. runkle. Of these, rimple is derived from the A.S. hrimpan, to wrinkle, and rumple from the pp. gehrumpen of the same verb; see further under Ripple (2). + Du. rompelen, or rompen, 'to wrinckle,' Hexham; rompel, or rimpel, 'a wrinckle;' id. And cf. G. rümpfen, to crook, bend, wrinkle. Der. rumple, sb.

RUN, to move swiftly, flee, flow, dart. (E.) M. E. rinnen, rennen, pt. t. ran, pp. runnen, ronnen; Chaucer, C. T. 4098, 4103, 15389, 15394. The mod. E. verb has usurped the vowel of the pp. throughout, except in the pt. t. ran. By the transposition of r, we also find out, except in the pt. t. ran. By the transposition of r, we also find M. E. ernen, eornen, to run; Ancren Riwle, pp. 42, 74, 80, 86, 332, 360.—A.S. rinnan, pt. t. ran, pp. gerunnen; Grein, ii. 382; also irnan, yrnan, pt. t. arn; id. 140. + Du. rennen. + Icel. renna; older form, rinna. + Dan. rinde (for rinne). + Swed. rinna. + Goth. rinnan. + G. rennen.

β. The Teut. base is RANN, standing for an older base ARN; fisch, iii. 251. Allied to Gk. δρυψμ, I stir up, έρ-χομαι, I go; Lat. or-iri, to arise; Skt. rinomi, I go, rise, ri, to go. AR, to rise, drive; Fick, i. 19. Der. run, sb., Tam. Shrew, iv. 1. 16; run-away, Mids. Nt. Dr. iii. 2. 405; runn-er, runn-ing. Also runn-el, a small stream, Collins, Ode on the Passions; run, a small stream. Also renn-et (I); old form also runn-et.

RUNAGATE, a vagabond. (F., -L.) In Ps. lxviii. 6, Prayer-Book version; Shak. Rich. III, iv. 4, 465. 'The A.V. has rebellious, as in Isaiah xxx. 1, which is quoted by Latimer (Remains, p. 434) in this form: "Wo be unto you, runagate children;" Bible Word-book. In the Coventry Mysteries, p. 384, it is written renogat: "Ys there ony renogat among us;" id. β. It so happens that gate in many E. dialects signifies a way; whilst at the same time the M. E. verb rennen passed into the form run, as at present. Hence the M.E. renegat, a renegade, was popularly supposed to stand for renne a gate, i.e. to run on the way, and was turned into runagate accordingly; esp. as we also have the word runaway. But it is certain that the orig. sense of M. E. renegat was 'apostate' or 'villain;' see Chaucer, C. T. 5353.—O. F. renegat, 'a renegadoe, one that abjures his religion;' Cot.—Low Lat. renegatus, pp. of renegare, to deny again, to deny the faith. See Renegade. ¶ It is remarkable that when renegate had been corrupted into runagate, we borrowed the word over early in the form renegate from Sonn renegate. It is a pity over again, in the form renegade, from Span. renegado. It is a pity we could not do without it altogether.

RUNDLET, RUNLET, a small barrel. (F., -L.) a later form, corrupted from the older rundelet or runlet; spelt rundlet in Levins, ed. 1570. 'Rundelet, or lytle pot, orcula;' Huloct (cited by Wheatley). 'Roundlet, a certaine measure of wine, oyle, &c., containing 181 gallons; An. 1. Rich. III. cap. 13; so called of his roundness;' Minsheu. Formed with dimin. suffix -et from O. F. rondele, a little tun or barrel (Roquefort); the same word as O. F. rondelle, a buckler or round target (shield), in Cotgrave. This is again formed, with dimin. suffix -ele, -elle, from ronde, a circle, or from rond, round; see Bound.

BUNE, one of the old characters used for cutting inscriptions on stone. (E.) M. E. rune, counsel, a letter, Layamon, 25332, 25340, 32000; later roun, whence roun or round in Shakespeare; see Roun. A. S. rún, a rune, mystery, secret colloquy, whisper; Grein, ii. 385. The orig. sense seems to be 'whisper' or 'buzz;' hence, a low talk, secret colloquy, a mystery, and lastly a writing, because written characters were regarded as a mystery known to the few. + Icel.

RUNG, one of the rounds of a ladder. (E.) Also a staff (Halli-well), one of the stakes of a cart, a spar (Webster). M. E. ronge, P. Plowman, B. xvi. 44; Chaucer, C. T. 3625 (where Tyrwhitt's edition wrongly has renges for ronges).—A. S. hrung, apparently one of the stakes of a cart; Grein, ii. 109. + O. Du. ronge, the beam upon which the coulter of a plough, or of a wagon rests; Hexham. + Icel. röng, a rib in a ship. + G. runge, a short thick piece of iron or wood, a pin, bolt. + Goth. hrugga (= hrunga), a staff, Mark, vi. 8. We find also Irish ronga, a rung, joining spar, Gael. rong, a joining spar, rib of a boat, staff; these seem to be borrowed from English. Prob. connected with A. S. hring, a ring; see Ring.

RUPEE, an Indian coin, worth about two shillings. (Hind., -Skt.)

In silver, 14 roopees make a masse;' Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1665, p. 46; cf. p. 67. The gold rupee is worth about 29s. - Hindustáni rúpiyah, a rupee; Rich. Arab. and Pers. Dict. p. 753. - Skt. rúpya, handsome; also, as sb. silver, wrought silver, or wrought gold.—Skt. rúpa, natural state, form, beauty. Supposed to be derived from rop, in ropaya, causal of ruh, to grow (Benfey).

RUPTURE, a bursting, breach, breakage. (F., -L.) No peryll of obstruction or rupture; Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 32 (R.) - F. rupture, 'a rupture, breach;' Cot. - Lat. ruptura, fem. of fut. part. of rumpere (pt. t. rupi), to break, burst. - & RUP, to break, violate, rob; cf. Lithuan. rupas, rough, A. S. reofan, to reave, Skt. rup, to confound, lup, to break, destroy, spoil; Fick, iii. 746. Der. rupture, verb. From the same root are ab-rupt, bank-rupt, cor-rupt, dis-ruption, e-ruption, inter-rupt, ir-ruption, pro-ruption, rote (1), route, aux-raption, e-raption, inter-raps, ir-raption, pro-raption, role (1), rolle, rout, rut. Also loot, perhaps loop; and perhaps ruff, ruffle (1).

RURAL, belonging to the country. (F., -L.) 'In a person rurall or of a very base lynage;' Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, b. i. c. 3. § 5.

(R.) - F. rural, 'rurall;' Cot. - Lat. ruralis, rural. - Lat. rur-, stem of rus (gen. ruris), the country; see Rustic. Der. rural-ly, rural-ise.

RUSE, a trick. (F., -L.) Used by Ray (died A.D. 1705), according to Todd (no reference). Phillips. ed. 1706, gives the adj. rusy, full of tricks. -F. ruse, a stratagem. -F. ruser, 'to beguile, use tricks;' B. This F. ruser is a contraction of O. F. reuser, to refuse, Cot. recoil, retreat, escape; hence, to use tricks for escaping (Burguy). -Lat. recusare, to refuse; whence the O.F. reuser was formed, precisely as O. F. seür, later sûr (E. sure), from Lat. securus; see Scheler. - Lat. re-, back; and causa, a cause, statement; so that recusare is to decline a statement. See Re- and Cause.

RUSH (1), to move forward violently. (Scand.) M. E. ruschen, rushen, Chaucer, C. T. 1641; Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 368; Sir Gawayn and the Grene Knight, 2204. — O. Swed. rusha, to rush; Ihre gives the example: 'Tha kommo the alle ruskande inn,' then they all came rushing in; Chron. Rhythm. p. 40. This is clearly connected with O. Swed. rusa, to rush; whence E. Rouse (1), q. v. B. The O. Swed. ruska also means to shake (cf. Swed. rusta, to stir, to make a riot); this is the same as Icel. ruska, to shake violently, Dan. ruske, to pull, shake, twitch.

7. Another sense of O. Swed, ruska (like G. rauschen) is to rustle; perhaps all three senses are connected, and the original notion may have been 'to shake with a sudden noise;' see Rustle. So also Low G. rusken, (1) to rustle, (2) to rush about; Bremen Wörterbuch. Der rush, sb.

RUSH (2), a round-stemmed leafless plant, common in wet ground. (E. or L.) M. E. rusche, rische, resche, P. Plowman, B. iii. 141. -A. S. risce, resce, Gloss, to A. S. Leechdoms. Cf. Low G. rusk, risch, a rush; Brem. Wörterbuch; Du. and G. rusch, rush, reed, small brushwood. β. It is very uncertain whether these are Teutonic words; perhaps they are merely borrowed from Lat. ruscum, butcher's Not connected with Goth. raus, G. rohr, a reed. Der. rush-y. Also bul-rush, M. E. bulrysche, Prompt. Parv. p. 244; in which word the first part is prob. Icel. bolr, bulr, a stem, trunk, Dan. bul, trunk, stem, shaft of a column, Swed. bdl, a trunk, so that the sense is 'stem-rush,' from its long stem; see Bulwark, Bole; cf. bullweed (=bole-weed, ball-weed), knapweed; bulrush often means the reed-mace. Also rush-candle, Tam. Shrew, iv. 5. 14; rush-light.

RUSK, a kind of light, hard cake or bread. (Span.) 'The lady sent me divers presents of fruit, sugar, and rusk;' Ralegh, cited by Todd (no reference). - Span. rosca de mar, sea-rusks, a kind of biscuit, Meadows; rosca, a roll of bread, Minsheu, ed. 1623. Minsheu alto has rosquete, a pancake, rosquilla, a clue of threed, a little roll of bread, also lying round like a snake. Cf. Port. rosca, the winding of a serpent, a screw; fazer roscas, to wriggle. Thus the rusk was orig. a twist, a twisted roll of bread. Origin unknown (Diez).

RUSSET, reddish-brown; a coarse country dress. (F., -L.) M.E. russet, P. Plowman, A. ix. 1; B. viii. I. - F. rousset, 'russet, brown, rán, a secret, a rune. + Goth. runa, a mystery, counsel. + O. H. G. ruddy; 'Cot. Hence applied to a coarse brown rustic dress. Dimin. rúna, a secret, counsel; whence G. raunen, to whisper. B. All of F. roux (fem. rousse), 'reddish;' Cot. - Lat. russus, reddish. from the Teut. base RU-NA, a murmur, whisper; formed (like Lat. & B. Lat. russus = rud-tus, for rudh-lus, from the base RUDH appearing rusty, Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, b. v. c. 15. § 4. + Du. roest. + Dan. rust. + Swed. rost. + G. rost.

B. Probably A. S. rust stands for rud-st; at any rate, we may consider it as allied to A. S. rud-u, ruddiness, and E. ruddy and red; cf. Icel. ryb, rust, lit. redness; M. H. G. rot, rust, allied to G. roth, red. So also Lithuan rudis, rust, rudas, reddish. See Red. Der. rust, verb; rust-y, A. S. rustig, as above; rust-i-ly, rust-i-ness.

RUSTIC, belonging to the country. (F., - L.) Spelt rusticke, Spenser, F. Q. introd. to b. iii. st. 5.-F. rustique, 'rusticall;' Cot.- Lat. rusticus, belonging to the country; formed with double suffix -ti-cus from rus, the country.

β. The Lat. rūs is thought to be a contraction for rovus* or ravus*, allied to Russ. raviina, a plain, Zend ravan, a plain, and to E. room; see Room. Der. rustic-al-ly, rustic-ate, rustic-at-ion; rustic-i-ly, from F. rusticité, 'rusticity,' Cot.

And see rur-al, roister-ing.

RUSTLE, to make a low whispering sound. (Scand.) In Shak. Meas, for Meas, iv. 3. 38. The form is frequentative; and it seems best to consider it as the frequentative of Swed. rusta, to stir, to make a noise. This is a mere variant of O. Swed. ruska, to rustle; cf. G. ruscheln, ruschen, to rustle, rush, G. rauschen, to rustle, rush. B. Hence rustle is, practically, little else than the frequentative of Rush (1), q. v. γ. The A. S. hrusle, a rustling, hristlan, to rustle, are unauthorised words, given by Somner, but they may be related; as also Swed. rysa, to shudder, and the Icel. strong verb hrjósa, to shudder, A. S. hreósan, to fall with a rush. If so, the Teut. base is HRUS, to shake or shudder; Fick, iii. 84. Der. rustle, sb.; rustl-ing. RUT (1), a track left by a wheel. (F., - L.) 'And as from hills rain-waters headlong fall, That all ways eat huge ruts; ' Chapman, tr. of Homer, Iliad, iv. 480. The word is merely a less correct spelling of route, i.e. a track. - F. route, 'a rutt, way, path, street, ...

RUT (2), to copulate, as deer. (F., -L.) M. E. rutyen, rutien; P. Plowman, C. xiv. 146; cf. in rotey tyme = in rut-time, id. B. xi. 329. Like other terms of the chase, it is of Norman-French origin. 329. Like other terms of the chase, it is of from the M. E. rotey answers to O. F. rute, spelt rutte in Cotgrave; he gives venaison ruitée, venison that's killed in rut-time. The verb ruiten is formed from the sb. rut. - F. rut (so spelt even in the 14th century, Littré), better spelt ruit, as in Cotgrave, who explains it by 'the rut of deer or boars, their lust, and the season wherein they ingender. -Lat. rugitum, acc. of rugitus, the roaring of lions; hence, the noise of deer in rut-time. Cf. F. ruir, 'to roar,' Cot., from Lat. rugire, to roar. - V RU, to make a noise, whence also Lithuan. ruja, rutting-time; see Rumour.

RUTH, pity, compassion. (Scand.) M. E. reuthe, rewthe, Chaucer, C. T. 916; reouthe, affliction, Ancren Riwle, p. 32, l. 8; p. 54, l. 12. Formed from the verb to rue, but not an A. S. form, the corresponding A. S. sb. being hreów. — Icel. hryggð, hrygð, affliction, sorrow. Cf. Icel. hryggr, grieved, sorrowful. — Teut. hase HRU, to grieve, appearing in A. S. hreówan, to rue; see Rue (1). Der. ruth-less, Meas. for Meas. iii. 2. 121; ruth-ful, Troilus, v. 3. 48.

RYE, a kind of grain. (E.) M. E. reye, Chaucer, C. T. 7328; ruze,

B. All from the Teut. type RUGA, rye, Fick, iii. 256. Further allied to Lithuan. pl. sb. ruggei, rye; Russ.

roje, rye. Der. rye-grass.

RYOT, a Hindoo cultivator or peasant. (Arab.) The same word as Rayah, q.v.

SABAOTH, hosts, armies. (Heb.) In phr. 'the Lord of Sabaoth;' Rom. ix. 29; James, v. 4. - Heb. tsebúoth, armies; pl. of tsábá, an army. - Heb. tsábá, to attack, fight.

SABBATH, the day of rest. (L., =Gk., = Heb.) M. E. sabat, Wycliff, Mark, ii. 27; Cursor Mundi, 11997. – Lat. sabbatum. – Gk. σάββατον. – Heb. shabbáth, rest, sabbath, sabbath-day. – Heb. shábath, to rest from labour. ¶ The mod. E. word is a compromise between sabbat (the Lat. form) and shabbath (the Heb. form). Der. Sabbat-ar-i-an, sabbat-ic-al.

SABLE, an animal of the weasel kind, with dark or black fur; also, the fur. (F., -Slavonic.) M. E. sable, Chaucer, Compl. of Mars, 284; the adj. sabeline occurs much earlier, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, i. 181, l. 362.—O. F. sable, the sable (Burguy); 'the colour sables, or black, in blazon;' Cot. Cf. Low Lat. sabelum, the sable; sabelinus, sable-fur, whence the O. F. sebelin, M. E. sabeline; the mod. F. zibeline, properly an adj., is also used for the form: 'It is even called seck, in an article cited by bp. Percy from in Gk. ε-ρυθ-ρόs, red; see Red, Ruddy. Der. russet-ing, a russet animal itself. Of Slavonic origin. – Russ. sobols, the sable, also a boa or apple.

RUST, a reddish-brown coating on iron exposed to moisture. (E.)

M. E. rust, Wyclif, Matt. vi. 19, 20. – A. S. rust, rust; whence rustig,

It is sometimes said that the name of the sable is taken from Siberia. where it is found. I do not believe it. The Russ. sobole, a sable, does not resemble Sibire, Siberia; nor does the adj. form sabeline (in

O. F.) approach Sibirskii or Sibiriak', Siberian.

SABRE, SABER, a kind of sword. (F., -G., - Hungarian.)

A late word. 'Sable or Sabre, a kind of simetar, hanger, or broad sword; Phillips, ed. 1706. – F. sabre, a sabre. – G. sabel, a sabre, falchion.

B. Thus Diez, who says that at least the F. form was borrowed from German; cf. Ital. sciabla, sciabola, Span. sable. y. He adds that the G. word was also borrowed; and compares Hungarian száblya, Servian sáblja, Wallachian súbie, a sabre. I find Hung. szablya, a sabre, szabni, to cut. szabo, a cutter, in Dankovsky, Magyar Lexicon, 1833, p. 327. At p. 862, Dankovsky considers szabni, to cut, to be of Wallachian origin.

Der. sabre-tash, F. sabretache, Der. sabre-tash, F. sabretache, from G. säbellasche. a sabretash, loose pouch hanging near the sabre, worn by hussars (Flügel); from G. säbel, a sabre, and tasche, a pocket. SACCHARINE, sugar-like. (F, -L., -Gk., -Skt.) In Todd's Johnson. - F. saccharin, 'of sugar;' Cot. Formed with suffix in (=Lat. -inus) from Lat. saccharon, sugar (Pliny). -Gk. σάκχαρον, sugar. - Skt. carkara, candied sugar; see Sugar.

SACERDOTAL, priestly. (F., -L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627.

- F. sacerdotal, 'sacerdotall;' Cot. - Lat. sacerdotalis, belonging to a priest. - Lat. sacerdot-, stem of sacerdos, a priest; lit. 'presenter of offerings or sacred gifts' (Corssen). - Lat. sacer, sacred; and dare, to give; cf. Lat. dos (gen. dotis), a dowry, from the same verb. The fem. form sacerdota, a priestess, occurs in an inscription. See Sacred and Date (1). Der. sacerdoial-ly, -ism.

SACK (1), a bag. (L., - Gk., - Heb., - Egyptian?) M. E. sak, Chaucer, C. T. 4019. - A. S. sacc, Gen. xlii. 25, 28. - Lat. saccus. -Chaucer, C. 1. 4019.—A. S. sace, Gen. xIII. 25, 28.—Lat. saceus.—Gk. σάκκος.—Heb. saq, stuff made of hair-cloth, sack-cloth; also, a sack for corm.

β. A borrowed word in Hebrew, and prob. of Egyptian origin; cf. Coptic sok, sack-cloth, Gen. xxxvii. 34, Matt. xi. 21; see Peyron's Coptic Lexicon.

E. Müller cites sak as being the Æthiopic form.

γ. This remarkable word has travelled everywhere, together (as I suppose) with the story of Joseph; the reason why it is the same in all languages is because it is, in them all, a borrowed word from Hebrew. We find Du. zak, G. sack, all, a borrowed word from Hebrew. Icel. sekkr, Swed. säkk, Dan. sük, Goth. sakkus (sack-cloth, Matt. xi. 21), Ital. sacco, Span. and Port. saco, F. sac, Irish and Gael. sac, W. sach. And see Sack (2). Der. sack-cloth, Gen. xxxvii. 34; sack-ing, cloth of which sacks are made, coarse stuff; sack-ful. Also sack (2), q.v.; satch-el, q.v. Doublet, sac, a bag or receptacle for a liquid, borrowed from F. sac.

SACK (2), plunder; as a verb, to plunder. (F., -L., -Gk., -Heb., - Egyptian?) 'The plenteous houses sackt;' Surrey, Ecclesiastes, c. v; l. 45. Formed from the sb. sack, pillage. 'And Helen, that to utter sack both Greece and Troië brought;' Turbervile, Dispraise of Women (R.) = F. sac, 'a sack, waste, ruine, havock, spoile; 'Cot. Cf. F. saccager, 'to sack, pillage,' Cot.; also O. F. sacquer, 'to draw hastily, to pull out speedily or apace;' Cot. We also find Low Lat. saccare, to put into a bag; a common word; and Low Lat. saccus, a garment, robe, treasure, purse. β. There seems to be little doubt that the F. sac, pillage, is connected with, and due to, the F. sac, a sack, from Lat. saccus; see Back (1). The simplest solution is that in Wedgwood, 'from the use of a sack in removing plunder;' though the sense is probably rather metaphorical than exact. In the same way we talk of bagging, i.e. pilfering a thing, or of pocketing it, and of baggage as a general term, whether bags be actually used or not. Thus Hexham gives O. Du. zacken, 'to put in a sack, or fill a sack;' zacken ende packen, 'to put up bagg and baggage, or to trusse up.'

Y. The use of O. F. sacquer is remarkable, as it seems to express, at first sight, just the opposite to packing up; but perhaps it meant, originally, to search in a sack, to pull out of a purse; for the sacking of a town involves the two processes: (1) that of taking things out of their old receptacles, and (2) that of putting them into new ones; note the Low Lat. saccus in the senses of 'treasure' and 'purse.' Burguy notes that the O.F. desacher, lit. to draw out of a sack, was used in the same way as the 8. It deserves to be added that Cotgrave gives simple verb. 17 proverbs involving the word sac, clearly proving its common use in phrases. One of them is: 'On luy a donné son sac et ses quilles, he hath his passport given him, he is turned out to grazing, said of a servant whom his master hath put away; hence the E. phrase, to give one the sack.' And again: 'Acheter un chat en sac, to buy a pig in a poak.'

SACK (3), the name of an old Spanish wine. (F.,-L.) See the account in Nares. He notices that it was also called seck, a better pagne, vin sec. Cf. Span. seco, dry. Lat. siecum, acc. of siecus, dry. Root uncertain.

We may note Du sek, sack, a sort of wine (Sewel), as illustrating the fact that sack stands for seck; this also is from F. sec. So also G. sekt, sack; Swed. seck (Widegren).

SACKBUT, a kind of wind-instrument. (F., -Span, -Hybrid of Heb. and Teutonic.) In Dan. iii, 5. The sack-but resembled the modern trombone, and was a wind instrument; the word is used to translate the Heb. sabbeká (with initial samech), Gk. σαμβύκη, Lat. sambuca, which was a stringed instrument. There is no connection between these words and the sackbut. - F. saquebute, a sackbut, trombone; Littré - Span. sacabuche (nautical word), a tube or pipe which serves as a pump; also, a sackbut; Neumann. Cf. Port. sacabuna, saquebuno, a sackbut. β. The origin is doubtful; the first part of the word is plainly derived from Span. sacar, to draw out, with reference to the tube of the instrument; but I can find no satisfactory solution of the whole word. The Span. buche means the maw, crop, or stomach of an animal, and, colloquially, the human stomach. Hence the suggestion in Webster, that sacabuche means 'that which exhausts the stomach or chest;' a name possibly given in derision from the exertion used in playing it. γ . Adopting this etymology, we may further note that sacar, to draw out, extract, emity, is the same word as the O.F. sacquer, to draw out hastily, and also has the same sense as O. F. desacher, to draw out of a sack, all of these being derived from Low Lat. saccus, a sack, of Heb. origin; see Sack (2) and Sack (1). 8. The word buche is derived by Diez from the Teutonic, viz. from O. H. G. bozo, a bunch, which from bozen, to beat; see Boss.

SACRAMENT, a solemn religious rite, the eucharist. (L.) M.E. sacrament, Chaucer, C.T. 9576. - Lat. sacramentum, an engagement, military oath; in ecclesiastical writers, a mystery, sacrament. Formed with suffix -mentum from sacrare, to dedicate, consecrate, render sacred or solemn. - Lat. sacr-, stem of sacer, sacred; see Sacred. Der. sacrament-al, sacrament-al-ly.

SACRED, made holy, religious. (F., -L.) Sacred is the pp. of M. E. sacren, to render holy, consecrate, a verb now obsolete. We find sacreth = consecrates, in Ancren Riwle, p. 268, 1. 5. The pp. i-sacred, consecrated, occurs in Rob. of Glouc. p. 330, where the prefix i- (= A.S. ge-) is merely the mark of the Southern dialect. He was . . . sacryd or enounted emperoure of Rome; Fabyan's Chron. cap. 155, last line. [Hence too sacring-bell, Hen. VIII, iii. 2. 295.] - O. F. sacrer, 'to consecrate;' Cot. - Lat. sacrare, to consecrate. - Lat. sacr-, stem of sacer, sacred, holy. - Lat. base SAC, appearing in a nasalised form in sancire, to render inviolable, establish, confirm; see Saint. Der. sacred-ly, sacred-ness; and see sacra-ment, sacri-fice, sacri-lege, sacrist-an, sext-on; sacer-dotal; con-secrate, de-secrate, ex-ecrate, ob-secrate.

SACRIFICE, an offering to a deity. (F., -L.) M. E. sacrifise, Ancren Riwle, p. 138, ll. 9, 11; also sacrifice. - F. sacrifice, 'a sacrifice; 'Cot.-Lat. sacrificium, a sacrifice, lit. a rendering sacred; cf. sacrificare, to sacrifice. - Lat. sacri-, for sacro-, crude form of sacer, sacred; and facere, to make; see Sacred and Fact. Der. sacrifice, sacrific-er; sacrific-er; sacrific-ial.

SACRILEGE, profanation of what is holy. (F.,-L.) M. E. sacrilege, spelt sacrilege, Gower, C. A. ii. 374, ll. 5, 14.-F. sacrilege, 'a sacriledge, or church-robbing;' Cot.-Lat. sacrilegium, the robbing of a temple, stealing of sacred things.-Lat. sacrilegus, a sacrilegious person, one who steals from a temple. - Lat. sacri-, for sacro-, crude form of sacer, sacred; and legere, to gather, steal, purloin; see Sacred and Legend. Der. sacrileg-i-ous, Mach. ii.

3. 72, a coined word; sacrileg-i-ous-ly, -ness.

SACRISTAN, SEXTON, an officer in a church who has charge of the sacred vessels and vestments. (F., -L.) ruption of sacristan into sexton took place so early that it is not easy to find the spelling sacristan, though it appears in Blount's Glossographia, ed. 1674. The duties of the sacristan have suffered alteration; he is now the grave-digger rather than the keeper of the vestments. The form sextein is in Chaucer, C. T. 13942; the collateral form Saxton survives as a proper name; I find it in the Clergy List for 1873.—

F. sacristain, 'a sexton, or vestry-keeper, in a church;' Cot. Formed as if from Low Lat. sacristanus *, but the usual Low Lat. word is simply sacrista. without the suffix; cf. 'Sexterne, Sacrista,' Prompt. Parv.; and see Ducange. Formed with suffix, ista (= Gk. -1077); from Lat. sacr., stem of sacer, sacred; see Sacred. Der. sacrist-y, from F. sacristie, 'a vestry, or sextry, in a church,' Cot.; cf. 'Sextrye, Sacristia,' Prompt. Parv.

an old account-book of the city of Worcester: "Anno Eliz. xxxiiij. BAD, heavy, serious, sorrowful. (E.) 'Sadde, tristis;' Levins. Item, for a gallon of claret wine, and seck, and a pound of sugar."

Other instances have been found.' By Sherris sack, Falstaff meant 'sack from Xeres,' our sherry; see Sherry. Sack was a Spanish wine of the dry or rough kind. F. sec, dry; in the phrase vin sec; Sherwood (in his index to Cotgrave) has: 'Sack (wine), vin d'Espagne, vin sec.' Cf. Span. seco, dry. = Lat. siccum, acc. of siccus, dry.

Rot. wester in March 1988. Sherwood in Layamon, 20830, we have 'sad of mine londe' sated or tired of my lond. Hence seem to have resulted the senses sated or tired of my lond. Hence seem to have resulted the senses. sated, or tired, of my land. Hence seem to have resulted the senses of satisfied, fixed, firm, steadfast, &c.; see examples in Stratmann and in the Glossary to Will. of Palerne, &c. The mod. E. sad is directly from the sense of sated, tired, weary - A.S. sad, sated, satiated; Grein, ii. 394. + O. Sax. sad, sated. + Icel. saddr. old form sabr, sated, having got one's fill. + Goth. saths, full, filled, sated. + G. satt, satiated, full, satisfied, weary.

B. All from the Teut. type SADA, sated, Fick, iii. 318. Cognate words are found in Lithuan. sotus, satiated; Russ. suitost', satiety; Lat. satur, sated, also deepcoloured (like E. sad-coloured), well filled, full, sat, satis, sufficiently; all from a base SAT, with the sense of 'full' or 'filled.' See Satiate, Satisfy.

¶ In no way connected with set, which is quite a different word; nor with Lat. sedare, which is allied to E. set. Der. sad-ly, -ness. Also sadd-en, verb, from M.E. sadden, to settle, confirm, P. Plowman, B. x. 242; cf. A. S. gesadian, to fill (Grein), A. S. sadian, to feel weary or sad, Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, cap.

SADDLE, a leathern seat, put on a horse's back. (E.) M.E. sadel (with one d), Chaucer, C. T. 2164. A. S. sadol; Grein, ii. 387. + Du. zadel. + Icel. söbull. + Swed. and Dan. sadel. + G. sattel; O. H. G. satul. + Russ. siedlo. + Lat. sella (put for sed-la). β. The form of the word is abnormal; some suppose it not to be Teutonic, but borrowed from the Lat. sedile; this we may confidently reject, as the Lat. sedile is not a saddle, but a chair, the true Lat. word being sella. Perhaps the Teutonic form was borrowed from Slavonic; it is quite clear that the Russ. siedlo, a saddle, is from the verb sidiete, to sit (or from the root of that verb); and that the Lat. sella is from sedere, to sit. Y. Hence, though we cannot derive saddle immediately from the E. verb to sit, we may safely refer it, and all its cognates (or borrowed forms) to \checkmark SAD, to sit; cf. (Vedic) Skt. sad, to sit down, Skt. sadas, a seat, abode. 8. As we cannot well determine by what route the word came to us, we may call it an E. word; it is, doubtless, of great antiquity. e. It is worth noting, that the A.S. setl, i. e. a settle, throne, appears in the Northumbrian version of Matt. xxv. 31 as sedel, and in the Mercian version as sedle, shewing a like confusion between t and d in another word from the same root. Der. saddle, verb, A. S. sadelian, Ælfric's Grammar, ed. Zupitza, p. 165, l. 10; saddl-er, saddl-er-y; saddle-bow, M. E. sadel-bowe (Stratmann).

SADDUCEE, the name of a Jewish sect. (L., -Gk., -Heb.) The M. E. pl. Saduceis is in Wyclif, Deeds [Acts], xxiii. 8; &c.— Lat. pl. Sadducei.—Gk. pl. Zaddovacio.—Heb pl. tsedukim, in the Mishna; see Smith, Concise Dict. of the Bible. It is the pl. of tsádóq, lit. 'the just one,' and so might mean 'the righteous;' but it is generally supposed that the sect was not named from their assumed righteousness, but from the name of their founder Tsadiq (Zadok); thus the right sense of the word is Zadokites. B. But it makes no difference to the etymology; either way we are led to Heb.

tsadóq, just, from the Heb. root tsádaq, to be just.

SAFE, unharmed, secure, free from danger. (F., -L.) M. E. SAFE, unharmed, secure, free from danger. (F., -L.) M. E. sauf, Will. of Palerne, 868, 1329; we also find the phr. sauf and sound, id. 868, 2816. - F. sauf, 'safe;' Cot. - Lat. saluum, acc. of saluus, whole, safe; put for saruus*, whence Lat. seruare, to keep safe; see Serve. - SAR. to keep, protect; preserved in the Zend har (for sar), to protect, Fick, i. 797. SAG, to droop, be depressed. (Scand.) M. E. saggen, Prompt. Parv. p. 440. = Swed. sacka, to settle, sink down; Dan. sakke (as a nautical term), to have stern-way. + G. sacken, to sink. O. Swed. sacka is used of the settling of dregs; so also Low G. sakken, in the Bremen Wörterbuch. It seems to be an unnasalised form of sink, with the same sense; see Sink. The Icel. sokkning, a sinking, is from sökkva (=sankva), to sink. ¶ We cannot well connect it with A.S. sigan, to sink; though there may have been some confusion with it.

SAGA, a tale, story. (Scand.) The E. word is saw. Saga is 6 flowing into the Zuyder Zee). There are several rivers called Saale merely borrowed from Icel. saga, a story, tale; cognate with E. saw; or Saar; cf. Skt. salila, sara, water, from sri, to flow. see Baw (2)

SAGACIOUS. (L.) In Milton, P. L. x. 281. Coined, as if from L. sagaciosus*, from sagaci-, crude form of sagaz, of quick perception, keen, sagacious; from a base SAG, of uncertain meaning. Cf. sagire, to perceive by the senses. Not allied to Sage (1). Der. sagacious-ly, sagacious-ness. Also sagaci-ty, in Minsheu, ed. 1627, formed (by analogy) from Lat. sagacitas, sagacity.

SAIL, a sheet of canvas, for propelling a ship by the means of the wind. (E.) M. E. seil, seyl, Chaucer, C. T. 698; Havelok, 711.

-A. S. segel, segl (Grein). + Du. zeil. + Icel. segl. + Dan. seil. + Swed. segel. + G. segel.

B. All from Teut. type SEGLA, a sail (Fick, iii, 316); which Fick ingeniously connects with Teut. base SAG =

SAGH, to bear up against, resist; so that the sail is that which resists or endures the force of the wind. Cf. Skt. sah, to bear, undergo, endure, be able to resist; from the same root. Der. sail, verb; sail-cloth, sail-er, sail-or (spelt saylor in Temp. i. 2. 270, doubtless by analogy with tail-or, though there the ending in -or is justifiable, whilst in sail-or it is not); sail-ing; also sail-yard, A. S. segelgyrd, Wright's Vocab. i. 74, col. I.

B. All from Teut. type SAKA, a contention, suit at law (Fick, iii. 314), from the base SAK, appearing in Goth. sakan (a strong verb, pt. t. sók), to contend, rebuke. Perhaps allied to Skt. sanj, sajj, to adhere. Der. seek, q.v. SALAAM, SALAM, peace; a salutation. (Arab.) 'This low SALIENT, springing forward. (L.) In Pope, Dunciad, ii. 162. But it really took the place of saliant (Skinner, Phillips), which was an heraldric term for animals represented as springing forward; and this was due to F. saillant, pres. part. of saillir, instead of to the corresponding Lat. salient., pres. part. of Lat. salire, to leap, sometimes used of water. \checkmark SAR, to go, flow; cf. Skt. sri, to go, to flow; sari, a water-fall; Gk. ἄλλομα, I leap. Der. salient-ly. From the same root are as-sail, as-sault, de-sult-or-y, ex-ult (for ex-sult), insult, re-vili-ent, re-sult, sally, sal-mon, salt-at-ion; salt-ire, q. v.

salt-pits. - Lat. sal, salt. See Salt.

SALIVA, spittle. (L.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. - Lat. saliua, spittle. Cf. Gk. σίαλον, spittle; Russ. slina, spittle; and see Slime. saliv-ate, saliv-at-ion; saliv-al, saliv-ar-y. Doublet, slime.

SALLET, a kind of helmet. (F., -Ital., -L.) In Shak. 2 Hen. VI, iv. 10. 12; and in Baret (1580). Palsgrave has: 'Salet of harnesse, salade.' Sallet is a corruption of salade, due to the fact that a salad of herbs was also corrupted to sallet. 'Sallet, a helmet; Sa let oil, salad oil;' Glossary to Shakespeare's [North's] Plutarch, ed. Skeat. - O. F. salade, 'a salade, helmet, headpiece; also a sallet of herbs;' Cot. [Here the spellings salade and sallet are interchanged; however, the two words are of different origin.]—Ital. celata, a helmet.—Lat. celata, that which is engraved or ornamented; Diez cites cassis cælata, an ornamented helmet, from Cicero. Cf. Span. celar, to engrave, celadura, enamel, inlaying, celada, a helmet. Lat. calata is the sem. of the pp. of calare, to engrave, ornament. - Lat.

calum, a chisel, graver; perhaps allied to cadere, to cut.

SALLOW (1), SALLY, a kind of willow. (E.) M. E. salwe, Chaucer, C. T. 6237. 'Salwhe, tree, Salix;' Prompt. Parv.—A.S. sealh; we find 'Amera, sealh; Salix, welig' mentioned together in Wright's Vocab. i. 285, col. 2. The suffix -ow — M. E. -we — A.S.
-ge, suffix of the oblique cases from nom. in -h, just as E. farrow is from A.S. fearh, and the prov. E. barrow-pig from A.S. bearh. In Lowland Sc. the word became sauch, saugh, by loss of I. + Icel. selja. + Swed. salg, salj. + Dan. selje. + G. sahlweide (O.H.G. salaha), the round-leaved willow; see Fick, iii. 320. + Lat. salin, a willow. + Gael. seileach, a willow. + Irish sail, saileach. + W. helyg, pl., willows. + B. Named from growing near the water; cf. Skt. sari, water, saras, a large pond, a piece of water in which the lotus grows, sarasiya, a lotus, sarit, a river. - \SAR, to flow; cf. Skt. sri, to flow.

BALLOW (2), of a pale, yellowish colour. (E.) M. E. salow with one l); we find: 'Salwhe, salowe, of colour, Croceus;' Prompt. Parv. p. 441. - A.S. salu, sallow, Grein, ii. 388; whence the compounds saloneb, with pale beak, salupád, with pale garment, sealobrún, sallow-brown; id. + Du. zaluw, tawny, sallow. + Icel. sölr, yellow-ish. + M. H. G. sal, O. H. G. sala, dusky (whence F. sale, dirty). Root uncertain. Der. sallow-ness.

SALLY, to rush out suddenly. (F., -L.) 'Guyon salied forth to land; 'Spenser, F. Q. ii. 6. 28. M. E. s. lien, to dance, is the same word; Prompt. Parv. p. 441; P. Plowman, B. xiii. 233. - F. saillir, to go out, issue, issue forth; also to leap, jump, bound; Cot. - Lat. salire, to leap; see Salient. Der. sally, sb., with which cf. F. saillie, 'a sally,' Cot.; from the fem. of the pp. sailli. Also sally-port, a gate whence a sally may be made.

SALMAGUNDI, a seasoned hodge-podge or mixture. (F., -Ital., - L.) 'Salmagundi, or Salmigund, an Italian dish made of cold turkey, anchovies, lemmons, oil, and other ingredients; also, a kind of hotch-potch or ragoo, &c.; Phillips, ed. 1706. But the word is French. - F. salmigondis; spelt salmigondin in Cotgrave, who describes the dish. B. Etym. disputed; but probably of Ital. origin, as stated by Phillips. We may fairly explain it from Ital. salame, salt meat, and condito, seasoned. This is the more likely, because the Ital. salame would make the pl. salami, and this was once the term in use. Thus Florio has: 'Salámi, any kinde of salt, y. This also explains pickled, or powdred meats or souse,' &c. the F. salmis (not in Cotgrave), which has proved a puzzle to etymologists; I think we may take salmis (= salted meats) to be a double plural, the s being the F. plural, and the i the Ital. plural; that is, the Ital. salami became F. salmi, and then the s was added. 8. The derivation of Ital. salami is clearly from Lat. sal, salt, though the suffix is obscure. The F. -gondi, for Ital. condito (or pl. conditi), is from Lat. conditus, seasoned, savoury, pp. of condire, to preserve, pickle, season. Thus the sense is 'savoury salt meats.

SALIMON, a fish. (F., -L.) M. E. saumoun, King Alisaunder, 1. 5446; salmon, salmond, Barbour's Bruce, ii. 576, xix. 664. [The introduction of the l is due to our knowledge of the Lat. form; we do salmonem, acc. of salmo, a salmon. that salmo means 'leaper;' from salire, to leap; which well accords with the fish's habits. See Salient. In any case, we may prob. refer it to \(\subseteq SAR, to go, flow, &c. \) Der. salmon-leap, M. E. samoun-saltoon, a large apartment. (F.,=0. H. G.) A late word; added by Todd to Johnson. = F. salon, a large room. = F. salle, a room, chamber. = O. H. G. sal (G. saal), a dwelling, house, hall, room. + Icel. salr, a hall. + A. S. sal, sele, a house, hall. The orig. sense is 'abode;' cf. Goth. saljan, to dwell; Russ. selo, a village.

SALT, a well-known substance. (E.) M. E. salt, P. Plowman, B. xv. 423.—A. S. sealt, Grein, ii. 434. + Du. zout (with u for l). + Icel. salt. + Dan. and Swed. salt. + G. salz. + Goth. salt. B. All from Teut. type SALTA, salt; Fick, iii. 321. On comparing this with Lat. sal, salt, we see that the Teut. word is sal-ta, where -ta is the usual Aryan pp. suffix, of extreme antiquity; Schleicher, Compend. § 224. Accordingly we find that A. S. sealt (E. salt) is also used as an adj., in the sense of 'salted' or 'full of salt,' as in sealt water = salt water; Grein, ii. 434. So also Icel. salr, adj., salt; Du. zout, adj.; Dan. and Swed. salt, adj. Y. Removing the suffix, we find cognate words in Lat. sal, salt, Gk. aas, Russ. sole, W. hal, halen, Skt. sara, salt. The Skt. sara means also the coagulum of curds or milk, lit. 'that which runs together,' from sri, to go. - SAR, to go, flow. It is possible that salt was named from the 'water' from which it was obtained; but this brings us back to the same root. T Curtius says: 'the Goth. sal-t, extended by a t, corresponds to the Gk. theme dλaτ, the dat. pl. of which is preserved in the proverb αλασιν είει; -ατ is to be taken here as an individualizing suffix, by the help of which "a piece of salt" is formed from "salt." I do not think this takes account of the adjectival use of the Teutonic word salt, nor of the fact that the E. adj. salt is represented in Lat. by sal-sus, clearly a pp. form. Cf. W. hallt, salt, adj., from halen, salt, sb. Der. salt-ly, salt-ness; salt-cellar, q.v.; salt, vb., salt-er, salt-ish, salt-less, salt-mine, salt-pan; salt-petre, q. v. Also (from sal) sal-ine, sal-ary, sal-ad, sauce, sausage, salmagundi.

SALTATION, dancing. (L.) Rare; merely formed (by analogy with F. words in -ion) from Lat. saltatio, a dance, a dancing. - Lat. saltatus, pp. of saltare, to dance, frequent. of salire, to leap; see

Der. saltat-or-y, from Lat. saltatorius, adj.

SALT-CELLAR, a vessel for holding salt. (E.; and F., - L.) The word salt is explained above. Cellar is an absurd corruption of saler or seller, derived from F. salière. Thus we find: 'Saliere, a saltseller; Cot. Cf. Ital. saliera, a salt-cellar. 'Hoc selarium, a celare;' Wright's Vocab. i. 198, note 8. 'A saltsaler of sylver;' A. D. 1463, in Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 23. l. 8. Formed from Lat. sal, salt; see ¶ Hence salt-cellar = salt-salt-holder; a tautological SALTIER, in heraldry, a St. Andrew's cross. (F., - L.) St. Andrew's cross is one in this position X; when charged on a shield, it is called a saltier. – F. saultoir, 'Saint Andrew's crosse, tearmed so by heralds;' Cot. The old sense was stirrup (Littré, s. v. sautoir); the cross seems to have been named from the position of the sidepieces of a stirrup, formerly made in a triangle Δ . - Low Lat. saltatorium, a stirrup, a common word; Ducange. - Lat. saltatorius, belonging to dancing or leaping, suitable for mounting a horse. - Lat. saltator, a dancer, leaper. - Lat. saltate, to dance, leap; frequentative of salire; see Salient.

SALT-PETRE, nitre. (E.; and F., -L., -Gk.) In Shak. 1 Hen. IV, i. 3. 60. For the former part of the word, see Salt. The E. word is a translation of O. F. salpestre, 'salt-petre;' Cot. Here -pestre (mod. F. -pêtre) is from Lat. petra; and sall-petre represents Lat. sal petra, lit. 'salt of the rock.' Lastly, Lat. petra is from Gk.

SALUBRIOUS, healthful. (L.) A late word. In Phillips. ed.
1706. Coined as if from a Lat. salubriosus*, extended from Lat. salubris, healthful. β. Lat. salūbris appears to stand for salut-bris, where the suffix -bris prob. means 'bearing,' or bringing, as in G. frucht-bar, fruitful; this suffix generally appears as -fer in Latin, but both -ber and -fer may be referred to the root BHAR, to bring; and we find also the forms saluti-fer, salu-ber. This gives the sense of 'health-bringing.' γ . Salut- is the stem of salus, health, allied to salus, sound, in good health, whence E. safe; see Safe. Der. salubrious-ly. Also salubri-ty, Minsheu, from F. salubrité (Cot.), = Lat. acc. salubritatem.

SALUTARY, healthful, wholesome. (F., - L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. - F. salutaire, 'healthful;' Cot. - Lat. salutaris, healthful. - Lat. salut-, stem of salus, health, allied to saluus; see SALUTE, to wish health to, to greet. (L.) In Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 30; and in Palsgrave. - Lat. salutare, to wish health to, greet. -Lat. salut-, stem of salus, health, allied to saluus; see Safe.

β. It has been conjectured color before the salutation, M.E. salutacioun, Wyclif, Luke, i. 41, from F. salutation oleap; which well accords In any case, we may prob.

 SALVAGE, money paid for saving ships. (F., -L.) In Blount's

Gloss., ed. 1674. – O. F. salvage; 'droict de salvage, a tenth part of goods which were like to perish by shipwrack, due unto him who saves them; Cot. - O. F. salver, F. sauver, to save. - Lat. saluare; see Save.

SALVATION, preservation. (F., -L.) M. E. saluacioun, saluacion, Chaucer, C. T. 7080; spelt sauuacion, Ancren Riwle, p. 242, l. 26. - F. salvation. - Lat. saluationem, acc. of saluatio, a saving. - Lat.

Der. salve, verb, from A.S. sealfian, cognate with Goth. salbon.

SALVER, a plate on which anything is presented. (Span., -L.) Properly salva, but misspelt salver by confusion with the old word salver in the sense of 'preserver,' or one who claims salvage for shipping. This is shewn by the following. 'Salver, from salvo, to save, is a new fashioned piece of wrought plate, broad and flat, with a foot underneath, and is used in giving beer, or other liquid thing, to save or preserve the carpit or clothes from drops;' Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. This invented explanation, oddly enough, does not affect the etymology. - Span. salva, a salver, a plate on which anything is presented; it also means 'pregustation, the previous tasting of viads before they are served up.' There is also the phrase hacer la salva, 'to drink to one's health;' Neuman. We also find the dimin. salvilla, a salver. - Span. salvar, 'to save, free from risk; to taste, to prove the food or drink of nobles;' Neuman. - Lat. salvare, to save; ¶ Mr. Wedgwood says: 'as salva was the see Save, Safe. tasting of meat at a great man's table, salvar, to guarantee, to taste or make the essay of meat served at table, the name of salver is in all probability from the article having been used in connection with the essay. The Ital. name of the essay was credenza, and the same term was used for a cupboard or sideboard; credentiere, credenzere, a prince's taster, cup-hearer, butler, or cupboard-keeper (Florio). F. credence d'argent, silver plate, or a cupboard of silver plate; 'Cot. Thus a salver was the name of the plate or tray on which drink was presented to the taster, or to the drinker of a health.

SAME, of the like kind, identical. (E.) M. E. same, Chaucer, C. T. 16923. - A. S. same, only as adv., as in swá same swá men, the same as men, just like men; Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, c. xxxiii. § 4 (bk. iii. met. 9). The adjectival use is Scand.; cf. Icel. samr, Dan. and Swed. samme, the same. + O. H. G. sam, adj., sama, adv. + Goth. sama, the same; cf. samana, together, + Russ. samui, the same, + Gk. δμόs. + Skt. sama, even, the same. β. The form SAMA is extended from a base SA, meaning together, like, same with; cf. Skt. sa, with, in compound nouns, as in sa-kamala, adj. with lotus flowers; also the same, like, equal, as in sa-dharman, adj. of the same caste; Benfey, p. 981. Y. From the same base is the prep. SAM, with, appearing in Skt. sam, with (Vedic); also the Lat. simul, together, similis, like (whence E. Simultaneous, Similar); also Gk. oµoîos, like (whence E. Homosopathy). See Curtius, i. 400. SAMITE, a rich silk stuff. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) M. E. samit, spelt samyte, Ly beaus Disconus, 833 (cd. Ritson, vol. ii); King Alisaunder, 1027. And see two examples in Halliwell, who explains it by 'a very rich silk stuff, sometimes interwoven with gold or silver thread.' -O.F. samit, a silk stuff; Burguy. See samy in Cotgrave - Low Lat. examitum, samite; Ducange. - Late Gk. εξάμιτον, cited by Burguy, supposed to have been a stuff woven with six threads or different kinds of thread; from Gk. 4c, six (cognate with E. six), and μίτος, a thread of the woof. See Dimity, which is a word of similar origin. The mod. G. sammet, sammt, velvet, is the same word.

SAMPHIRE, the name of a herb. (F., -L. and Gk.) sampire in K. Lear, iv. 6. 15; and in Minsheu, ed. 1627; and this is a more correct spelling, representing a former pronunciation. So also Sherwood, in his index to Cograve, who gives herbe de S. Pierre as a F. equivalent. Spelt sampier in Baret (1580), which is still better. — F. Saint Pierre, St. Peter; Cotgrave, s. v. herbe, gives: 'Herbe de S. Pierre, sampire.' - Lat. sanctum, acc. of sanctus, holy; and Petrum, acc. of Petrus, Peter, named from Gk. πέτρα, a rock, SANATORY, healthful. (L.) Not in Todd's Johnson. Phillips has the allied word sanative, used of medicinal waters, now nearly obsolete. All from the Teut. type SANDA; Fick, iii. 319. SANDAL, a kind of shoe. (F., -L., -Gk.) M. E. sandalies, pl., Wyclif, Mark, vi. q. - F. sandale, 'a sandall, or sendall;' Cot. - Lat, sandalium. - Gk. σανδάλιον, dimin. of σάνδαλον (Æolic σαμβάλον), a wooden sole bound on to the foot with straps, a sandal. SANGUINE, ardent, hopeful. (F., -I.) The use of the word is due to the old belief in the 'four humours,' of which blood was one; the excess of this humour rendered people of a hopeful 'temperament 'or 'complexion.' M. E. sanguin; 'Of his complexion he was sanguin;' Chaucer, C. T. 335. — F. sanguin, 'sanguine, bloody, of a sanguine complexion;' Cot. — Lat. sanguineum, acc. of sanguineus, bloody. - Lat. sanguin-, stem of sanguis, blood. Root uncertain. In this sense, it is opposed to the Prakrit (Skt. prákrita), "common," "natural," the name given to the vulgar dialects which gradually arose out of it, and from which most of the languages now spoken in upper India are more or less directly derived; Monier Williams, Skt. Only in the phr. 'Sardonic laugh' or 'Sardonic smile.' In Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674, it is a 'Sardonian laughter.' So also 'Sardonian smile;' Spenser, F. Q. v. 9. 12. - F. sardonique, used in the 16th cent. (Littré); but usually sardonien. Cotgrave has: 'ris sardonien, a forced or causelesse mirth.'-Lat. The Span. zarza means 'bramble,' and is supposed to be of Basque origin, from Basque sartzia, a bramble; see Larramendi's Dict., p. 506. γ. The origin of the latter part of the name is unknown; it has been supposed that parilla stands for parrilla, a possible dimin. of parra, a vine trained against stakes or against a wall. Others have imagined a physician Parillo for it to be named after. SARSNET; see Sarcenet.

SASH (1), a case or frame for panes of glass. (F., - L.) 'A Jezebel . . . appears constantly dressed at her sash; 'Spectator, no. 175 (A.D. 1711). Extended from O. F. chasse (F. chasse), a shrine. - Lat. capsa, a box, case; see Chase (3), Case (2).

BASH (2), a scarf, band. (Pers.) Formerly spelt shash, with the sense of turban. 'His head was wreathed with a huge shash or tulipant [turban] of silk and gold; 'Sir T. Herbert, Travels, 1638, p. 191; cited in Trench, Select Glossary. 'So much for the silk in Judzea, called shesh in Hebrew, whence haply that fine linen or silk is called shashes, worn at this day about the heads of Eastern people; Fuller, Pisgah Sight of Palestine, b. ii. c. 14, § 24. But it does not seem to be a Hebrew word. Trench, in his Eng. Past and Present, calls it a Turkish word; which is also not the case. The solution is, that the word is Persian.—Pers. shast, 'a thumb-stall worn by archers, ... a girdle worn by the Magi,' &c., Rich. Dict. p. 891. In Vullers' Pers. Dict. ii. 425, 426, we find: shest, a thumb, archer's thumb-ring (to guard the thumb in shooting), a fish-hook, plectrum, fiddle-string, scalpel; also 'cingulum idolatrorum et igniscultorum,' i.e. a girdle worn by idolaters and fire-worshippers, thus accounting for our sask. Span. sassifragia, the herb saxifrage (Minsheu); we find also Span. salsafras, salsifrax, salsi-

The same virtue was attributed to sassafras as to saxifrage, of breaking up the stone in the bladder; Wedgwood. See Saxifrage. BATAN, the devil. (Heb.) Lit. 'the enemy.' Called Sathanas in Wyclif, Rev. xii. 9; spelt Satanas in the Vulgate; and Zaravas in the Greek. - Heb. sátán, an enemy, Satan; from the root sátan (with above. - Gk. sapso-, crude form of saps, flesh (see Sarcasm); and a substitute for satiate in a participial sense, and the verb was then evolved. The abbreviation would be assisted by the known use of Lat. sat for satis, and by the O. F. satisfier for satisfier, to-satisfy; see Roquefort. Cf. 'That satisfier yet unsatisfied desire;' Cymb. i. 6. 48. Or sate may have been suggested by Lat. satur, full. It comes to much the same thing. - Lat. satiatus, pp. of satiare, to sate, satiate, fill full. Cf. Lat, satur, full; sat, satis, sufficient. All from a base SAT, signifying 'full' or filled; whence also E. sad; see Sad. Der. satiation; satisfied, from F. satieté, 'satiety, fulnesse,' Cot., from Lat. satietatem, acc. of satietas. Also sat-is-fy, q.v.; sat-ire, q.v., sat-ur-ate, q.v., soil (3), q.v.

one retained to guard a man's person, a yeoman of the guard, sergeant, catchpoll; Blount, ed. 1674. - F. satellite, 'a sergeant, catchpole, or yeoman of the guard; Cot. - Lat. satellitem, acc. of satelles,

Extended from Lat. seta, a bristle; we find the Low Lat. seta in the sense of silk (Ducange); also Ital. seta, 'any kind of silke,' Florio. β. Similarly Span. pelo, hair, also means fibre of plants, thread of wool or silk, &c.; and the Lat. seta was used of the human hair as well as of the bristles of an animal; see Diez. Root unknown. Der. satin-et, satin-y, satin-wood.

SATIRE, a ridiculing of vice or folly. (F., -L.) In Shak. Much Ado, v. 4. 103. - F. satire; Cotgrave has: 'Satyre, a satyr, an invective or vice-rebuking poem.' - Lat. satira, also satura, satire, a species of poetry orig. dramatic and afterwards didactic, peculiar to the Romans (White). β. It is said that the word meant 'a medley, and is derived from satura lanz, a full dish, a dish filled with mixed ingredients; satura being the fem. of satur, full, akin to satis, enough, and to satiare, to satiate; see Sate. Der. satir-ic-al, spelt saturicall, Skelton, ed. Dyce, i. 130, l. 139; satir-ise, satir-ist.

SATISFY, to supply or please fully. (F., - L.) 'Not al so satisfide;' Spenser, F. Q. i. 5. 15. 'I satysfye, I content, or suffyce, Ie satisfie;' Palsgrave. - O. F. satisfier, to satisfy (as in Palsgrave); afterwards displaced by satisfaire; see Littré. Formed as it from a Low Lat. satisficare*, substituted for Lat. satisfacere, to satisfy. - Lat. satis, enough; and facere, to make. See Sate and Fact. satisfact-ion, M. E. satisfaccioun, Wyclif, 1 Pet. iii. 15, from F. satisfaction, 'satisfaction,' Cot.; satisfact-or-y, from F. satisfactoire, 'satisfactory,' Cot.; satisfact-or-i-ly, -ness.

SATRAP, a Persian viceroy. (F., - L., - Gk., - Pers.) Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. [We find M. E. satraper, Allit. Romance of Alexander, 1913, 1937.] — F. satrape, 'a great ruler;' Cot.—Lat. satrapam, acc. of satrapes; we also find nom. satraps (acc. satrapem). -Gk. σατράπης, the title of a Persian viceroy or governor of a province. β. Certainly an O. Pers. word. Littré, citing Burnouf (Yaçna, p. 545), compares the Gk. pl. εξαιθραπεύοντες, found in inscriptions (Liddell and Scott give the form ¿farpánns), and the Heb. pl. achashdarpnim, satraps. He proceeds to give the derivation from the Zend shôithrapaiti, ruler of a region, from shôithra, a region, and paiti, a chief. Of these words, the former is the same as Skt. kshetra. a field. region, landed property (Bensey, p. 240); and the latter is Skt. pati, a master, lord (id. p. 506). Fick gives the Zend words; i. 305, 306. SATURATE, to fill to excess. (L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. Lat. saturatus, pp. of saturare, to fill full. - Lat. satur, full; allied to satis, enough; see Sate. Der. satur-at-ion; satur-able.

SATURDAY, the seventh day of the week. (E.) M. E. Sater-day, P. Plowman, B. v. 14, 367. — A.S. Sater-dag, Luke, xxiii, 54; also spelt Sætern-dæg, Exod. xvi. 23; Sæternes dæg, rubric to Matt. xvi. 28, xx. 29. The name Sæter or Sætern is borrowed from Lat. Saturnus, Saturn; cf. Lat. Saturni dies, Saturday; Du. zaturdag, Saturday. See Saturnine.

SATURNINE, gloomy of temperament. (F.,-L.) 'Saturnine, of the nature of Saturn, i. e. sterne, sad, melancholy;' Minsheu. -O. F. Saturnin, a form noticed by Minsheu; and Littré has saturnin as a medical term, with the sense of 'relating to lead;' lead being a symbol of Saturn. The more usual form is F. Saturnien, 'sad, sowre, lumpish, melancholy; 'Cot. Both adjectives are from Lat. Saturnus, the god Saturn, also the planet Saturn. B. The peculiar sense is due to the supposed evil influence of the planet Saturn in astrology; see Chaucer, C. T. 2455-2471.

y. Saturnus meant 'the sower;' from satum, supine of serere, to sow; see Season. Der. (from Saturnus) Saturn-alia, s. pl., the festival of Saturn, a time of license and unrestrained enjoyment; Saturn-ian, pertaining to the golden age of Saturn, Pope, Dunciad, i. 28, iii. 320, iv. 16. Also Neckam, in Wright's Vocab. 1. 98, 1. 5; sauce, verb, to give a relish to, often used ironically, as in As You Like It, iii. 5. 69; sauc-y, i.e. full of salt, pungent, Twelfth Nt. iii. 4. 159; sauc-i-ly, K. Lear, i. 1. 22, ii. 4. 41; sauc-i-ness, Com. Errors, ii. 2. 28. Also saus-age, q. v. SAUNTER, to lounge. (Unknown.) 'By sauntering still on some adventure;' Hudibras, pt. iii. c. 1. 1. 1343 (ed. Bell, ii. 111). Not in early use. We find however, in the Romance of Partenay, ed. Skeat, l. 4653, that Geoffrey 'santred and doubted,' i. e. hesitated and doubted as to whether he was of the lineage of Presine. Unfortutunately this is not a very sure instance, as the MS might be read as sautred, or even as fautred. Still it deserves to be noted. In the dialect of Cumberland the word is santer. 'Santer, saunter; [also], an oald wife santer = an unauthenticated tradition; Dickinson's Cumberland Glossary. \(\beta\). No satisfactory account of this word has ever been given. Mr. Wedgwood thinks an \(lambda\) has been lost; cf. Icel. \(slentr\), idle lounging, \(slent\), sloth; Dan. \(slentr\), to saunter, lounge about, \(slentr\), slunte, to idle; Swed. \(slentr\), to saunter, loite; \(slentr\). a lubber, slunta, to loiter, idle. y. Or from Icel. seint, slowly, orig. neut. of seinn, slow; as in fara seint, to go at a slow pace. So also Dan. seent, Norw. seint, Swed. sent, slowly; Icel. seinka, Dan. sinke, O. Swed. sänka, to tarry. The adj. is Icel. seinn, Dan. seen, Swed. sen, A. S. scene, slow.

8. Perhaps it is worth while to note O. Du. swancken, swanckelen, 'to reele, to stagger,' Hexham; G. schwanken, to reel, vacillate, waver; schwanken in seinen antworten, to falter in one's answers. Certainly the prov. E. swankum, 'to walk to and fro in an idle and careless manner,' Somersetsh. (Halliwell), is related to these words; so also swanky, swaggering, strutting, Wilts. Taking -er to be the usual frequentative ending, a change from swanker to swanter or (with loss of w) saunter is not incompatible with E. phonetics. These words are related to G. schwank, flexible, wavering, O. H. G. swankel, swank, wavering, derived from O. H. G. swingen, to swing. See Swing, Swagger. ¶ In any case, we may safely reject such wild guesses as a derivation from F. sainte terre (because men saunter if they visit the Holy Land!), or from F. sans terre (because people saunter who are not possessed of landed property!!); yet these puerilities will long continue to be accepted by the inexperienced. Der. saunter-er.

Florio has Ital. saio, 'a long side coate,' and saietta, 'a kind of fine serge or cloth for coates; it is also called rask.' Neumann has Span. saya, sayo, a tunic; sayete, a thin light stuff. β. The stuff say was so called because used for making a kind of coat or tunic called in Lat. saga, sagum, or sagus; cf. Low Lat. sagum (1), a mantle, (2) a kind of cloth (Ducange). – Gk. σάγος, a coarse cloak, a soldier's mantle; cf. σαγή or σάγη, harness, armour, σάγμα, a pack-saddle, also a covering, a large cloak. These Gk. words are not of Celtic origin, as has been said, but allied to Skt. saij, sajj, to adhere, be attached, hang from; see Benfey, p. 996. SAY (3), to try, assay. (F., = L., = Gk.) In Pericles, i. 1. 59; as a sb., in K. Lear, v. 3. 143. Merely an abbreviation of Assay or Essay; see Essay.

SCAB, a crust over a sore. (E.) M. E. scab, Chaucer, C. T. 12292. – A. S. scab, sceb, A. S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, i. 150, l. 5; i. 316, l. 22; i. 322, l. 17. + Dan. and Swed. skab. + G. schabe, a wood louse, moth; also scab, itch, shaving tool, grater.

B. The lit. sense is 'itch;' something that is scratched; cf. Lat. scabies, scab, itch, from scabere, to scratch. From the Teut. base SKAB, to scratch, whence mod. E. shave; see Shave. Der. scabb-ed, scabb-y, Glouc. p. 273, l. 17; and scaubert stands for scauberk, by the not uncommon change from k to t, as in O. Fries. matia = A. S. macian, to make. In Prompt. Parv. p. 443, we find all three forms, scauberk, scaubert, scauberd. The form scauberk also appears as scaberke (Trevisa, v. 373, Stratmann); and is weakened to scaberge, Romance of Partenay, 2790.

B. Scauberk is obviously, like hauberk, a French word of Teutonic origin; but it does not appear in O. French texts; except that Wedgwood cites vaginas, glossed by O. F. escaubers, from Johannes de Garlandia. We may easily see, however, that the termination -berk is from the Teutonic word appearing in G. bergen, O. H. G. bergan, to protect, hide. This is made doubly certain by noticing that the O. F. halberc or hauberc, a hauberk, is also spelt haubert, just as scauberk is also scaubert; and corresponding to the form scaberge we have haberge-on.

7. It remains to discuss the former syllable; we should expect to find an O.F. scalberc* or escalberc*. The prefix appears to answer to O.F. escale, mod. F. écale, écaille, a shell, scale, husk, derived from O. H. G. scala, G. 8. Now G. schale means a shell, peel, husk, rind, scale, outside, scull, cover of a book, haft (of a knife), bowl, vase. In composition schal means cover or outside; as in schalbrett, outside plank (of a tree), schalholz, outside of a tree cut into planks, schalwerk, a lining of planks. Cf. schalen, to plank, inlay; messer schalen, to haft knives.

• The prob. sense is 'shell-protection,' or 'covercover; it is one of those numerous reduplicated words in which the latter half repeats the sense of the former. The notion of putting a knife into a haft is much the same as that of putting a sword into a 3. Similarly, the Icel. skálpr, O. Swed. skalp, a scabbard, appears to be from Icel. skál, a scale, bowl. See Scalp. And I conclude that scabbard = scale-berk, with the reduplicated sense of 'cover-cover.' See Scale and Hauberk.

SCAFFOLD, a temporary platform. (F., -L., and Teut.) M.E. scaffold, scafold, Chaucer, C. T. 2533, 3384. -O. F. escafalt*, only found as escafaut, mod. F. echafaud. A still older form must have been escadafalt (Burguy), corresponding to Span. catafalco, a funeral canopy over a bier, Ital. catafalco, a funeral canopy, stage, scaffold (whence mod. F. catafalque). β . The word is a hybrid one; the orig. sense is 'a stage for seeing,' or 'a stage on which a thing is displayed to view,' lit. a 'view-balk.' The former part of the word appears in O. Span. catar, to observe, see, behold, look (Minsheu), from Lat. captare, to strive after, watch, observe; and the latter part is put for balco, as in Ital. balco, a scaffold, stage, theatre (whence E. balcony), which is of Teut. origin. See Catch and Balcony, Balk.

y. See further in Diez; cata- appears also in Ital. cataletto, a bier, lit. 'view-bed;' cf. Parmese and Venetian catar, to find; Span. cata, look! see! Der. scaffold, verb; scaffold-ing. Balk.

SCALD (1), to burn with a hot liquid, to burn. (F., = L.) M. E. scalden, pp. yscalded, Chaucer, C. T. Six-text, A. 2020; Tyrwhitt (1. 2022) reads yskalled, but the 6 best MSS. have yscalded. 'Schaldinde water, scalding water; Ancren Riwle, p. 246, l. 3. O. F. escalder * later form eschauder, 'to scald;' Cot. Mod. F. échauder. - Lat. excaldare, to wash in hot water. - Lat. ex, out, very; and caldus, hot, contracted form of calidus, hot, from caldere, to be hot. Ex- and Caldron. Der. scald, sb.

SCAID (2), scabby. (Scand.) In Shak. Hen. V, v. 1. 5. Contracted form of scalled, i.e. afflicted with the scall; see Scall. M. E. scalled, Chaucer, C. T. 629. Cf. Dan. skaldet, bald.

SCALD (3), a Scandinavian poet. (Scand.) M. E. scald, Ormulum, 2192.—Icel. skáld, a poet. The orig. sense seems to be 'loud talker;' see Scold.

SCALE (1), a shell, small thin plate or flake on a fish, flake. (E.) M. E. scale; 'fisshes scales,' Gower, C. A. i. 275, l. 22, ii. 265, l. 18 scale (or shale), the shell of a nut, P. Plowman, C. xiii. 145, and footnote. - A. S. sceale, scale, pl. scealu, a shell or husk, in a gloss (Leo); whence beán-sceale, a husk of a bean (id.). + Dan. and Swed. skal, a shell, pod, husk. + G. schale, O. H. G. schala, a shell, husk. C. Goth. skalja, a tile.

$\beta$. The E. word may have been mixed up with O. F. escale (mod. F. écale); but this is the same word, borrowed from O. H. escale (mod. F. escale); but this is the same word, borrowed from O. H. G. scala.

Y. All from Teut. base SKALA, Fick, iii. 334, lit. 'a flake,' that which can be peeled off; from Teut. base SKAL, to separate, peel off, whence also E. skill; see Skill. Der. scale, verb; scal-ed, scal-y, scal-i-ness. Allied to Scale (2), Shell, Scall, Scull, Skill. And see scall-op, scal-p. Doublet, skale.

SCALE (2), a bowl or dish of a balace. (E.) M. E. skale, stale, (also scale), a bowl. Average Bisher.

schale (also scoale), a bowl, Ancren Riwle, p. 214, note i; scale, Layamon, 5368.—A.S. scale, a scale of a balance; 'Lanx, scale; Bilances, twa scale (two scales); Wright's Vocab. i. 38, col. 2. The pl. sceála, bowls, is in Diplomatarium Ævi Saxonici, ed. Thorpe, p. 429, l. 30. β. The A.S. word scale (with long a) ought rather to have given an E. form scole (cf. M. E. scoale above); but it Baret (1580). Scabbard is a corruption of M. E. scaubert, Rob. of croot, and a mere variant. And in fact, the word scale, though rare, occurs: 'Lanx, the scole of a balance,' Nomenclator, 1:85 (Nares, ed. Wright and Halliwell). 'Then Jove his golden scoles weighed up; Chapman, tr. of Homer, b. xxii, l. 180. y. The long a is supported by Icel. skál, a bowl, scale of a balance; Dan. skaal, Swed. skál, a bowl, cup; Du. schaal, a scale, bowl. Cf. G. schale, a cup, dish, bowl. All from Teut. base SKÅLA, Fick, iii. 334; allied to Scale (1).

SCALE (3), a ladder, series of steps, graduated measure, gradation. (L.) M. E. seale, spelt skale, Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, dation. (L.) M. E. scale, spelt skale, Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, pt. i. § 12. Borrowed immediately from Lat. scala, usually in pl. scalæ, a flight of steps, ladder. (Hence also F. échelle.) B. Perhaps Lat. scā-la = scad-la or scand-la, that by which one ascends or descends; cf. Lat. scandere, to climb; see Scan. Der. scale, verb, to climb by a ladder; Surrey translates 'Hærent parietibus scalæ, postesque sub ipso Nituntur gradibus' (Aneid, ii. 442) by 'And rered vp ladders against the walles, Under the windowes scaling by their steppes;'

SCALENE, having three unequal sides, said of a triangle. (L., -Gk.) Phillips, ed. 1706, has: 'Scalenum, or Scalenous Triangle.'-Lat. sealenus, adj. – Gk. σκαληνός, scalene, uneven. Allied to σκολιός, crooked, σκελλός, crook-legged, σκέλος, a leg. The orig. sense is 'jumping,' hence, halting, uneven. – SKAR, to jump; whence σκαίρειν, to skip. See Shallow.

SCALL, a scab, scabbiness, eruption on the skin. (Scand.) Levit. xiii. 30. 'Maist thou have the skalle;' Chaucer, Lines to Adam Scrivener. Gen. used with ref. to the head. 'On his heued he has the skalle;' Cursor Mundi, 11819.—Icel. skalli, a bare head. The lit. sense is 'having a peeled head;' cf. Swed. skallig, bald, skala, to peel, so that the word is nearly related to Dan. and Swed.

skal, a husk; see Scale. Der. scald (2), q. v.

SCALLOP, SCOLLOP, a bi-valvular shell-fish, with the edge of its shell in a waved form. (F., — Teut.) Holland's Pliny, b. ix. c. 33, treats 'Of Scallops.' M. E. skalop (with one l), Prompt. Parv., p. 442.—O. F. escalope, a shell; a word used by Rutebuef; see quotation in Littré, under escalope, a term in cookery.

B. Of Teut. origin; cf. O. Du. schelpe (Du. schelp), a shell; Hexham. Hexham has also; 'S. Iacobs schelpe, S. James his shell;' and the shell worn by pilgrims who had been to St. James's shrine was of the kind which we call 'a seallop-shell;' Chambers, Book of Days, ii. 121. Thus Palsgrave has: 'scaloppe-shell, quocquille de saint Iacques.' Cf. G. schelfe, a husk. \(\gamma\). The forms schel-pe, schel-fe are extensions from the word which appears in E. as scale or shell; see Scale (1), Shell. Der. scallop, verb, to cut an edge into waves or scallop-like curves. And see Scalp.

SCALP, the skin of the head on which the hair grows. G.) 'Her scalpe, taken out of the charnel-house;' Sir T. More, p. 57 a. M. E. scalp. 'And his wiknes in his scalp doune falle;' Early Eng. Psalter, ed. Stevenson, vii. 17; where scalp means the top of the head, Lat. uertex. Evidently an O. Low G. word, due to the very form whence we also have O. Du. schelpe, a shell, and O. F. escalope, a shell; see Scallop.

3. Thus scalp and scallop are doublets; the inserted o is a F. peculiarity, due to the difficulty which the French would find in pronouncing the word; just as they prefixed e, on account of their difficulty in sounding initial sc. We may further compare O. Swed. skalp, a sheath, Icel. skalpr, a sheath. γ. The orig. sense is shell or scull (head-shell); and the word is a mere extension of that which appears in E. as scale; see Scale (1). Florio has O. Ital. scalpo della testa, 'the skalp of ones head;' this is merely borrowed from Teutonic. Der. scalp, verb; which may have been confused with Lat. scalpere (see Scalpel). SCALPEL, a small surgeon's knife for dissecting. (L.) Phillips, ed. 1706, has scalper or scalping-iron; Todd's Johnson has scalpel. Scalpel is from Lat. scalpellum, a scalpel; dimin. of scalprum or scalper, a knife.—Lat. scalpere, to cut, carve, scratch, engrave; (whence E. scalping-iron).— SKARP, to cut (Fick, iii. 811); whence also E. Sharp, q.v.

SCAMBLE; see Scamper.

SCAMMONY, a cathartic gum-resin. (F., -L., -Gk.) Spelt scamony in Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 164, l. 16. - O.F. scammonie, scammonée, 'scammony, purging bind-weed;' Cot. - Lat. scammonia, scammonea. - Gk. σκαμμωνία, or rather σκαμωνία, scammony, a kind of bind-weed. It grows in Mysia, Colophon, and Priene, in Asia Minor; Pliny, b. xxvi. c. 8.

SCAMP; see Scamper. SCAMPER, to run with speed, flee away. (F.,-Ital.,-L.) 'We were forc'd to . . . scamper away as well as we could;' Dampier's Voyages, an. 1685 (R.) The suffix -er is, as usual, feeting the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the supplier of the s quentative, so that the orig. form is scamp; but this is only found as rather to have given an E. form scole (cf. M. E. scoals above); but it | a sb. in the sense of worthless fellow, or 'cheat,' though the orig: was readily confused with the word above, which is from the same meaning is merely 'fugitive' or 'vagabond,' one given to frequent shifts or decumpings. = O. F. escamper, or rather s'escamper, 'to scape, Eruites of Warre, st. 40, and st. 90; M. E. sear, Wyclif, Lev. xxii. 22. flie; 'Cot. = Ital. scampare, 'to escape, to shift away; 'Florio. = Lat. | O. F. escare, 'a skar or scab; 'Cot. Cf. Span. and Ital. escara, scar, car, flie; 'Cot. - Ital. scampare, 'to escape, to shift away;' Florio. - Lat. ex, out; and campus, a field, esp. a field of battle. A parallel formation to decamp, q.v. See Ex- and Camp. Der. scamper, sb. A similar form is scamble, to struggle, K. John, iv. 3. 146, put for scamp-le, a parallel frequentative form from the same base. Cf. Du.

ackampelen, to stumble, trip (Hexham), from schampen, to escape (id.), a word of Romance origin. See Shamble.

SCAN, to count the measures in a poem, to scrutinise. (F., =L.; or L.) In Shak. Oth. iii. 3. 245; Skelton, Bowge of Court, 245. In common use in the pp., which was frequently spelt scand, as in Spenser, F. Q. vii. 6. 8, where it is used in the sense of 'climbed.' The verb should rather have been scand, but the pp. was formed as scand (for scanded), and then the final d was taken to be the pp. termination, and was accordingly dropped. - O. F. escander, to climb (Roquefort); whence the use of the verb as in Spenser. [Or, in the grammatical sense particularly, derived directly from Latin.]—Lat. seandere, to climb; also, to scan a verse.— SKAND, SKAD, to spring upwards; Skt. skand, to spring, ascend. Der. scans-ion, formed (by analogy) from Lat. scansio, a scanning, from the pp. Also scans-or-i-al, formed for climbing, from scansorius, scansus. belonging to climbing. From the same root, a-scend, a-scent, de-scend, de-scent, con-de-scend, tran-scend; perhaps scale (3), e-sca-lade.

SCANDAL, opprobrious censure, disgrace, offence. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) M. E. scandal; spelt scandle, Ancren Riwle, p. 12, l. 12. - F. scandale, 'a scandall, offence;' Cot. We also find O. F. escandle (Burguy); whence M. E. scandle. - Lat. scandalum. - Gk. σκάνδαλον, a snare; also scandal, offence, stumbling-block. The orig. sense seems to be that of σκανδάληθρον also, viz. the spring of a trap, the stick on a trap on which the bait was placed, which sprang up and shut the trap. Prob. from SKAND, to spring up; see Scan. Der. scandal-ise, from F. scandaliser, formerly scandalizer, 'to scandalize,' Cot. Also scandal-ous, from F. scandaleux, 'scandalous, offensive.' Cot.; scandal-ous-ly, -ness. Doublet, slander.

SCANSION, SCANSORIAL; see Scan.

SCANT, insufficient, sparing, very little. (Scand.) M. E. scant, Prompt. Parv. Chaucer speaks of 'the inordinate scantnesse' of clothing; Pers. Tale, De Superbia (Six-text, I. 414).—Icel. skamt, neut. of skammr, short, brief; whence skamta, to dole out, apportion meals (and so, to scant or stint). Cf. also Icel. skamtr, sb., a dole, share, portion (hence, short or scant measure). In Norwegian, the mt changes to nt, so that we find skantat, pp. measured or doled out, skanta, to measure narrowly, reckon closely; skant, a portion, dole, piece measured off (Aasen). The m is preserved in the phrase to seamp work, i.e. to do it insufficiently, and in the prov. E. skimping, scanty (Halliwell).

B. Fick (iii. 332) cites a cognate O. H. G. scam, short. Der. scant, adv., Romeo, i. 2. 104; scant, verb, Merch. Ven. ii. 1. 17; scant-ly, Antony, iii. 4. 6; scant-y, β. Fick (iii. 332) cites a cognate scant-i-ly, scant-i-ness..

SCANTLING, a piece of timber cut of a small size, sample, pattern. (F., - Teut.; with L. prefix.) The word has doubtless been confused with scant and scanty; but the old sense is 'pattern,' or 'sample,' or a small piece; with reference to the old word cantle. As used in Shak. (Troil. i. 3. 341) and in Cotgrave, it is certainly a derivative of O. F. eschanteler, and answers to O. F. eschantillon, 'a small cantle or corner-piece, also a scantling, sample, pattern, proof of any sort of merchandise; 'Cot. - O. F. escanteler *, older form of eschanteler, 'to break into cantles,' to cut up into small pieces; Cotgrave, Burguy. - O. F. es-, prefix, from Lat. ex, out; and O. F. cantel (Burguy), a cantle, corner, piece, later chantel, chanteau, a corner-piece, or piece broken off from the corner; Cot. Hence E. cantle, scantle, 1 Hen. IV, iii. 1. 100.

B. F. cantel is a dimin. of a form cant *, from G. kante, a corner; see Cant (2). M. E. scantilon, a measure, Cursor Mundi, 2231.

SCAPEGOAT, a goat allowed to escape into the wilderness. (F.,-L.; and E.) Levit. xvi. 8. From scape and goat; scape being a mutilated form of escape, in common use; see Temp. ii. 2. 117, &c. See Escape and Goat. So also scape-grace, one who has escaped grace or is out of favour, a graceless fellow.

SCAPULAR, belonging to the shoulder-blades. (L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. [He also gives it as a sb., equivalent to the word generally spelt scapulary; see below.] - Low Lat. scapularis, adj. formed from Lat. pl. scapula, the shoulder-blades, from a sing. scapula, not in use. β. Prob. allied to Lat. scapus, a shaft, stem, shank, stalk; and to Sceptre. Der. scapular-y, spelt scapularis in Minsheu, a kind of scarf worn by friars and others, so called from passing over the shoulders; M. E. scaplorye, scapelary, Prompt. Parv., chapolory, P. Plowman's Crede, l. 550; from F. scapulaire, Low Lat.

scurf, crust. - Lat. eschara, a scar, esp. one produced by a burn. - Gk. ἐσχάρα, a hearth, fire-place, grate for a fire, brazier, scar of a burn.

Root uncertain. Der. scar, verb, Rich. III, v. 5. 23.

SCAR (2), SCAUR, a rock. (Scand.) M. E. scarre, Wyclif, 1 Kings, xiv. 5; sherre (Halliwell); Lowland Sc. scar, scaur (Jamieson); Orkney skerry, a rock in the sea (id.) - Icel. sker, a skerry, isolated rock in the sea; Dan. skiær, Swed. skär. Cf. Icel. skor, a rift in a rock. So called because 'cut off' from the main land; allied to

E. Share, q.v. Doublet, share; and cf. score.

SCARAMOUCH, a buffoon. (F.,—Ital.,—Teut.) 'Scaramouch and Harlequin at Paris;' Dryden, Kind Keeper, A. i. sc. 1. 'Th' Italian merry-andrews took their place... Stout Scaramoucha with rush lance rode in; Dryden, Epilogue to Silent Woman, spoken by Mr. Hart, ll. 11-15. 'Scaramoche, a famous Italian zani, or mountebank, who acted here in England 1673; Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. Blount, writing at the time, is certainly right. The name was taken from a famous Italian buffoon, mentioned again in the Spectator, no. 283. He died at Paris in 1694; Chambers, Book of Days, ii. 671. His name was (rightly) Scaramuccia, altered by Dryden to Scaramoucha, and in French to Scaramouchs (Littré). - F. scaramouche. -Ital. Scaramuccia, proper name; lit. 'a skirmish,' a word derived from Teutonic; see Skirmish.

SCARCE, rare, not plentiful. (F., - L.) M. E. scars, Rob. of Glouc. p. 334, l. 9. Chaucer has the adv. scarsly, C. T. 585.—O. F. escars (Burguy), later eschars, 'scarce, needy, scanty, saving, niggard,' Cot. Cf. Ital. scarso, scarce; mod. F. échars (Littré).

B. Derived by Diez from Low Lat. scarpsus, shorter form of excarpsus, used A.D. 805 as a substitute for Lat. excerptus, pp. of excerpere, (prob. also excarpere in Low Latin), to pick out, select, extract. The lit. sense is selected, extracted, or picked out, hence 'select,' and so scarce; and Diez remarks that excarpsus is found just with the sense of Ital. scarso. - Lat. ex, out; and carpere, to pluck, allied to E. harvest. See scarso. - Lat. ex, out; and carpere, to pluck, ained to E. narvest. See Excerpt; also Ex- and Harvest. Der. scarce-ly, M. E. scarse-liche, K. Alisaunder, 3552; scarce-ness, Deut. viii. 9, M. E. scarsesse, Gower, C. A. ii. 284; scarc-i-ty, M. E. scarseté, K. Alisaunder, 5495, from O. F. escarsete (escharsete in Burguy).

SCARE, to frighten away. (Scand.) M. E. skerren, skeren, Prompt. Parv. p. 457; Destruction of Troy, 13404. Cf. 'the skerre hors' = the scared horse, Ancren Riwle, p. 242, note d. The M. E. verb appears to be formed from the adj. skerre, scared, timid. - Icel. skjarr, shy, timid; skjarrt hross, a shy horse, just like M. E. skerre hors, and Sc. scar, skair, timorous (Jamieson). Cf. Icel. skirra, to bar, prevent; reflexive, skirrask, to shun, shrink from; skirrast við, to shrink from. Allied to Du. scheren, to withdraw, go away; G. sich scheren, to withdraw, depart, schere dich weg, get you gone, like E. sheer off!

B. The Du. and G. scheren also means 'to shear;' the orig. sense of shjarr seems to have been 'separate,' keeping to one's self. And I think we may connect it with Share and Shear; and see Sheer (2). Dor. scare-crow, something to scare crows away, Meas. for Meas. ii. 1. 1. SCARF (1), a light piece of dress worn on the shoulders or about the neck. (E.) Spenser has scarfe, F. Q. v. 2. 3. Though it does not appear in M. E., it is an E. word, and the orig. sense is simply a 'shred' or 'scrap,' or piece of stuff. - A. S. scearfe, a fragment, piece, in a gloss (Bosworth); hence the verb scearfian, to shred or scrape, A. S. Leechdoms, i. 70, l. 14. + Du. scherf, a shred. + G. scherbe, a β. All from a base shard, pot-sherd; cf. scharben, to cut small. SCARF, answering to Aryan SKARP, an extension of \checkmark SKAR, to y. The particular sense is cut, as seen in Lat. scalpere, to cut. cut, as seen in Lat. scalpere, to cut. 7. The particular scales, clearly borrowed from that of O. F. escharpe, 'a scarf, baudick;' Cot. This is really the same word; it also meant a scrip for a pilgrim, and is derived from O. Du. scharpe, scharpe, sceppe, a scrip, "Bremp," pilgrin's wallet (Oudemans); Low G. schrap, a scrip (Bremen Wörterbuch). Cf. A. S. sceop, a robe, Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, iv. 4. 3. G. scherbe, a shred; and see Scrip, Scrap. The G. scharpe, a scarf, sash, Swed. skarp, Dan. skjerf, skjærf, are not true Teut. words, but borrowed from French. Der. scarf, verb, Hamlet, v. 2.13; scarf-but borrowed from French. Der. scarf, verb, Hamlet, V. 2.13; scarfskin, the epidermis or outer skin (Phillips). Doublets, scrip, scrap, SCARF (2), to join pieces of timber together. (Scand.) 'In the joining of the stem, where it was scarfed;' Anson's Voyage, b. ii. c.

7 (R.) And in Phillips, ed. 1706. The word is Swedish.—Swed.
skarfva, to join together, piece out.—Swed. skarf, a scarf, seam, joint;
cf. skarfyxa, a chip.axe. An extended form of Dan. skar, appearing in skar-one, an adze, whence skarre, to scarf, join; allied to Icel. skör, a rim, edge, scarf, joint in a ship's planking, and Icel. skara, to jut out, to clinch the planks of a boat so that each plank overlaps the plank below it.

$\beta$. From Icel. skera (pt. t. sker), to shear, cut, shape; from the cutting of the edge. So also Bavarian scharben, to cut a patch in the last of the edge. SCAR (1), the mark of a wound, blemish. (F., - L., - Gk.) to cut a notch in timber, Schmeller, ii. 463; G. scharben, to cut 'Scarre of a wounde, covsture; Palsgrave. Spelt skarre, Gascoigne, small, from the same root; see Shear. scratch open; longer form of scarifare, which also occurs (White). β. Probably not merely cognate with, but absolutely borrowed from Gk. σκαριφάομαι, I scratch or scrape up. Gk. σκάριφος, a style for drawing outlines (a sharp-pointed instrument). From the base SKARBH, extended from ✓ SKAR, to cut; see Shear. Der. scarific-at-ion, from F. scarification (Cot.)

Dict. p. 837. B. The Pers. saglatún is clearly the origin of M. E. ciclatoun, Chaucer, C. T. Group B, l. 1924, on which see my note, and Col. Yule's note to his edition of Marco Polo, i. 249. He remarks that suglat is applied, in the Punjab trade returns, to broadcloth; it was used for banners, ladies' robes, quilts, leggings, housings, and pavilions. We find also Arab. saqarlat, a warm woollen cloth; Rich. Dict. p. 836; also Arab. siqlat, a fine painted or figured cloth. a canopy over a litter. It seems to have been the name of a stuff, which was frequently of a scarlet colour; and hence to have become the name of the colour. So also Telugu sakaláti, sakalátu, woollen or broad-cloth; Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 455. This can hardly be from English, as Wilson suggests, but corresponds to the Pers. and Ital. forms. ¶ The Turkish iskerlat, scarlet, is merely a loan-word from Italian; Zenker, p. 49. Der. scarlet-runner, a climbing plant with scarlet flowers; scarlat-ina, a disease named from the scarlet rash which accompanies it.

SCARP, part of a fortification. (F., - Ital., - Teut.) Formerly written searf, as in Cotgrave, but this is an E. adaptation, by confusion with scarf, which is allied to O.F. escharpe; see Scarf.
Scarp, the inward slope of the moat or ditch of a place; Phillips, ed. 1706. - F. escarpe, 'a scarf, or little wall without the main rampire of a fort;' Cot. - Ital. scarpa, 'a counter-scarfe or curtein of a wall;' Florio. β . So called because cut sharp or steep; cf. O. F. escarper, 'to cut smooth and steep;' Cot. β . H. G. scharf, scharpf, sharp; Low G. scharp, sharp; cognate with E. Sharp, q. v. Der.

SCATHE, to harm, injure. (E.) In Romeo, i. 5. 86. M. E. scapen, Prompt. Parv. [The sb. scathe, harm, is in Chaucer, C. T. 448; Havelok, 2006.]—A. S. sceadan, strong verb, pp. scod, pp. sceaden, to harm, injure; Grein, ii. 402. + Icel. skada. + Swed. skada. + Dan. skade. + G. and Du. schaden. + Goth. gaskathjan, str. vb., pt. t. gaskoth, pp. gaskathans.

B. All from Teut. base SKATH, to harm; Fick, iii. 330; probably formed as a denominative verb from an Aryan pp. SKATA, wounded; so that the sense is 'to make to be wounded,' to inflict wounds upon. v. This Aryan pp. appears in Skt. kshata, wounded, hurt, pp. of kshan, to wound, Benfey, pp. 233. Cf. Skt. kshati, hurting, kshataya, caused by wounding. Thus the root is & SKA, to cut; Fick, i. 802. Der. scathe, harm, injury, also spelt scath, Rich. III, i. 3. 317, from A.S. sceada (Grein); scath-ful, Tw. Nt. v. 59, Chaucer, C. T. 4519; scathe-less, or scath-less, M. SCATTER, to disperse, sprinkle. (E.) M. E. scateren (with one t). Chaucer, C.T. 16382. — A.S. scateran, A.S. Chron. an. 1137. Though rather a late word, it is certainly E., and the suffix -er is frequentative; the base is SKAT, answering to the Gk. base SKAD, appearing in σκεδάννυμ, I sprinkle, scatter, σκέδασις, a scattering, Lat. scandula, a shingle for a roof, Skt. skhad, to cut. β. This base is lengthened from \(\sigma \) SKA, to cut, sever, whence also E. Shed, q.v. Der. scatter-ling, a vagrant, one of a scattered race, Spenser,

SCAVENGER, one who cleans the streets. (E.; with F. suffix.)

B. Hall Satires h. iv. sat. 7. 1. 48. The word Spelt scavengers, Bp. Hall, Satires, b. iv. sat. 7. 1. 48. The word appears in the Act of 14 Ch. II, cap. 2 (Blount). As in the case of messenger (for messager) and passenger (for passager), the n before g is intrusive, and scavenger stands for scavager. B. The scavager was an officer who had formerly very different duties; see Liber Albus, ed. Riley, p. 34, where is mention of 'the scavagers, ale-conners, bedel, and other officials' Riley says: 'scavagers, officers whose duty it was originally to take custom upon the scavage, i.e. inspection of the opening out, of imported goods. At a later date, part of their duty was to see that the streets were kept clean; and hence the modern word scavenger, whose office corresponds with that of the rakyer (raker) of former times.' As a fact, the old word for scavenger is always rakyer; see P. Plowman, v. 322, and note. That the scavagers had to see to the cleansing of the streets, is shewn in the Liber Albus, p. 272. Wedgwood cites the orig. French, which has the spelling scawageour. Y. Scavage is a barbarous Law-French SCARIFY, to cut the skin slightly. (F., -L., -Gk.) 'Of Scary-© corruption of E. shew-age, formed by adding the F. suffix -age to the flyng, called boxyng or cuppynge;' Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. E. verb to shew; see Blount's Nomolexicon, where the various spelling. c. 7. -F. scarifer, 'to scarife;' Cot. - Lat. scarificare, to scarify, ings scavage, schevage, schevage, and scheouing (shewing) are cited; he says: 'In a charter of Hen. II it is written scewinga and (in Mon. Ang. 2 par. fol. 890 b.) scawing, and elsewhere I find it in Latin tributum ostensorium. Hence the derivation is certainly from A.S. scedwian, to shew; see Show. See further in Riley, p. 196, 'Of scavage;' again, 'Scavage is the shewe,' &c., Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 99, l. 1; and see Sceawing in the Glossary to Diplomatarium Ævi Saxonici, ed. Thorpe. ¶ Blount is quite wrong in deriving scavenger from Du. schaven, to shave; nor is there the slightest evidence for connecting it with the A.S. scafan, to shave, scrape.

SCENE, stage of a theatre, view, spectacle, place of action. (L., - Gk.) Common in the dramatists. 'A scene, or theater;' Minsheu. The old plays, as, e.g. that of Roister Doister, have the acts and scenes marked in Latin, by Actus and Scana or Scana; and we certainly Anglicised the Latin word, instead of borrowing the F. one, which Cotgrave actually omits. - Lat. scena. - Gk. σκηνή, a sheltered place, tent, stage, scene.— 4/SKA, to cover; cf. Skt. chháya (for skaya), shadowing, shade. See Shade. Der. scen-ic, Gk. σκηνικός; scen-er-y, written scenary by Dryden (R.), from Lat. scenarius, belonging SCENT, to discern by the smell. (F., -L.) false; it ought to be sent, as when first introduced. A similar false spelling occurs in scythe; so also we find scite for site, scituation for situation, in the 17th century. 'To sent, to smell;' Minsheu, ed. 1627. 'I sent the mornings ayre;' Hamlet, i. 5. 58 (ed. 1623). - F. sentir, 'to feel, also to sent, smell;' Cot.—Lat. sentire, to feel, perceive.

B. The base appears to be SAN-T; cf. G. sinnen, to meditate, sinn, sense, feeling. See Sense. Der. scent, sb., spelt sent, i. e. discernment, Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 43, last line.

SCEPTIC, doubting, hesitating; often as sb. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) 'The Philosophers, called Scepticks; 'Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, s. v. Sceptical.-F. sceptique, 'one that is ever seeking, and never finds; the fortune, or humour of a Pyrrhonian philosopher; 'Cot.-Lat. scepticus. - Gk. σκεπτικός, thoughtful, inquiring; σκεπτικοί, pl., the Sceptics, followers of Pyrrho (died abt. B.c. 285). - Gk. root SKEP, as in σκέπτομαι, I consider; Aryan SCEPTRE, a staff, as a mark of royal authority. (F., -L., -Gk.) M. E. sceptre, Chaucer, C. T. 14379. - F. sceptre, 'a royall scepter; Cot. - Lat. sceptrum. - Gk. σκήπτρον, a staff to lean on; also, a Sceptre. – Gk. σκήπτειν, to prop; also, to lean on. Cf. σκηπτός, a gust or squall of wind; σκήπτειν is also used in the sense to hurl, throw, shoot, dart. – ✓ SKAP, to throw; cf. Skt. kshap, to throw.

Der. seeptr-ed, Rich. II, ii. 1. 40.

SCHEDULE, an inventory, list. (F., -L.; or F., -L., -Gk.) In Shak. L. L. L. i. 1. 18; spelt scedule in the first folio. - O. F. schedule, or cedule, 'a schedule, scroll, note, bill;' Cot. - Lat. schedula, a small leaf of paper; dimin. of scheda, also scida (Cicero, Att. i. 20 fin.), a strip of papyrus-bark. β . The Gk. $\sigma_X \delta \sigma_y$, a tablet, leaf, may have been borrowed from Lat. scheda (or sceda?), see Liddell; but we find also Gk. $\sigma_X i \delta \eta$, a cleft piece of wood, a splint, which looks like the original of Lat. seida. The difficulty is to know whether the Lat. word is original (from scid-, base of scindere), or borrowed (from Gk. σχίζειν, to cleave). Either way, it is from ✓ SKID, to cleave; cf. Skt. chhid, to cut.

SCHEME, a plan, purpose, plot. (L., - Gk.) 'Scheme (schema), the outward fashion or habit of anything, the adorning a speech with rhetorical figures;' Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. Borrowed directly, as a term in rhetoric, from Lat. schema. — Gk. $\sigma \chi \hat{\eta} \mu a$, form, appearance; also, a term in rhetoric. - Gk. $\sigma \chi \eta$ -, base of $\sigma \chi \dot{\eta}$ - $\sigma \omega$, future of $\ddot{\epsilon} \chi \dot{\epsilon} \iota \nu$, to hold, have. The base is $\sigma \in \chi$, whence (by transposition) $\sigma \chi \in \chi$ ✓ SAGH, to hold; whence also Skt. sah, to bear, endure. Der.

scheme, vb.; schem-er, schem-ing. And see sail.

SCHISM, a division, due to opinion. (F., -L., -Gk.) Tyndall has 'schismes that were among our clergy;' Works, p. 176, col. 1. M. E. scisme, Gower, C. A. i. 15. - F. schisme, scisme, 'a scisme, a division in, or from, the church;' Cot. - Lat. schisma. - Gk. σχίσμα, a rent, split, schism. - Gk. σκίζειν (fut. σχίσω, base σχίδ-), to cleave. - SKID, to cleave, cut; Skt. chhid, Lat. scindere, to cut. Der. schism-at-ic, from F. scismatique, 'scismaticall,' Cot., Lat. schismaticus, Gk. σχισματικός, from σχισματ-, stem of σχίσμα; hence schismcus, GK. σχισματικος, from σχισματ-, stem of σχίσμα; hence schismat-ic-al, -ly. And see schist, squill, schedule, ab-scind, re-scind.

BCHIST, rock easily cleft, slate-rock. (Gk.) In geology.—Gk. σχιστός, easily cleft.—Gk. σχίζειν, to cleave. See Schism.

BCHOOL, a place for instruction. (L.,—Gk.) M. E. scole, Chaucer, C. T. 125; Layamon, 9897. A. S. scólu, a school; 'see mon, be on minre scóle wére áféded and geléred'—the man, who wast fostered and taught in my school; Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, b. i. pr. 1 (cap. iii. § 1). The lengthening of the o seems due to stress.—

Lat. schola, a school. - Gk. σχολή, rest, leisure, spare time, employment of leisure, disputation, philosophy, a place where lectures are given, a school. The orig. sense is a resting or pausing; from the base $\sigma_{X^0} = \sigma_{X^0}$ or σ_{X^0} , seen in $\sigma_{X^0} + \sigma_{W}$, fut of έχειν, to have, hold, restrain, check, stop. — A SAGH, to hold; see Schome. Der. school, verb, As You Like It, i. 1. 173; schol-ar, M. E. scolere, Chaucer, C. T. 4000, A. S. sellers, Canons under King Edgar, § 10, in Thorpe's Ancient Laws, ii. 246, afterwards altered to scholar to agree with Lat. adj. scholaris; scholar-ly, scholar-ship; schol-ast-ic, from Lat. scholasticus = Gk. σχολαστικό»; schol-i-um, a Latinised form of Gk. σχόλιον, an interpretation, comment, from σχολή in the sense of 'discussion;' scholi-ast, from Gk. σχολιαστής, a commentator; scholi-ast-ic. Also school-man, school-master, school-mistress. Doublet, shoal (1), q. v. SCHOONER, a two-masted vessel. (E.) The spelling schooner is a false one; it should be scooner. The mistake is due to a supposed derivation from the Du. schooner, a schooner, but, on the contrary, the Du. word (like G. schoner) is borrowed from E. There is no mention of Du. schooner in Sewel's Du. Dict., The E. schooner occurs in Ash's Dict., ed. 1775; and earlier in the following: 'Went to see Captain Robinson's lady . . This gentleman was the first contriver of schooners, and built the first of that sort about 8 years since; extract from a letter written in 1721, in Babson's Hist. of Gloucester, Massachusets; cited in Webster's Dict., whence all the information here given is copied. 'The first schooner... is said to have been built in Gloucester, Mass., about the year 1713, by a Captain Andrew Robinson, and to have received its name from the following trivial circumstance: When the vessel went off the stocks into the water, a bystander cried out, "O how she scoons!" [i. e. glides, skims along]. Robinson instantly replied, "A scooner let her be;" and from that time, vessels thus masted and rigged have gone by this name. The word scoon is popularly used in some parts of New England to denote the act of making stones skip along the surface of water. . . . According to the New England records, the word appears to have been originally written scooner; Webster. The New England scoon was imported from Clydesdale, Scotland; being the same as Lowland Sc. scon, 'to make flat stones skip along the surface of water; also, to skip in the above manner, applied to flat bodies; Clydesdale; Jamieson. So also scun, to throw a stone; North of England; E.D.S. Glos. B. I (A.D. 1781). -A.S. scúnian, to shun, flee away; hence, to skip or speed along. See Shun. Allied words are Norweg. skunna, Icel. skunda, skynda, Dan. skynde, Swed. skynda sig, Swed. dial. skynna sig, to hasten, hurry, speed. Apparently from a base SKU, to speed, whence also E. scu-d, E. shoo-t, shu-nt. As a rule, derivations which require a story to be told turn out to be false; in the present case, there seems to be no doubt that the story is true.

SCIATIC, pertaining to the hip-joint. (F., -L., -Gk.) tick vein; Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. [The sb. sciatica is earlier, in Minsheu, ed. 1627.] – F. sciatique, 'of the sciatica; veine sciatique, the sciatica vein, seated above the outward ankle;' Cot. – Low Lat. sciaticus, corruption of Lat. ischiadicus, subject to gout in the hip (White). - Gk. loχιαδικός, subject to pains in the loins. - Gk. loχιαδ, stem of loχιάς, pain in the loins. - Gk. loχίον, the socket in which the thigh-bone turns. Der. sciatica, fem. of Lat. sciaticus.

SCIENCE, knowledge. (F., -L.) M. E. science, Chaucer, C. T. 11434; P. Plowman, B. x. 214.-F. science, 'science;' Cot. - Lat. scientia, science, knowledge. - Lat. scienti-, stem of pres. part. of scire, to know, orig. to discern. From a base SKI, to discern, whence also E. shill; see Skill. Der. scienti-fic, from F. scientifique, 'scientificall,' Cot., from Lat. scientificus, made by science, where the suffix -ficus is from facere, to make; scientific-al, -ly. Also a-scit-it-i-ous, scio-l-ist.

SCIMETAR, CIMETER, a curved sword. (F. or Ital., - Pers.?) Spelt semitar, used of a pointed sword; Titus Andron. iv. 2. 91. - F. cimeterre, 'a scymitar, or smyter, a kind of short and crooked sword, much in use among the Turks;' Cot. This accounts for the spelling cimeter. Also Ital. scimitarra, scimitara, 'a turkish or persian crooked sword, a simitar;' Florio. This accounts for the spelling scimetar. B. It was fully believed to be of Eastern origin. If so, it can hardly be other than a corruption of Pers. shimshir, shamshir, 'a cimeter, a sabre, a sword, a blade; Rich. Dict. p. 909. Lit. 'lion's claw.' = Pers. sham, a nail; and sher, a lion; id. pp. 907, 921; Vullers, ii.

464. γ. The Span. is cimitarra, explained by Larramendi from Basque cimea, a fine point, and tarra, belonging to; prob. a mere invention, like his Basque etymology of cigar.

SCINTILIATION, a throwing out of sparks. (F., = L.) In Minsheu, ed. 1627. [The verb scintillate is much later.] = F. scintillation, 'a sparkling;' Cot. = Lat. scintillationem, acc. of scintillatio. = Lat. scintillatus, pp. of scintillare, to throw out sparks. = Lat. scintilla, a spark; a dimin. form, as if from scinta*. Cf. Gk. σπινθήρ, a spark. Perhaps allied to A. S. scin-an, to shine; see Shine.

SCIOLIST, one whose knowledge is superficial. (L.) 'Though they be but smatterers and meer sciolists;' Howell, Famil. Letters, b. iii. let. 8 (about A. D. 1646). Formed with suffix -ist (Lat. -ista, Gk. -torns) from Lat. sciolus, a smatterer. Here the suffix (in scio-lus) has a dimin. force, so that the sense is 'knowing little.'-Lat. scire, to know; see Science.

SCION, a cutting or twig for grafting; a young shoot, young member of a family. (F.,-L.) Spelt scion, Minsheu, ed. 1627.

Also spelt sion, syon, cion, 'Syon, a yong sette,' i. e. slip or graft; Palsgrave. 'Cyun of a tre, Surculus, vitulamen;' Prompt. Parv. Spelt sioun, Poems and Lives of Saints, ed. Furnivall, xxxv. 74 (Stratmann). - F. scion, 'a scion, a shoot, sprig, or twig;' Cot. Spelt cion in the 13th cent. (Littre). Diez connects it with F. scier (spelt sier in Cot.), to cut, to saw, which is from Lat. secare, to cut. Thus sci-on means 'a cutting,' just as a slip or graft is called in E. a cutting, and in G. schnittling, from schnitt, a cut. See Section.

SCIRRHOUS, pertaining to a hard swelling. (L., -Gk.) In Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674. Englished as if from a Lat. scirrhosus*, adj. formed from scirrhus, a late Lat. medical term given in Blount and Phillips, used in place of Lat. scirrhoma, a hard swelling. - Gk. σκίρροs, better σκίροs, a hardened swelling, a 'scirrhus;' also called σκίρρομα, οr σκίρωμα; from the adj. σκιρόs, hard.

SCISSORS, a cutting instrument with two blades fastened at the middle. (F., -L.) Spelt cissers in Levins. 'Cysoure, forpex;' Prompt. Parv. M. E. sisoures (riming to houres), Chaucer, House of Fame, ii. 182.—O. F. cisoires, shears, scissors (Roquesort). more usual F. form is ciscause, 'sizars or little sheers;' Cot. latter is the pl. of ciseau, older form cisel, a chisel, cutting instrument. The true base of these words is probably secare, to cut, as shewn s.v. Chisel. β . But it certainly would seem that the derivative of secare was confused with forms due to cædere and scindere. And it is quite clear that the mod. E. spelling of scissors is due to a supposed etymology (historically false) from Lat. scissor, a cutter, which is from scissus, pp. of scindere, to cleave. It is remarkable, however, that the Lat. scissor meant 'a person who cuts,' a carver, a kind of gladiator (White); whilst the Low Lat. scissor meant a carver, a butcher, and scisor meant a coin-engraver, a tailor. y. There is absolutely not the slightest evidence for the use of scissor for a cutting instrument, and still less for the use of a plural scissores, which could only mean a couple of carvers, or butchers, or tailors. But popular etymology has triumphed, and the spelling scissors is the result. ¶ With Lat. scindere we may connect ab-scind, ab-scissa, re-scind; and see schism. With Lat. cædere we may connect circum-cise, con-cise, de-cide, de-cis-ion, ex-cis-ion, fratri-cide, homi-cide, in-cise, infanti-cide, matri-cide, parri-cide, pre-cise, regi-cide, sui-cide; cæs-ura. For the derivatives of secare, see Section.

SCOFF, an expression of scorn, a taunt. (O. Low G.) scof, skof, Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 128, l. 3 from bottom; 'nom a skof' = took it in scorn, K. Alisaunder, 6986. Not found in A.S.; except that A. S. scyfe is a gloss upon præcipitationis in Ps. li. 4 (Bosworth).

O. Fries. schof, a scoff, taunt (Richtofen). + Icel. skaup, later skop, mockery, ridicule. Cf. also O. Du. schobben, schoppen, to scoff, mock (Hexham); Icel. skeypa, skopa, to scoff, mock, skopan, railing; mock (Hexham); Icel. skeypa, skopa, to scott, mock, skopan, railing; and perhaps Dan. skuffe, to deceive.

B. The orig. sense was probably 'a shove' or 'a rub; cf. Low G. schubben, to rub, sik schubben, to rub oneself when one itches (Bremen Wörterbuch); M. H. G. schupfen, to push, from the root of E. skove. See Shove. Der. scoff, verb, Rich. II, iii. 2. 163; scoff-er, As You Like It, iii. 5. 62.

BCOLD, to chide, rail at. (O. Low G.) M. E. scolden, P. Plowman, B. ii. 81. Not in A. S. Formed from Du. schold, pt. t. of the strong verb scheldan, to scold. + G. schalt, pt. t. of the strong verb β. The orig. sense was prob. simply to make schelten, to scold. a loud noise; since we may consider these verbs as closely connected with scel. skjalla (pt. t. skal, pp. skollinn), to clash, claster, slam, make a noise; G. schallen, in comp. erschallen (pt. t. erscholl), to resound; Swed. skalla, to resound. SKAL, to resound; said of skalla, to resound. SKAL, to resound; said of a land. hound. Der. scold, sb., Tam. Shrew, i. 2. 188, and in Palsgrave; scold-er. And see scald (3).

SCOLLOP, the same as Scallop, q. v.

SCONCE (1), a small fort, bulwark. (Du., -F., -L.?) In Shak. Hen. V, iii. 6. 76; also applied to a helmet, Com. Errors, ii. 2. 37; and to the head itself, Com. Errors, i. 2. 79. – O. Du. schantse (Du. schans), 'a fortresse, or a sconce;' Hexham. We find also Swed. skans, fort, sconce, steerage; Dan. skandse, fort, quarter-deck; G. schanze, a sconce, fort, redoubt, bulwark; but none of these words β. They are seem to be original, nor to have any Teut. root. probably all derived from O. F. esconser, 'to hide, conceal, cover,' also absconser, 'to hide, keep secret;' Cot. We also find O. F. escons (Burguy) and absconse (Cotgrave) used as past participles.—

Lat. absconsus, used (as well as absconditus) as pp. of absconders, M m 2 to hide; see Abscond. The Span. esconder, Ital. ascondere, to hide, anumber was denoted by a longer and deeper cut or secre. At are directly from the infin. abscondere; with the reflexive sense, we Lowestoft, narrow passages cut in the side of the slope towards. find Span. esconderse, to hide oneself; and the E. to ensconce oneself simply means to lie hid in a corner, or to get into a secure nook. y. Diez derives the Ital. scancia, a book-case, from Bavarian schanz = G. schanze, which is doubtless right; but the G. schanze may be none the less a borrowed word. It is singular that we also find G. schanzs in the sense of 'chance;' and there can be no doubt as to its being borrowed from F, when used in that sense; for it is then from O.F. chance, chance. And see Sconce (2). Der. ensconce, coined by prefixing en-; see En-.

SCONCE (2), a candle-stick (F.,-L.) Palsgrave has: 'Sconse, to sette a candell in, lanterne a mayn.' M.E. sconce. 'Sconce, Sconsa, vel absconsa, lanternula;' Prompt. Parv. p. 450. 'Hec absconsa, a scons;' Wright's Vocab. i. 231, col. 1. This clearly shews that the word was used to mean a concealed or closely covered light; as also we find from Roquefort. - O. F. esconse, a dark lantern, Lat. absconsa; Roquefort. Put for absconse. - Lat. absconsus, pp. of abscondere; see Abscond. And see Sconce (1). SCOOP, a hollow vessel for ladling out water, a large ladle. (Scand.) M. E. scope. 'Scope, instrument, Vatila, Alveolus;' Prompt. Parv. The pl. scopes, and the verb scopen, to ladle out water, occur in Manning's Hist. of England, ed. Furnivall, 8164, 8168 (Stratmann). -Swed. skopa, a scoop; O. Swed. skopa, with sense of Lat. haustrum (Ihre). + O. Du. schoepe, schuppe, a scoop, shovel; Hexham. + Dan. skuff, a shovel. + G. schüppe, a shovel.

β. Perhaps connected with Shovel, q. v.; though this is not quite clear. But cf. Gk. σκύφος, a cup, allied to σκάφος, a hollow vessel, from σκάπτειν, to dig. - ✓ SKAP, to dig. See Shave. Der. scoop, vb., M. E. scopen, as above; coal-scoop.

SCOPE, view, space surveyed, space for action, intention. (Ital., purpose, intent.' We seem to have taken it from Ital, as it is not a F. word, and has a more limited sense in Gk. Otherwise, it is from a late Lat. scopus, of which I can find no good account. -Gk. σκοπόs, a watcher, spy; also a mark to shoot at.—Gk. root ΣΚΕΠ-, as in σκέπτομαι, I consider, see, spy.—

✓ SPAK, to spy;

SCORBUTIC, pertaining to, or afflicted with scurvy. (Low L., -Low G.) In Blount's Gloss, ed. 1674, we find: 'Scorbute (scorbutus), the disease called the scurvy; scorbutical, pertaining, or subject to that disease.' Formed with suffix -ic from Low Lat. scorbutus, which is merely a Latinised form of Low G. schorbock, scurvy, also spelt schärbuuk, scharbock, scorbut; see Bremen Wörterbuch, s. v. schärbunk. Cf. O. Du. scheur-buyck, 'the scurvie in the gumms,' Hexham; Du. scheurbuik. Also G. scharbock, scurvy, tartar on the teeth. β. The etymology seems to have caused difficulty; but it is really obvious. The forms with & must be older than those with t, and the senses of Low G. schärbuuk and of O. Du. scheur-buyck are identical. They can only mean 'rupture of the belly,' and must have been applied to denote rupture in the first instance, and afterwards to signify scurvy. That the two diseases are different, is no objection to the etymology; it merely proves that confusion between them at one time existed.

y. The Low G. schärbuuk is from scheren, to separate, part aside, tear, rupture, and bunk, the belly; so also Du. scheur-buik, from scheuren, to tear, rend, crack, and buik, the belly. The verbs are allied to E. Shear. The Low G. buuk, Du. buik, G. bauch, are the same as Icel. bukr, the trunk of the body, for which see Bulk (2). And see Scurvy. Der. scorbutic-al.

SCORCH, to burn slightly, burn the surface of a thing. (F., -L.) M.E. scorchen, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, bk. ii. met. 6, 1. 1477; Romans of Partenay, 3678. O. F. escorcher, escorcer, 'to flay or pluck off the skin;' Cot. Cf. Span. escorchar, Ital. scorticare, to flay. 3. These are probably due to Low Lat. excorticare, to take off the skin; Ducange. - Lat. ex., off; and cortic-, stem of cortex, bark, rind, husk. The verb took up the sense of Lat. excitation. β. These are probably due to Low Lat. excorticare, to take to skin, from ex, and corium, skin; though it is not possible to derive scorch from excoriare, as Diez justly remarks. might, however, refer scorch to ex and scortum, with the sense of 'skin' or 'hide,' instead of to ex and cortex. However, it makes no very great difference, for the senses of scortum and cortex are not far removed, both being from the same \(\subseteq \text{SKAR} \), to separate, to shear, to which we may also refer the word corium. the orig. sense of search was to take off the scale or shell, hence, to take off the skin, to burn the surface of any thing; both scale and shell being from the same of SKAR. See Shear.
SCORE, a notch or line cut; a reckoning; twenty. (E.) M. E.

score; 'ten score tymes;' P. Plowman, B. x. 180. It is supposed the sea are called scores. - A. S. scor, twenty; which occurs, according to Bosworth, in the A.S. version of the Rule of St. Bennet, near the end. - A. S. scor-, stem of the pt. t. pl. and pp. of sceran, to shear, cut. See Shear. Cf. Icel. skor, skora, a score, notch, incision; Swed. skåra, Dan, skaar, the same. Der. score, to cut, Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 2; also to count by scoring, Chaucer, C. T.

SCORIA, dross, slag from burnt metal. (L., -Gk.) In Holland, tr. of Plinie, b. xxxiii. c. 4. - Lat. scoria. - Gk. σκωρία, filthy refuse, dross, scum. - Gk. σκωρία, dung, ordure. + A. S. scearn, dung. + Skt. gakrit, dung. + Lat. stercus. β. All from ✓ SKAR, to separate; see Curtius, i. 205. See Scorn.

SCORN, disdain, contempt. (F., -O. H.G.) M. E. scorn (dat. scorne), O. Eng. Homilies, ii. 169, l. 1; schorn, scharn, Ancren Riwle, p. 126, l. 24; skarn, Ormulum, 4402; scarn, scorn, Layamon, 17307.—O. F. escarn, scorn, derision; Burguy. We find O. F. pp. pl. escharnys, glossed by E. scornid, in Wright's Vocab. i. 144, l. 6. Cf. Ital. scherno, derision.—O. H. G. skern, mockery, scurrility. B. Some connect this word with Icel. skarn, dung, dirt; A. S. scearn, the same; the throwing of dirt being the readiest way of expressing scom; see Scoria. But Fick (iii. 338) connects it with Gk. σκαίρew, to skip, dance. Der. scorn, verb, M. E. scornen, P. Plowman, B. ii. 81, skarnen, Ormulum, 7397, from O. F. escarnir, escharnir, which from O. H. G. skernón, to mock, due to the sb. skern; also scorn-ful, K. Lear, ii. 4. 168; scorn-ful-ly; scorn-er, P. Plowman, B.

SCORPION, a stinging insect, a sign of the zodiac. (F.,-L.,-Gk.) M. E. scorpion, K. Alisaunder, 5263. - F. scorpion, 'a scorpion;' Cot. - Lat. scorpionem, acc. of scorpio, another form of scorpius, a scorpion. - Gk. σκορπίος, a scorpion, a prickly sea-fish, a prickly plant; the lit. sense being 'sharp' or stinging. - VSKARP, to cut, pierce; see Sharp.

SCOTCH, to cut with narrow incisions. (Scand.) In Shak. Cor. iv. 5. 198; Macb. iii. 2. 13; cf. scotch, sb., a slight cut. Antony, iv. 7. 10. The notion is taken from the slight cut inflicted by a scutcher or riding-whip; Cotgrave explains F. verge by 'a rod, wand, switch, or scutcher to ride with.' This connects scotch with prov. E. scuich, to strike or beat slightly, to cleanse flax; Halliwell. The variation of the vowel appears in Norw. skoka, skoko, or skuku, a swingle for beating flax (Aasen), which is prob. further allied to Swed. skäckta, skäkta, to swingle. 'Skäckta lin eller hampa, to swingle or seutch flax or hemp;' Widegren. β. Perhaps further allied to Du. schokken, to jolt, shake, and to E. Shock and Shake.

SCOT-FREE, free from payment. (E.) Scot means 'payment;' we frequently find scot and lot, as in Shak. 1 Hen. IV, v. 4. 115; Ben Jonson, Every Man, ed. Wheatley, iii. 7. 11; see a paper by D. P. Fry on scot and lot, Phil. Soc. Trans. 1867, p. 167. The phrase occurs in Thorpe, Ancient Laws, i. 491, in the Laws of Will. I. § v; 'omnis Francigena, qui tempore Eadward propinqui nostri fur Anglia parties a conceptulinum Anglorum quod iresi dicent un in Anglia particeps consuetudinum Anglorum, quod ipsi dicunt an hlote et an scote, persolvat secundum legem Anglorum.' Here an= on, in, by. See also Liber Albus, ed. Riley, pp. 114, 235. - A.S. scot, sceot; as in leoht-gesceot, leoht-sceot, money paid to supply light. Bosworth; Róme-scott, money paid to Rome, A. S. Chron. an. 1127. spelt Rôm-gescot, id. an. 1095. The lit. sense is 'contribution,' that which is 'shot' into the general fund.—A. S. scot-, stem of pp. of sceotan, to shoot; see Shoot, Shot. + O. Fries. skot, a shot, also a payment or scot. + Du. schot. + Icel. skot, a shot, contribution, tax. + G. schoss, a shot, a scot. β. The Low G. forms originated O. F. escot, a shot, whence escotter, 'every one to pay his shot, or to contribute somewhat towards it, Cot.; disner à escot, 'a dinner at an ordinary, or whereat every guest pays his part, id.; so that scot = a tavern-score, is certainly the same word; cf. 'Simbolum, escot de taverne,' Wright's Voc. i. 134. ¶ The phrase scot and lot, as a whole, presents some difficulty, and has been variously interpreted; the lit. sense is 'contribution and share;' I suppose that originally, scot meant a contribution towards some object to which others contributed equally, and that lot meant the privilege and liability thereby incurred; mod. E. subscription and membership. See.

Mr. Fry's paper, which is full of information. Doublet, skot. SCOUNDREL, a rascal, worthless fellow. (E.) In Shak. Tw. Nt. i. 3. 36; and in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. Not common in old authors; used by Cotgrave to translate F. maraud. Formed, with agential suffix -el, from prov. E. and Scottish skunner or scunner, to loathe, shun; the d being excrescent, as usual after n. This word scunner was also used as a sb., with much the same sense as scoundrel. β. Thus Brockett gives: 'Scunner, to nauscate, feel disgust, to loathe, to shy, as a horse in harness. It is also applied, figuratively, that, in counting numbers by notches on a stick, every twentieth to a man whose courage is not at the sticking place, one who shrinks, shudder, hesitate, shrink back through fear; Scunner, Skonner, sb., loathing, a surfeit; also, any person or thing which excites disgust. Also: 'Scunner, vb. trans., to disgust, cause loathing.' To which must be added, that, as the verb had the form scunner or scouner, it was obviously convenient to add the suffix -el of the agent, to turn it into a sb., for the sake of greater distinctness. This would give scouner-el, a fellow causing disgust, a loathsome rascal; and, with the usual insertion of d (which could not but be brought in by the emphasis) the form secundrel would naturally result. Of course, the suffix el (answering to ol in A. S. wacol, el in M. E. newefang-el) was preferable to the equivalent form er in this case, to distinguish the agential suffix from the frequentative one. Y. The verb scunner is the frequentative form from A.S. scunian, to shun; the se sound being preserved (as usual) in the North of England. Hence scound-r-el seun-er-el, one whom one constantly shuns, or merely 'a shunner,' a coward. The word is E., not Scand., because shun is not a Scand. word; see Shun. In Barbour's Bruce, xvii, 651, we have: 'And skunnyrrit tharfor na kyn thing' = and did not shrink through fear one bit on that account; where the Edinb. MS. has scounryt; shewing that skunnyr = scouner. And again, in the same, v. 211, where one MS. has schonand (shunning), the other has skownrand (scunnering), both words meaning 'dreading;' shewing that ¶ I have no doubt that skowner is the frequentative of schon. this solution, here first proposed, is the right one. Wedgwood connects it with scumber or scummer, to dirty; which would only give scumbrel. E. Müller refers us to Ital. scondaruolo, but scondaruole (not scondaruolo) merely means blindman's buff (see Florio), and the vowel o would not pass into ou, not to mention that Florio probably put u for v, and meant Ital. scondarvole, as Blount understood it. Mahn refers us to G. schandkerl (which he seems to have invented), the true G. word being schandbube; and the passage of G. a into E. ou is simply impossible. Besides, we need not go to G. or Ital. when the word can be fairly explained as English.

SCOUR, to cleanse by hard rubbing, to pass quickly over. (F., - L.) M. E. scouren; 'scouryn awey ruste;' Prompt. Parv. 'As any bason scoured newe;' Rom. of the Rose, 540. - O. F. escurer. 'to scowre; Cot. Cf. Span. escurare; O. Ital. scurare, to skoure dishes, to rub or cleanse harnesse, Florio. [Hence also Swed. skura, Dan. skure, to scour; the word not occurring in Icelandic.] - Lat. excurare, to take great care of, of which the pp. excuratus occurs in Plautus; see Diez. - Lat. ex, here used as an intensive prefix; and curare, to take care, from cura, care. See Ex- and Cure. Der. scour-er.

SCOURGE, a whip, instrument of punishment. (F., -L.) M.E. scourge, Wyclif, John, ii. 15; schurge, O.E. Homilics, i. 283, l. 11; Ancren Riwle, p. 418. - O. F. escorgie (see Littré), mod. F. escourgée, écourgée, a scourge. Cot. has escourgée, 'a thong, latchet, scourge, or whip.' Cf. Ital. scuriata, scuriada, a scourging; O. Ital. scoria, 'a whip, scourge, scoriare, to whip, scoriata, scoriada, a whipping; also, the same as scoria, i.e. a whip; Florio.

$\beta$. The Ital. scoriata answers to Lat. excoriata, lit. flayed off, hence a strip of skin or shread of leather for a whip; pp. of excoriare, to strip of skin. - Lat. ex, off; and corium, skin; see Ex- and Cuirass. γ. We might explain the O. Ital. verb scoriare directly from Lat. excoriare, to excoriate, to flay by scourging. Der. scourge, M. E. scourgen, Rob.

of Glouc. p. 263, l. 13.

SCOUT (1), a spy. (F., -L.) M. E. scoute (spelt scout, but riming with oute), Seven Sages, ed. Wright, l. 2218. -O. F. escoute, 'a spie, eave-dropper, also, a scout, scout-watch;' Cot. Verbal sb. from escouter, 'to hearken;' id.—Lat. auscultare, to hearken; see Auscultation.

B. The transfer in sense, from listening to spying, causes no difficulty; the O.F. escoute means both listener SCOUT (2), to ridicule, reject an idea. (Scand.) In Todd's Johnson; noted as a vulgar word. Cf. Lowland Scotch scout, 'to pour forth any liquid forcibly;' Jamieson. The latter sense is closely related to shoot.—Icel. skúta, skúti, a taunt; cf. skúta, to jut out, allied to skota, skotra, to shove, skot-yroi, scoffs, taunts, and to the strong verb skjóta (pt. t. skaut, pl. skutu, pp. skotinn), to shoot. Cf. Swed. skjuta, (1) to shoot, (2) to shove, push; skjuta skulden pd, to thrust the blame on; Dan. skyde, (1) to shoot, (2) to shove; skyde skylden paa, to thrust the blame on; skyde vand, to repel water.

Thus the sense is to shoot, push away, reject. See Shoot.

SCOUT (3), a projecting rock. (Scand.) In place-names, as Raven-Scout. 'The steep ridges of rocks on Beetham-fell (West-Raven-Scout. 'The steep ridges of rocks on Beetham-fell (West-moreland) are called scouts;' A Bran New Wark (E. D. S.), l. 193, footnote. - Icel. skúta, to jut out; see Scout (2).

BCOWL, to look angry, to lower or look gloomy. (Scand.) M. E. scoulen; spelt scoule, Prompt. Parv. The devils who gather round a dying man are said to 'skoul and stare;' Pricke of Conscience, M. E. scoulen; spelt scoule, Prompt. Parv. The devils who gather round a dying man are said to 'skoul and stare;' Pricke of Conscience, 2225.— Dan. skule, to scowl, cast down the eyes. Cf. Icel. skolla, to shear, cut. A closely allied base SKARD appears in E. skard and through fear.' So also Jamieson'has: 'Scunner, Scouner, to loathe, Oskulk, keep aloof, sholli, a skulker, a fox, the devil; Du. scuilen, to skulk, lurk, lie hid. β . That these are connected words is shewn by Low G. schulen, to hide oneself, not to let oneself be seen, and the prov. G. (Ditmarsch) schulen, to hide the eyes, to look slily as if peeping out of a hiding-place, look out, a word noticed by Fick, i. 337. γ. Fick connects these with Dan. skiul, snearer (watered Dan. skiule, to hide), Icel. skjól, a shelter, cover, which he refers to a Teut. base SKEULA, a hiding-place; from γ SKU, to cover. γ. Cf. also Icel. skjól-eygr, goggle-eyed, squinting (skjól- in other compounds having reference to skjól, a shelter); A. S. sceól-eáge, (Roeworth), spelt scýl-eágede in Wright's Vocab. i, 45, squint-eyed (Bosworth), spelt scyl-eagede in Wright's Vocab. i. 45, col. 2. Thus the sense is 'to peep out of a hiding-place,' or to look from under the covert of lowering brows. Der. scowl, sb.; also Scul.k, q.v. SCRABBLE, to scrawl. (E.) In I Sam. xxi. 13; where the marginal note has 'made marks.' Put for scrapp-le, frequentative of Scrape, q.v. Cf. prov. E. scrabble, to scratch, frequentative of the scrape (Halliwell). See Scramble.

scrabe, d.v. Cl. prov. E. scrabels, to scratch, requestative of scratch, i.e. to scrape (Halliwell). See Scramble.

SCRAGGY, lean, rough. (Scand.) Cotgrave translates F. eschards by 'a little, lean, or skraggis girle, that looks as if she were starved.' It is the same word as M.E. scroggy, covered with underwood, or straggling bushes. 'The wey toward the Cite was strong, thorny, and scroggy; Gesta Romanorum, ed. Herrtage, p. 19, l. 19. Cf. Prov. E. scrag, a crooked, forked branch, also, a lean thin person (Halliwell); shrags, the ends of sticks. Also prov. E. scrog, a stunted bush, scroggy, abounding in underwood, scrogs, blackthorn, scroggy, twisted, stunted, scrog-legs, bandy-legs. (id.) - Swed. dial. skraka, a great dry tree, also (sarcastically) a long lean man; whence gobb-skrakan, a weak old man (Rietz). Allied to Swed. dial. skrokk, anything wrinkled or deformed, skrukka, to shrink together, skrugeg, crooked, skrukkug, wrinkled (Rietz). Also to Norweg. skrokken, wrinkled, uneven, pp. of the strong verb skrekka (pt. t. skrakk), to shrink (Aasen). β . Evidently scraggy is for scrakky, formed from skrakk, pt. t. of skrekka, to shrink, which is cognate with E. Shrink, q.v. Mr. Wedgwood also notes: 'a lean scrag, which is shrink, q.v. Mr. Wedgwood also notes: 'a lean serag, which is nothing but skin and bones; Bailey. Frisian skrog is used in the same sense, whilst Dan. skrog signifies carcase, the hull of a ship. Scrag of mutton, the bony part of the neck; scraggy, lean and bony.' He also notes Gael. sgreag, to shrivel (also cognate with shrink), whence sgreagach, dry, rocky, sgreagag, an old shrivelled woman, sgreagan, anything dry, shrunk, or shrivelled. Cf. Irish sgreag, a rock. Der. scraggi-ness.

SCRAMBLE, to catch at or strive for rudely, struggle after, struggle. (E.) 'And then she'll scramble too;' Beaum. and Fletcher, Mons. Thomas, i. 3. 'I'll scramble yet amongst them;' id. Captain, ii. I (Jacomo). 'The cowardly wretch fell down, crying for succour, and scrambling through the legs of them that were about him; 'Sidney, Arcadia, b. ii. (R.) Not found in M.E. A frequentative form of prov. E. scramb, to pull, or rake together with the hands (Yorks.), scramp, to catch at, to snatch (North; in Halliwell). It may also be regarded as a nasalised form of prov. E. scrabble, to scramble (Somersets.), allied to scraffle, to scramble (Halliwell), and scrapple, to grub about (Oxon.), which is the frequentative of prov. E. scrap, to scratch (East.) Halliwell cites 'to scrappe as a henne dose from a MS. Dict. of A. D. 1540; which is merely E. scrape. Thus scramble is the frequentative of a nasalised form of Scrape, q.v. And see Scrabble. Der. scramble, sb.; scrambl-er.

SCRAP, a small piece, shred. (Scand.) M. E. scrappe. 'And also 3 if I myst gadre any scrappes of the releef of the twelf cupes,' i. e. any bits of the leavings of the twelve baskets (in the miracle of the loaves); Trevisa, tr. of Higden, i. 15. (Rather Scand. than E.) – Icel. skrap, scraps, trifles, from skrapa, to scrape, scratch; Dan. skrab. scrapings, trash, from skrabe, to scrape; Swed. afskrap, scrapings, refuse, dregs, from skrapa, to scrape. See Scrape.

SCRAPE, to remove a surface with a sharp instrument, shave, scratch, save up. (Scand.) M. E. scrapien, scrapen, also shrapien, shrapen (Stratmann). 'But ho so schrape my mawe'—unless one were to scrape my maw; P. Plowman, B. v. 124. Spelt shrapien, Ancren Riwle, p. 116, l. 15. (Rather Scand, than E.) - Icel. skrapa, to scrape; Swed. skrapa; Dan. skrabe. + Du. schrapen, to scrape. + A. S. scearpian, to scarify; A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 76, l. 13. A. S. form scearpian is clearly allied to A. S. scearp, sharp; thus to scrape is 'to use a sharp instrument;' see Sharp. Der. scrap-ing, scrap-er; also scrap, q. v., scrabb-le, q. v., scramb-le, q. v. SCRATCH, to scrape with a pointed instrument or with the nails. (Scand.) The word to scratch has resulted from the confusion of M. E. scratten, to scratch, with M. E. cracchen, with the same sense. 1. M. E. scratten, to scratch. Prompt. Parv.; Pricke of Conscience, shred. We may explain to scrat by to shear slightly, scrape, grate. If fusion with screw (2) below. Spelt screw in Minsheu, ed. 1627.—

The word scrape runs parallel with it, from the base SKARP; and the O. F. escrove, 'a scrue, the hole or hollow thing wherein the vice of difference in sense and form between scrape and scrat is very slight. Lastly, the form scrat is rather Scand. than E.; cf. Dan. skrade, to creak; Norweg. and Swed. stratta, to laugh loudly or harshly, Norweg. stratla, to rattle (Aasen), Swed. dial. strata, to frighten away animals; words significant of sharp, grating sounds. cracchen, P. Plowman, B. prol. 154, 186. Apparently put for craisen.

Swed. kratsa, to scrape, krats, a scraper, formed with suffix -sa from kratta, to rake, scrape, scratch, cf. kratta, sb., a rake; Dan. kradse, to scratch. So also Du. krassen (for kratsen?), to scratch; G. kratsen, to scratch; all from a base KART, to scratch, from & KAR, to cut, which is merely & SKAR, to cut, with loss of initial s, and appears in Gk. neipen, to shear, Skt. kri, to injure, ori, to wound. ¶ Hence scratten and cracchen are from the same root and mean much the same thing, so that confusion between them was easy enough. Der. scratch, sb., scratch-er. Doublet, grate (2).

SCRAWL, to write hastily or irregularly. (E.) A late word, used by Swift and Pope (Rich., and Todd). The aw (= au) denotes a long vowel or diphthong; better spelt scrall, with a as in all. 'To scrall, or scrawl, to scribble, to write after a sorry careless manner;' Phillips, ed. 1706. It appears to be nothing but a careless form of Scrabble, q.v. Cf. also E. scribble, and prov. E. scribble serobble, scribbling (North).

8. The peculiar form seems due to seroble, scribbling (North).

B. The peculiar form seems due to confusion with prov. E. scrawl, to crawl (West) in Halliwell; he cites 'To scrall, stir, motito' from Coles, Lat. Dict. To which add: 'The ryuer shall scraule [swarm] with frogges,' Exod, viii. 3; in Coverdale's version. This word is merely E. crawl, with prefixed s, added in some cases with the idea of giving greater emphasis; see Crawl. Der. scrawl, sb., scrawl-er.

SCREAM, to cry out shrilly. (Scand.) M. E. scremen, Polit. Songs, p. 158, l. 9; screamen, Hali Meidenhad, p. 37, last line but one. — Icel. skræma, to scare, terrify; Swed. skræma, Dan. skræmme, to scare. β . Hence it appears that the E. word has preserved what was doubtless the oldest sense of these Scand. words, viz. 'to cry aloud,' as the means of imposing or of expressing terror; we still commonly use scream with especial reference to the effects of sudden fright. Cf. Swed. skrän, a scream, skräna, to whimper, which is merely a parallel form. Y. In precisely the same way, the Dan. skrække, to scare, is related to E. skrække. The forms scree-ch, and Lowland Sc. skir-l, to cry shrilly, are all various extensions from the Teut. base SKRI, to cry aloud, occurring in G. schreien, Swed. skria, Du. schreijen, to cry aloud or shriek. - VSKAR, to make a noise; Fick, i. 242. Cf. G. schallen, to resound. See Screech, Shriek. Der. scream, sb.

SCREECH, to shriek, cry aloud. (Scand.) 'Whilst the screechoul, screeching loud;' Mids. Nt. Dr. v. 383; where the first folio has scritch-owle, scritching. Also spelt scrike, Spenser, F. Q. vi. 5. 18. Baret (1580) has scriek. M. E. scriken, skryken, schrichen, schriken, Chaucer, C. T. 15406 (Six-text, B. 4590); spelt shriken, O. E. Homilies, ii. 181, l. 2. — Icel. shrækja, to shriek; cf. shrikja, to titter (said of suppressed laughter); Swed. skrika, to shriek; Dan. skrige, to shriek; skrige of Skræk, to shriek with terror. + Irish sgreach-aim, I shriek; Gael. sgreach, sgreuch, to screech, scream; W. ysgrechio, to scream, β. All from ✓ SKARK or SKARG, to make a noise; whence Icel. skark, a noise, tumult, Skt. kharj, to creak, Russ. skrejetate, to gnash the teeth; extended from \(\subseteq \text{SKAR}, to make a noise. See Scream. \) Der. screech, sb., answering to Swed. skrik, Dan. skrig, Irish sgreach, Gael. sgreuch, W. ysgrêch; also screech-owl. And see shrike. Doublet, shriek, which is merely a variant, due to the alteration of se to sk at the beginning and the preservation of k at the end.

SCREEN, that which shelters from observation, a partition; also, a coarse riddle or sieve. (F., - Teut.?) 1. M. E. scren; spelt screne, Prompt. Parv., p. 450; Wright's Vocab. i. 197, col. 2. - O. F. escran, 'a skreen to set between one and the fire, a tester for a bed;' Cot. Mod. F. écran. β. Of doubtful origin; Diez refers it to G. schragen, a trestle, stack (of wood); we may also note G. schranne, a railing (answering to the E. sense of partition made of open work); and G. schranke, a barrier, schranken, the lists (at a tournament); cf. schranken-fenster, a lattice or grate-window. γ. Fick (i. 813) connects G. schragen and schranks with each other and with Lat. scrinium (whence E. Shrine). We cannot derive screen from Lat. scrinium, as we know that the latter word became escrin or escrain in O. F., and shrine in E. 2. In the sense of coarse riddle, it is spelt shreine in Tusser's Husbandry, sect. 17, st. 16 (E. D. S.), and is the same word as the above. 'A screen for gravel or corn is a grating which wards off the coarser particles and prevents them from coming through; Wedgwood. Der. screen, verb, Hamlet, iii. 4. 3.

SCREW (1), a cylinder with a spiral groove or ridge on its sur-

O. F. escroue, 'a scrue, the hole or hollow thing wherein the vice of a presse, &c. doth turn; 'Cot. Mod. F. écrou. B. Of uncertain origin. Diez derives it from Lat. scroben, acc. of scrobs, a ditch, trench, also a hole. This word appears to be from a base SKARBH, closely allied to SKARP, to cut, as in Lat. scalpere, sculpere; see Scrofula, Sculpture.

v. Diez thinks the F. word can hardly be derived from the Teutonic; we find G. schraube, a screw, Du. schroef, Icel. skrufa, Swed. skruf, a screw, peg, Dan. skrue; words of which the root does not seem to be known; though they may be from the Teut. base SKRU, to cut; Fick, iii. 339. ¶ The E. word from the Teut. base SKRU, to cut; Fick, iii. 339. is certainly from the F., as Scheler rightly remarks. Der. screw. verb, Macb. i. 7. 60; screw-driv-er, screw-propell-er, screw-steamer.

SCREW (2), a vicious horse. (E.) A well-known term in modern E., not noticed in Johnson or Halliwell. The same word as shrew, a vicious or scolding woman, spelt screwe in Political Songs, ed.

Wright, p. 153, l. 13. See Shrow. Doublet, shrew.

SCRIBBLE, to write carelessly. (L.; with E. suffix.) 'Scribled forth in hast at aduenture;' Sir T. More, Works, p. 56 e. Formed with the frequentative suffix -le from scribe, sb.; the suffix giving it a verbal force. Similarly, we find G. schreibler, a scribbler, from schreiben, to write. See Soribe. Der. scribble, sb., scribbl-er.

SCRIBE, a writer, a clerk, an expounder of the Jewish law. (L.) First in use as a scriptural term, and taken directly from Latin; Littré does not trace the F. scribe beyond the 16th century. M. E. scribe, Wyclif, Matt. viii. 19. - Lat. scriba, a writer, Matt. viii. 19 (Vulgate). - Lat. scribere, to write (pp. scriptus), orig. to scratch marks on a soft surface, to cut slightly; allied to scrobs, a ditch, and scalpere, to cut. - & SKARBH, extended form of & SKAR, to cut, whence also Gk. γράφειν, and A. S. grafan; see Grave (1). Der. scribb-le, q. v.; and see scrip (2), script, script-ure, scriv-en-er. Also (from Lat. scribere), a-scribe, circum-scribe, de-scribe, in-scribe, prescribe, pro-scribe, sub-scribe, tran-scribe (for trans-scribe); also (from pp. scriptus) a-script-ion, circum-script-ion, con-script, de-script-ion, inscript-ion, manu-script, non-de-script, pre-script-ion, pre-script-ive, proscript-ion, post-script, re-script, sub-script-ion, super-script-ion, transcript, tran-script-ion, &c. Also shrive, shrift, Shrove-tide.

SCRIMMAGE, the same as Skirmish, q.v.
SCRIP (1), a small bag or wallet. (Scand.) M. E. scrippe, King
Hom, ed. Lumby, 1061; Chaucer, C. T. 7319. — Icel. skreppa, a scrip, bag; Norweg. skreppa, a knapsack (Aasen); Swed. dial. skrappa, a bag (Rietz), Swed. skrappa, a scrip; O. Swed. skreppa (Ihre). + O. Du. scharpe, schaerpe, scerpe, a scrip, pilgrim's wallet (Oudemans); Low G. schrap, a scrip. (Brem. Wort.) Allied to G. scherbe, a shred. The orig. sense is 'scrap,' because made of a scrap or shred of skin or other material. See Scrap, Scarf (1).

SCRIP (2), a piece of writing, a schedule. (F., - L.) In Shak. Mids. Nt. Dr. i. 2. 3. The same word as script, the t dropping off in common talk; see Script.

SCRIPT, a piece of writing. (F.,-L.) 'Euery script and bond;' Chaucer, C. T. 9571. - O. F. escript, 'a writing;' Cot. - Lat. scriptum, a thing written, neut. of scriptus, pp. of scribere, to write; see Scribe. Der. manu-script, re-script, tran-script.

SCRIPTURE, writing, the Bible. (F., - L.) Scripture, in the sense of 'bible,' is short for holy scripture, or rather, The Holy Scriptures. M. E. scripture; the pl. scripturis is in Wyclif, Luke, xxiv. 27. O. F. escripture, 'writ, scripture, writing;' Cot. = Lat. scriptura, a writing = Lat. scripturus, fut. part. of scribere, to write; see Scribe. Der. scriptur-al.

SCRIVENER, a scribe, copyist, notary. (F., - L.) Properly a scriven; the suffix -er (of the agent) is an E. addition. M. E. skrivenere, Lydgate, Complaint of Black Knight, st. 28; formed with suffix -ere from M. E. scrivein, Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 44, l. 30. - O. F. escrivain, 'a scrivener;' Cot. Cf. mod. F. écrivain, Span. escribano, Ital. scrivano. - Low Lat. scribanum, acc. of scribanus, a notary; extended from scriba, a scribe; see Scribe.

SCROFULA, a disease characterised by chronic swellings of the glands. (L.) Called 'the king's evil,' because it was supposed the touch of a king could cure it; see Phillips, Dict., &c. In Phillips, ed. 1706; Blount (1674) has the adj. scrofulous. — Lat. scrofula; usually in pl. scrofula, scrofulous swellings. The lit. signification of scrofula is a little pig; dimin. of scrofu, a breeding sow. The reason for the name is not certainly known, but perhaps it is from the swollen appearance of the glands. It is remarkable that the Gk. name (χοιράδεs) for swollen or scrofulous glands appears to be similarly connected with χοῖροs, a pig. β. The Lat. serofa means 'a digger,' from the habit of swine, who are fond of 'rooting' or turning up the earth; allied to scrobs, a ditch. The parallel Gk. SCREW (1), a cylinder with a spiral groove or ridge on its surface, used as a fastening or as a mechanical power. (F., = L.? or Teut.?)

Better spelt scrue, as in Cotgrave; the spelling screw is due to congrave; the spelling screw is due to congrave. See Grave (1).

Better spelt scrue, as in Cotgrave; the spelling screw is due to congrave.

Scroll, formerly also scrowl, is a contraction of scrow-el, a dimin. form (with suffix el) of serome or serone, the earlier form of the word. The dimin. form does not appear to be earlier than about A.D. 1500, but the M. E. scroue, scrowe, is much older. Palsgrave (A. D. 1530) gives both scrolle and scrowe, and equates both to F. rolle. Fabyan also has both forms: 'He [Rich. II.] therefore redde the scrowle of resignacyon hymselfe,' an. 1398 (ed. Ellis, p. 547); 'wherefore, knowynge that the sayd Baylly vsed to bere scrowys and prophecie knownge that the saya Bayliy vsea to Dere scrows and prophetic aboute hym,' an. 1449 (id. p. 624). M. E. scrowe, scrowe; spelt scrow, Prompt. Parv.; pl. scrowis, Wyclif, Matt. xxiii. 5 (earlier version only); scrowe, Ancren Riwle, p. 282, last line. — O. F. scrowe, 'a scrowle;' Cot. Spelt scrow in the 14th cent. (Littré); mod. F. écrou; the Low Lat. scrow occurs a. D. 1386 (Ducange). To on the must be added that the dimin. form escroele actually occurs, in the sense of strip, as cited by Littré, s. v. écrou; thus proving the origin of E. scroll beyond all doubt.

B. Of Teut. origin. — O. Du. schroode, a strip, shred, slip of paper (Oudemans); allied to schroden, to cut off (id.) Cf. Icel. skrá, a scroll; allied to Norweg. skraa, to cleave (shred), and Dan. skraae, to hull corn, in which the d has disappeared. Thus the orig. sense is a 'shred,' i. e. strip or slip of parchment. See Shred, Shard.

SCRUB, to rub hard. (E.) M. E. scrobben, to rub down a horse; King Alisaunder, 4310. Not found in A. S., but prob. an E. word, see below. + Du. schrobben, to scrub, wash, rub, chide. + Dan. skrubbe, to scrub, rub; cf. skrubbet, adj., rough, rugged, scabrous. + Swed. skrubba, to rub, scrub.

B. The Norweg. skrubb means a scrubbing-brush (Aasen); and skrubba is a name for the dwarf corneltree, answering to E. shrub, A.S. scrobb, a shrub. The likeness between A. S. scrobb, a shrub, and M. E. scrobben, to scrub, can hardly be accidental; and, from the analogy of broom, we may conclude that the original scrubbing-brush was a branch of a shrub, and that the vb. is from the sb. In fact, we still use scrubby as an epithet of a plant, with the sense of shrubby, i. e. mean, small, or rough (cf. Dan. skrubbet, rough, cited above); and we even extend the same epithet to meanness of conduct, and the like. Cf. also Du. schrobber, 'a swabber, scrub, hog, scoundrel, fool, scrape-penny;' O. Du. schrobber, 'a rubber, a scraper, a scurvie fellow;' Hexham. And note Lowland Sc. scrubber, 'a handful of heath tied tightly together for cleaning culinary utensils, Teviotdale; Jamieson. Sce Shrub. Der. scrub, sb., 'a mean fellow, a worn-out brush, low underwood,' Webster; scrubb-ed, mean, Merch. Ven. v. 162; scrubb-y, adj., mean; scrubb-er.

SCRUPLE, a small weight, a doubt, perplexity, reluctance to act. (F., - L.) 'It is no consience, but a foolish scruple;' Sir T. More, Works, p. 1435 c. 'Would not have bene too scrupulous;' Frith, Works, p. 143, col. 2. - F. scrupule, 'a little sharp stone falling into a mans shooe, and hindering him in his gate [gait]; also, a scruple, doubt, fear, difficulty, care, trouble of conscience; also, a scruple, a weight amounting unto the third part of a dram; 'Cot.— Lat. scrupulum, acc. of scrupulus, a small sharp stone; hence, a small stone used as a weight, a small weight; also, a stone in one's shoe, an uneasiness, difficulty, small trouble, doubt. Dimin. of scrupus, a sharp stone. Formed from a base SKRU = 4 SKUR, to cut, appearing in Skt. kshur, to cut, scratch, furrow, khur, to cut, chhur, to cut, Gk. σκῦρον, chippings of stone, ξυρόν, a razor. Cf.

SKAR, to cut; see Shear. Der. scrupul-ous, from F. scrupuleux, 'scrupulous,' Cot., from Lat. scrupulosus; scrupul-ous-ly, -ness.

SCRUTINY, a strict examination, careful enquiry. (L.) Spelt scruteny, Skelton, Garl. of Laurel, 782; cf. F. scrutine, 'a scrutiny',' Cot. Englished from L. scrutinium, a careful enquiry. - Lat. scrutari, to search into carefully, lit. to search among broken pieces. - Lat. scruta, broken pieces, old trash; prob. from the base SKRU, to cut up, for which see Scruple. Der. scrutin-ise, scrutin-eer. And see in-scrut-able.

SCUD, to run quickly, run before the wind in a gale. (Scand.) In Shak. Venus, 301. We also have prov. E. scud, a slight rapid or flying shower of rain (Shropshire, and elsewhere); Lowland Sc. scuddin-stanes, thin stones made to skim the surface of water, as an amusement, answering exactly to Dan. skud-steen, a stone quoit. The frequentative of scud is prov. E. scuttle, to walk fast, to hurry along, often used with precisely the same force as scud; the weakened form scuddle, to run away quickly, is given in Bailey, vol. i. ed. 1735. Hence send is a weakened form of sent or scot; cf. prov. E. 'to go like scooter, i.e. very quick, East' (Halliwell); and scoot is only another form of shoot. Precisely the same weakening of t to d occurs in Danish, and the nautical term to scud is of Danish origin. - Dan. skyde, to shoot, to push, to shove; skyde i frö, to run to seed; skyde vand, to repel water; skyde over stem (lit. to shoot over the stem), to shoot ahead, i. e. scud along, as a nautical term; Dan. skud-, a shooting, used in compounds, as in skud-aar, leap-year, skud-steen, a base must be SKV 'scudding-stane;' Swed. skutta, to leap, Swed. dial. skuta, a sledge skval, dish-water.

SCROLL, a roll of paper or parchment, a schedule. (F., - Teut.) (Rietz), allied to Swed. skjuta, to shoot, and to Icel. skjuta, to shoot, also to slip or scud away, abscond. See Shoot. I unhesitatingly reject Grein's interpretation of A.S. seúdan by 'scud;' it only occurs in one passage, where it may better mean to 'shudder' or 'shiver.' We never find M. E. scudden, so that there is no connecting link between A. S. scudan and Shakespeare's scud. The W. ysguth, a scud, whisk, n. Spurell, is of no value here. Der. scutt-le (3), q.v.

SCUFFLE, to struggle, fight confusedly. (Scand.) In Beaum. and Fletcher, Philaster, v. 1. The frequentative form of scuff, preserved in prov. E. scuff, to shuffle in walking, West; Halliwell.

Swed. skuffa, to push, shove, jog; allied to E. shove. + O. Du. schuffelen, to drive on, also, to run away, i.e. to shuffle off; allied to Du. schuiven, to shove. Thus to scuffle is 'to keep shoving about.' See Shuffle, Shove. Der. scuffle, sh., Antony, i. 1. 7.
SCULK, SKULK, to hide oneself, lurk. (Scand.) M.E. sculken, skulken, Pricke of Conscience, 1788; Gower, C. A. ii. 93, 1. 4; whence the sb. scolkynge, Rob. of Glouc. p. 256, l. 11. — Dan. skulke, to sculk, slink, sneak; Swed. skolka, to play the truant. Allied to Icel. skolla, to sculk, keep aloof.

B. The base is SKULK, extended from SKUL; just as lur-k is from lower. The shorter base occurs in Du. schulen, Low G. schulen, to sculk, to lurk in a hiding-place; from Dan. skiul, Icel. skjól, a place of shelter; see further under Soowl, which schools form. which exhibits the shorter form.

SCULL (1), the cranium; see Skull.

'Scull, a little oar, to SCULL (2), a small, light oar. (Scand.) row with; Sculler, a boat rowed with sculls, or the waterman that row with; Sculler, a boat rowed with sculls, or the waterman that manages it;' Phillips, ed. 1706. Also in the phrase 'rowing scull,' Hudibras, pt. i. c. 3, l. 351. We also find 'the old sculler,' i. c. Charon; Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, i. I (Cupid's 7th speech). Dryden oddly uses sculler with the sense of 'boat;' tr. of Virgil, Georg. b. iv. l. 735. 'Scull to rowe with, auiron; Scullar, batellier;' Palsgrave.

B. To be connected with Lowland Sc. skul, skul, the school word vir Swed skul, the school was sense with the sense boat sense beautiful which is a Scand word vir Swed skul, skoll, a goblet or large bowl, which is a Scand. word, viz. Swed. skdl, a base, bowl, one of the scales of a balance (Widegren); Icel. skál, a bowl, a hollow, dish of a balance; Dan. skaal, a bowl, cup. (The change of vowel is remarkable, but occurs again in Skull, q. v.) National Son, without authority, defines a scull as 'a boat,' and so connects 'boat' with the idea of 'shell,' or hollow vessel; this can hardly be right. Every rowing man knows the essential difference between sculls and oars to consist in this, that the blade of the scull is hollowed out, as it were, and slightly curved, whilst the oar-blade is much flatter; oars for sea-boats are quite flat. We may at once explain scull from Icel. skál, a hollow; Swed. skálig, 'concave, hollow,' Widegren. Thus a scull is an oar with a slightly concave blade, like the dish of a balance. See Scale (2). Der. scull, verb; scull-er, as above.

SCULL (3), a shoal of fish. (E.) In Shak. Troilus, v. 5. 22.

M. E. sculle, Prompt. Parv. A variant of Shoal, q. v.

SCULLERY, a room for washing dishes, and the like. (E.) The word is really E., though the suffix -y is French; this suffix is added by analogy with pantr-y, butter-y (really bottler-y), so as to denote the place or room where the washing of dishes went on. Sculler is a remarkable alteration of swiller, i.e. a washer, from the verb swill, to wash, A. S. swilian; see Swill. This is proved by the history of the word, in which two changes took place: (1) from swiller to squiller; and (2) from squillery to scullery.

1. We find occasional change of orig. initial sw to squ, due perhaps to an Eastern dialect. Levins writes squaine for swain. Another clear instance is in the M. E. swelter (allied to mod. E. sultry), spelt squaltryn in the Prompt. Parv., p. 471; and on the very same page we have: 'squyllare, dysche-wescheare, Liza;' i.e. squiller for swiller.

2. Again, in 2. Again, in the same, p. 450, we find: 'Scorel, or squerel, beest;' i. e. scorel for squirrel; and by the same change, squillery would become scallery or scullery (for the change from see to see observe 'scome, or seum' on p.

449 of the same).

\be scullery (for the change from sco to seu observe 'scome, or seum' on p. 449 of the same).

Moreover, Rob. of Brunne tells us that the squyler above mentioned 'meked hymself ouer skyle [exceedingly] Pottes and dysshes for to swele,' i. e. swyle, swill, as required by the rime; 1. 5828. There is, in fact, no doubt as to the matter. change from swiller to squiller or sculler in the dialect of the East of England was obviously caused by the influence of Dan. skylle, Swed. skilja, to wash, rinse, Icel. skola, skyla, to wash. If (as seems most likely) these words are cognate with A.S. swilian, the form of the base must be SKWAL or SKWIL, as in Swed. squala, to gush, Norw. 8. We may further suppose that the change from swillery or squillery to scullery was helped out by some confusion afflicted with it; an E. adaptation, probably, of the Low Lat. medical with O. F. escuelle (from Lat. scutella), a dish; so that a scullery term scorbulus; see Scorbutic. Also scurvi-ly, -ness. was looked on as a place for dishes rather than as being merely the SCUTCH, to dress flax; see Scotch. place for washing them. ¶ Scullion is of different origin; see below.

SCULLION, a kitchen menial. (F.,-L.) In Shak. Haml. ii. 2. 616. 'Their smooked scolions faces, handes, and feete;' Barnes, Works, p. 341, col. 2. 'Scoulyon of the kechyn, souillon;' Palsgrave. This word has undoubtedly been long understood as if it were connected with scullery, and the connection between the two words in the popular mind may have influenced its form and use. But it is impossible to connect them etymologically; and Wedgwood well says that 'it has a totally different origin,' which he points out. - F. escouillon, 'a wispe, or dishclout, a maukin or drag, to cleanse or sweepe an oven; 'Cot. 'In the same way malkin, maukin, is used both for a kitchen-wench and for the clout which she plies;' Wedg-B. The F. escouillon is the same as escouvillon, Cot. The latter form answers to Span. escobillon, a sponge for a cannon; formed with suffix -on (Lat. -ionem) from escobilla, a small brush, dimin. of escoba, a brush, broom, which is cognate with Ital. scopa, a broom, a birch-tree. - Lat. scopa, used in pl. scopæ, thin twigs, a broom of twigs. Y. The lit. sense of scopæ may be 'cuttings,' from SKAP, to cut, hew; see Capon.

The word scullery is of different origin; see above

SCULPTURE, the art of carving figures. (F.,-L.) M. E. sculpture, Gower, C. A. ii. 83, 1. 2. - F. sculpture, for which Littré cites nothing earlier than the 16th century; but it must have been in earlier use. - Lat. sculptura, sculpture. - Lat. sculpturus, fut. part. of sculpere, to cut out, carve in stone; allied to scalpere, to scratch, grave, carve, cut. -

SKARP, extended from

γλύφειν, to engrave, hollow out; so that

SCUM, froth, refuse on the surface of liquids. (Scand.) 'Scome or scum of fletynge [floating], Spuma; 'Prompt. Parv. 'Scummyn lycurys, Despumo;' id. Dat. scome, Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 44, l. 23. - Dan. skum, scum, froth, foam; Icel. skúm, foam (in Egillson's Dict.); Swed. skum. + O. H. G. scum, G. schaum (whence F. écume). + Irish sgum (if it be a Celtic word).

SKU, to cover; Fick, iii. 336. β. Lit. 'a covering.'-SKU, to cover; Fick, iii. 336. ¶ The Lat. spuma is related to E. spew, not to scum. Der. scum, verb; scumm-er.

SCUPPER, a hole in the side of a ship to carry off water from the deck. (F.) Scuppers, the holes through which the water runs off the deck; Coles, ed. 1684. So named because the water appears to be spit out from them. — O. F. escopir, escupir, to spit out; now obsolete, but once widely spread; see Burguy. It appears also in the Span. and Prov. escupir; Walloon scuipa; Wallachian scuipire β. The root is not known; as it can hardly be corrupted from Lat. exspuere, Burguy suggests a Celtic root, as seen in Gael. cop, Irish cuip, froth, foam; to which the Lat. ex, out, must, in that case, have been prefixed.

We might rather connect it with Du. schoppen, to scoop away, met een schup weg schoppen, from schup, a scoop, shovel, or spade (Sewel), but for two objections: (1) that the action of shoveling away is not what is meant; and (2) that the Dutch word for scupper is spiegat (G. speigat, Swed. spygatt). Now the Swed. spygatt is 'spit-hole,' from spy, to spit; and G. speigat is the same, from speien, to spit; names which seem to be mere translations from the O. F. name now lost (except in E.) Cf. G. speirühre, the spout of a gutter, lit. 'spit-pipe.

SCURF, small flakes of skin; flaky matter on the skin. (E.) M. E. scurf. 'Scurf of scabbys, Squama;' Prompt. Parv.; Cursor Mundi, 11823. - A. S. scurf, scurf; A. S. Leechdoms, i. 116, last line but one. Also sceorfa; 'sceorfa on his heafde hæfde' = he had scurf on his head; Ælfred, tr. of Beda, b. v. c. 2. Lit. 'that which is scraped off. A. And in Cotgrave.

O.F. escoutilles, pl., 'the scuttles, or hatches of a ship; th'ouvertures or trap-doors, whereat things are let down into the hold; Cot. Mod. F. écoutille; Span. escotilla, escotillon, 'a hole in the hatch of a ship, also the hatch itselfe,' Minsheu.

3. The word appears to be Spanish; and we find another form in escotadura, the large trapdoor of a theatre or stage (Neuman). Another sense of escotadura is the sloping of a jacket or pair of stays; and the form of the word is such as to be due to the verb escotar, to cut out a thing so as to make it fit, to slope, to hollow out a garment about the neck (a different word from Span. escotar, to pay one's reckoning, for which see Scotfree). The orig. sense is 'to cut a hole in a garment to admit the neck,' from the sb. escote, the sloping of a jacket, a tucker such as women wear above the bosom. This sb. is derived, as Diez points out, from the Teutonic; cf. Goth. skauts, the hem of a garment, Du. schoot, the lap, the bosom, G. schooss, the same; so that the orig. sense of Span. escote is 'a slope to fit the bosom,' a hole for the neck. Y. Similarly the A. S. scett (cognate with Goth. skauts) answers to the 'sheet' of a sail, exactly corresponding to Span. secota, the sheet of a sail. See Sheet. Der. scuttle, verb, to sink a ship by cutting scuttles or holes in it.

SCUTTLE (3), to hurry along, scud away. (Scand.)

as scuddle (Bailey), and the frequentative of Scud, q. v.

SCYTHE, a cutting instrument for mowing grass. (E.) intrusion of the letter c is due to false spelling; it should be sythe or sithe. P. Plowman, C. iv. 464; sybe, Havelok, 2553.—A. S. stde, sipe, a scythe; 'Falcastrum, sipe,' Wright's Vocab. i. 85, 1. 3. The A. S. side is put for sigde (a form actually found in the Epinal gloss), and the long i is due to loss of g; it means 'the cutting instrument,' from the Teut. base SAG, to cut = \checkmark SAK, to cut. See Saw (1), Section. Fick, iii. 314. + Du. zeis. + Icel. sig $\eth r$, sig \eth , a sickle. + Low G. seged, segd, also seed, seid, a kind of sickle; Brem. Worterbuch. SE-, away, apart, prefix. (L.) From Lat. se-, short for sed, without, which is prob. retained as a prefix in sed-ition. Sed is mentioned by Festus as having been used with the sense 'without.' It perhaps meant 'by oneself,' being put for swad, abl.; cf. Skt. sva, one's own self, Lat. se; and Lat. suus, one's own. Der. se-cede, se-clude, se-cret, se-cure, sed-ition, se-duce, se-gregate, se-lect, se-parate; and

All from a Teut. base SAIWA, sea; Fick, iii. 313. Perhaps connected with Gk. bei, it rains; Skt. su, to press out Soma juice, soma, an acid juice, nectar, water, sava, juice, water; but this is uncertain; Curtius, i. 492. Der. sea-board, from F. bord, the shore = Du. boord, edge, brim (see Border); sea-coast, sea-faring, sea-girt, -green, -horse, -kale, -king, -leuel, -man, -man-ship, -mark, -room, -serpent, -shore, -sick, -side, -unicorn, -urchin, β. From a Teut. type SELHA, Fick, iii. 328. Cf. Gk. σέλαχος, the name of a fish. The orig. sense is perhaps simply 'marine;' from SAL, salt water, as found in Lat. sal, Gk. άλs; see Balt.

SEAM (1), a suture, a line formed by joining together two pieces, a line of union. (E.) M. E. seem, Wyclif, John, xix. 23.—A. S. seem, Ælfric's Hom. i. 20, l. 4 from bottom. + Du. zoom. + Icel. saumr. + Dan. and Swed. söm. + G. saum. β. All from a base SAUMA, a sewing, suture (Fick, iii. 325); formed with suffix -MA from \square SU, to sew, whence Lat. su-ere, to sew, A. S. siwian, to sew; see Sew. Only seamster is given in Minsheu, ed. 1627. The suffix -ess is a F. fem. suffix, F. -esse (from Lat. -issa, Gk. -100a), as in princ-ess, marchion-ess. M. E. semster, Destruction of Troy, ed. Panton and Donaldson, l. 1585. - A. S. seamestre. We find: 'Sartor, seamere,' and 'Sartris, seamestre; Wright's Vocab. i. 74. [Whence seamestre, Diplomatarium Ævi Saxonici, ed. SEAR, SERE, withered. (E.) Spelt sere, Spenser, Shep. Kal. Jan. 37. M. E. seer; spelt seere, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 18, l. 25; seer, Rom. Rose, 4749. - A. S. sear, sere; only preserved in the derived verb; see below. + O. Du. sore, dry (Oudemans); zoor, 'dry, withered, or seare; 'Ilexham. + Low G. soor, dry; Brem. Wört. β. The A. S. eá is for Teut. au, and r prob. stands for s, as is so often the case; this brings us to a base SAUS, from the \(\sqrt{SUS},\) to dry, preserved in Skt. cush, to become dry, to be withered, whence cushka, dried up, withered; see Benfey, who remarks that cush is for sush, and that for orig. sus, o being put for s, by the assimilating influence of sh.' From the same root is Gk. αύειν, to parch, αὐστηρός, dry, rough, whence E. austere. The Zend hush, to dry, proves that sus is the root; Curtius, i. 490. quite a mistake to connect E. sear (from root SUS) with Gk. Enpos (from root SKA); the resemblance, such as it is, is quite accidental. Der. sear, verb, to dry up, cauterise, render callous, Rich. III, iv. 1. 61, M. E. seeren, Prompt. Parv., A.S. searian, to dry up, to wither

SEARCH, to seek, examine, explore. (F., -L.) M. E. serchen, Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 268, last line but one; better spelt cerchen, for which Stratmann refers to Lydgate, Minor Poems, 159, Mandeville's Travels, p. 315. - O.F. cercher (Burguy); mod. F. chercher, to seek. Cf. Ital. cercare, search, orig. to search; Prov. cercar, cerquar, sercar, to search (Bartsch); Span. cercar, to encircle, surround. - Lat. circare, to go round; hence, to go about, explore. -Lat. circus, a circle, ring; circum, round about. SEASON, proper time, fit opportunity. (F., -L.) Chaucer, C. T. 1045; P. Plowman, B. i. 1; seysoun, King Alisaunder, 5251. – O. F. seson, seison, saison; mod. F. saison, 'season, due time;' Cot. Cf. Span. sazon, Port. sazão, sezão; O. Prov. sadons, sasos, sazos (Bartsch).-Low Lat. sationem, acc. of satio, a season, time of year, occurring A.D. 1028 (Ducange). The same as Lat. satio, a sowing, planting, Verg. Georg. i. 215, ii. 319 (hence, the time of sowing or spring-time, which seems to have been regarded as the season, par excellence). - Lat. satus, pp. of serere, to sow. β. Serere appears to be a reduplicated from, put for sesere or si-se-re; from \checkmark SA, to sow, weakened form SI; see Sow (1). T Besides the word season, we also find Span. estacion, used in the sense of 'season' or time as well as 'station;' and Ital. stagione, 'a season or time of the yeere,' Florio. These are, of course, from Lat. stationem, acc. of statio, a station, hence applied, we must suppose, to the four stations, stages, or seasons of the year; see Station. And it is extremely probable that the use of this word affected and extended the senses of season. Scheler would derive season also from Lat. stationem, but Diez and Littre argue to the contrary, and we ought to keep the Span. words estacion and sazon quite distinct. I have been informed that the prov. E. season is still occasionally used in Kent in the sense of 'sowing-time,' which is really a strong argument in favour of the derivation from sationem. And see Ducange. Der. season, verb, SEIAT, a chair, bench, &c., to sit on. (Scand.) M. E. sete; spelt seete, Wyclif, Rev. ii. 13.— Icel. seti, a seat; Swed. setie; Dan. sæde. [The A.S. word is not setie (as in the dictt.), but set, as in the A.S. Chron. an. 894; see Gloss. to Sweet's A.S. Reader, and Thorpe's edition. The more usual A. S. word is sett, for which see Settle.]

+O. Du. seet, sate. + M. H. G. saze.
β. The Teut. type is SAITI,

SECOND, next after the first, the ordinal number corresponding seconde, fem., 'second'; Spelt seconde, Wyclif, John, iv. 54; secunde, Rob. of Glouc. p. 282, l. 15. Not a very common word, as other was usually employed instead, in early times; second being the only ordinal number of F. origin. (See Other.) - F. second, masc., seconde, fem., 'second'; Cot. - Lat. secundus, following, second; so called because it follows the first. Formed from sec-, base of sequi, to follow, with gerundive suffix -u-ndus, which has the sense of a pres. part. See Sequence. Der. second, sb., used with reference to minutes, or first small subdivisions of an hour, &c., from F. seconde, 'the 24 part of a prime, a very small weight used by goldsmiths and jewellers,' Cot. secret-ar-y, q. v.
SECRETARY, orig. a private amanuensis, confidant. (F., -L.) The sense of the word is now much extended; it is frequently used where little privacy is intended. In Shak. Hen. VIII, ii. 2. 116, iv. 1. 102. Palsgrave has: 'Secretarye, secretayre;' secretarye also occurs in a 15th-century poem called The Assemble of Ladies, st. 49, pr. in Chaucer's Works, ed. 1561, fol. 259, col. 1. - F. secretaire, 'a secretary, clerk;' Cot. - Low Lat. secretarium, acc. of secretarius, a confidential officer; cf. Lat. secretarium, a secret place, consistory, conclave. - Lat. secret-us, secret; with suffix -arius; see Secret.

Der. secretary-ship; secretari-al.

SECT, a party who follow a particular teacher, or hold particular principles, a faction. (F.,-L.) It is tolerably certain that the sense of the word has been obscured by a false popular etymology which has connected the word with Lat. secare, to cut; and it is not uncommon for authors to declare, with theological intolerance and in contempt of history, that a sect is so called from its being 'cut off' from the church. But the etymology from secare is baseless, and undeserving of serious mention. M. E. secte, used convertibly with sute (= suite) in P. Plowman, C. viii. 130, B. v. 495; see my note on the line. Both secte and sute are here used in the sense of 'suit of clothes.' - F. secte, 'a sect or faction; a rout or troup; a company of one (most commonly bad) opinion; 'Cot. - Low Lat. secta, a set of people, a following, suite; also, a quality of cloth, a suit of clothes; also, a suit or action at law; Lat. secta, a party, faction, sect, lit. VIII, v. 3. 70, from F. sectaire, a sectary, the ringleader, professor, or follower of a sect, Cot.; sect-ar-i-an, sect-ar-i-an-ism. Doublet, sept.

Pl. Crede, 558. - O. F sed, se, a seat, see (Burguy). Lat. sedem, acc. of sedes, a scat. - Lat. sedere, to sit; cognate with E.

Sit, q.v.

SEED, a thing sown, germ, first original or principle, descendants.

(E.) M. E. seed, Chaucer, C. T. 598.—A. S. sæd, seed; Grein, ii. 394. + Du. zaad. + Icel. sæði, sáð. + Dan. sæd. + Swed. säd. + G. saat.

β. All from Teut. base SADI, seed; Fick, iii. 312; from See Sow. Der. seed-bud, -ling, -lobe, -s-man, -time; also seed-y, looking as if run to seed, hence shabby.

SEEK, to go in search of, look for, try to find. (E.) seken, Chaucer, C. T. 17. - A. S. secan, secean, to seek, pt. t. sohte, pp. gesóht; Grein, ii. 418. + Du. zoeken. + Icel. sækja, written for soekja. + Dan. söge. + Swed. söka. + O.H.G. suchkan, M. H. G. suchen, G. suchen.

β. All from the base SÕKYAN, to seek; Fick, iii. 314. The A.S. sécan is for soecan, i. e. the é is (as usual) a mutation of ό, and is due to sóc=sók, pt. t. of Goth. sakan, to strive, which is also the source of E. sake; see Sake. Seek is a weak causal verb. Der. seek-er, be-seech.

SEEL, to close up the eyes. (F. - L.) 'Come, seeling night;' Macb. iii. 2. 46. Spelt cele in Palsgrave. Orig. a term in falconry, to close up the eyelids of a hawk (or other bird) by sewing up the eyelids; see Sealed-dove in Halliwell, and seel in Nares. - O. F. siller; siller les yeux, 'to seel, or sow up, the eie-lids, thence also, to hoodwink, blind; 'Cot. Also spelt ciller, 'to seele or sow up the eie-lids;' id. The latter is the better spelling.—O. F. cil, 'the brimme of an eie-lid, or the single ranke of haire that growes on the brim; 'id. - Lat. cilium, an eye-lid, an eye-lash; lit. 'a covering.' - KAL, to hide, as in Lat. celare; cf. domi-cilium. See Domicile and Cell.

SEEM, to be fitting or suitable; to appear, look. (E.) The old sense 'to be fitting' is preserved in the derivative seemly. M.E. semen. Chaucer, C.T. 10283.—A.S. seman, geseman, to satisfy, conciliate; Grein. Hence the idea of 'suit,' whence that of 'appear suitable,' or simply 'appear.' These senses are probably borrowed from the related adj. seemly, which is rather Scand. than E.; see Seemly. + Icel. sæma, put for seema, to honour, bear with, conform to; closely related to sæmr, adj., becoming, fit, and to sóma, to beseem, become, befit. β . Here ϵ is (as usual) the mutation of o, and the word is connected with Icel. soma, to beseem, and Icel. sama, to beseem; see further under Seemly. Der. seem-ing; also seem-ly, q. v.; be-seem, q. v. SEEMLY, becoming, fit. (Scand.) M. E. semlich, Ancren Riwle, p. 94, note i; semli, semely, Chaucer, C.T. 753. - Icel. sæmiligr, seemly, becoming; a longer form of sæmr, becoming, fit, with suffix -ligr answering to A. S. -lic, like, and E. -ly. - Icel. sama, to beseem, befit, become; cognate with Goth. samjan, to please. The lit. sense is 'to be the same,' hence to be like, to fit, suit, be congruent with. - Icel. samr, the same, cognate with E. Same, q.v. Thus seemly = same-like, agreeing with, fit; and seem is to agree with, appear like, or simply, to appear; the A.S. séman, to conciliate, is the same, with the act. sense 'to make like,' make to agree. Der. seemly, adv. (put for seem-li-ly); seemli-ness, Prompt.

SEER, a prophet, lit. 'one who sees.' (E.) See See. SEESAW, motion to and fro, or up and down. (E.) Prol. to Satires, 323. A reduplicated form of saw; from the action of two men sawing wood (where the motion is up and down), or sawing stone (where the motion is to and fro). See Saw. It is used as adj., verb, and sb.; the orig. use was perhaps adjectival, as in Pope as in Pope.

SEETHE, to boil. (E.) The pt. t. sod occurs in Gen. xxv. 29; the pp. sodden in Exod. xii. 9. M. E. sethen, Chaucer, C. T. 385; pt. t. sing.. seeth, id. 8103, pl. sothen, soden, P. Plowman, B. xv. 288, C. xviii. 20; pp. soden, sothen, id. B. xv. 425.—A. S. seddan, pt. t. sedd, pp. soden; Grein, ii. 437. + Du. zieden. + Icel. sidda, pt. t. sedd, pl. sudu, pp. sodinn. + Dan. syde. + Swed. sjuda. + O. H. G. siodan; G. sieden. The orig. sense was prob. 'to burn;' which explains the connection with Goth. sauths, sauds, a burnt-offering, sacrifice, Mark, xii. 33.

B. From the Teut. base SUTH, to burn, singe, whence Icel. svida (pt. t. sveid), to burn, singe, sweds, svida, SEE (1), to perceive by the eye. (E.) M. E. seen, see, se; pt. sei, sacrifice, Mark, xii. 32. B. From the Teut. base SUTH, to sey, seigh, seigh, seigh, seigh, seak, sawk, sawk; pp. sein, sejen, sen, seien, boil, orig. to burn; Fick, iii. 326; allied to the Teut. base SWATH, seie; Chaucer, C. T. 193, &c. — A. S. seón, sión; pt. t. seak, pl. sdwon, to burn, singe, whence Icel. sviða (pt. t. sveið), to burn, singe, sviða, segregation, 'a segregation,' Cot., from Lat. acc. segregationem.

SEIGNIOR, a title of honour. (F., -L.) M. E. seignour, King Alisaunder, 1458; the derived word seignory is much commoner, as in Rob. of Brunne, p. 24, l. 18, Rob. of Glouc. p. 186, l. 18.— O. F. seigneur, 'a lord, sir, seignior;' Cot.—Lat. seniorem, acc. of senior, elder, hence, an elder, a lord; see Senior. Der. seignior-y, as above, from O. F. seigneurie, 'seigniory,' Cot.

E. saysen, seysen, orig. a law term, to give seisin or livery of land, to put one in possession of, also to take possession of; hence, to grasp; see Havelok, 251, 2513, 2518, 2931. — O.F. saisir, seisir, to put one in possession of, take possession of (Burguy). The same as Low Lat. sacire, to take possession of another's property.—O. H. G. sazzan, sezzan (put for sazjan), to set, put, place, hence, to put in possession of; mod. G. setzen, cognate with E. Set, q.v. Der. seiz-er, seiz-able, a coined word; seiz-ure, Troil. i. 1. 57, a coined word, answering to the F. infin. saisir just as pleasure does to plaisir. Also seis-in, seiz-in, possession of an estate, a law term, M.E. seisine, spelt seysyne in Rob. of Glouc. p. 382, l. 16, from O. F. seisine, the same as saisine, 'seisin, possession,' Cot.; where the suffix -ine answers to Lat. -ina; cf. Ital. sagina, seisin, possession.

SELAH, a pause. (Heb.)

In Ps. iii. 2; and elsewhere in the psalms. The meaning of the word is unknown, and cannot be certainly explained. Gesenius takes it to indicate a pause, and connects it with Heb. sáláh, to rest. See Smith, Dict. of the Bible.

SELDOM, rarely, not often. (E.) M. E. seldom, P. Plowman, A. viii. 124; selden, B. vii. 137; selde, Chaucer, C.T. 1541.-A. S. seldan, seldon, seldom, seldom; Grein, ii. 426.

B. The A.S. seldum is formed with an adverbial suffix -um which was orig. the inflectional ending of the dat. plural; just as in hwil-um, mod. E. whil-om, lit. 'at whiles' or at times, wundr-um, wondrously, lytl-um, little, micl-um, much, and the like; see March, A.S. Gram. § 251. This form easily passed into seldon or seldan, just as A. S. onsundr-on, asunder, stands for an earlier form on sundrum. Or we may regard the by-form seld-an as due to a different case-ending, such as the ordinary oblique case-ending of weak adjectives, perhaps a dat. sing., as in to-eie-an, moreover. In this view, seldom is for seld-um, dat. pl., while seld-an found as an adverb. 'Pat folc wundrap pers be hit seldost gesib's' the people wonder at that which it most seldom sees; Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, cap. xxxix. § 3; where seldost is the superl. form of the adverb. We also find such compounds as seld-ewo, rare, seld-sine, seldom seen; Sweet, A.S. Reader. + Du. zelden, adv. + Icel. sjaldan, adv., seldom. + Dan. sielden, adv. + Swed. sällan (for säldan), adv. + G. selten; O. H. G. seldan.

8. All these are adverbial forms from a Teut. adj. SELDA, rare, strange, appearing in A.S. seld (as above); Dan. adj. pl. sielten, rare; Swed. süll- in the comp. säll-sam, rare; Goth. silda- in comp. silda-leiks, wonderful; G. selt- in seltsam, strange. Fick, iii. 328; where it is pointed out that the base SIL appears in Goth. ana-sil-an, to become silent, Mark, iv. 39, and in Lat. sil-ere, to be silent; the idea of 'silence' being closely connected with those of astonishment, wonder, and rarity. See Silent. SELECT, choice. (L.) In Shak. Haml. i. 3. 74.—Lat. selectus, select, chosen; pp. of seligere, to choose. Lat. se-, apart; and legere, to choose. See Se- and Legend. Der. select-ness; also select, verb, Cor. i. 6. 81; select-ion, sb., from Lat. acc. selectionem.

verb, Cor. i. 6, 81; select-ion, sb., from Lat. acc. selectionem.

SELF, one's own person. (E.) M. E. self, sometimes used in the sense of 'same' or 'very;' dat. selue; 'right in the selue place' = just in the very place, Chaucer, C. T. 11706.—A.S. self, also seelf, silf, sielf, sylf, self; Grein, ii. 427, where numerous examples are given. + Du. zelf. + Icel. sjálfr; old form sjælfr. + Dan. selv. + Swed. sjelf. + Goth. silba. + G. selbe, selb-st. B. All from a Teut. base SELBA, self; Fick, iii. 329. The origin is unknown; but perhaps SELBA is for SE-LIB-A, where se is the same as Lat. se, Skt. sva, one's own self, and lib- is the same as in the base of Goth. Libba. a remnant bi-laib-ian. to be left. If this be right, the Goth. laiba, a remnant, bi-laib-jan, to be left. If this be right, the orig. sense is 'left to oneself.' Der. self-denial, self-evident, selfenistent, self-possession, self-righteous, self-same, self-sufficient, self-willed. Also self-ish, not an old word; self-ish-ness, Butler, Hudibras, pt. i. c. 2. l. 1052. Also my-self, A.S. min self, where min is the possessive pron. of the 1st person; thy-self, A.S. pin self, where pin a burning, a roasting, G. schwadem, steam. See Fick, iii. 361. Der. & is the possessive pron. of the second person; him-self, where the sod, suds.

A.S. phrase is he self, nom., his selfes, gen., him selfum, dat., hine selfne, acc. (see Grein); her-self, due to A. S. hyre selfre, dat. fem.; &cc. For the use of these forms in M. E. and A. S., see examples in Stratmann and Grein. Also selv-age, q. v.

SELL (1), to hand over or deliver in exchange for money or some other valuable. (E.) M. E. sellen, Wyclif, Luke, xii. 33; sillen, other valuable. (E.) Matt. xix. 21. - A. S. sellan, sillan, syllan, to give, hand over, deliver; Grein, ii. 429. + Icel. selja, to hand over to another. + Dan. sælge. + Swed. sülja. + M. H. G. sellen; O. H. G. saljan. + Goth. saljan, to bring an offering, to offer a sacrifice. to bring an offering, to offer a sacrifice. B. All from a Teut. base SALYAN, to offer, deliver, hand over. This is a causal form, derived from the sb. which appears in E. as Sale, q. v. y. The Teut. base of sale, sb., is SALA, a handing over, surrender, delivery; Fick, iii. 319. Allied to Lithuan. sulyti, to proffer, offer, pa-sula, sb.,

an offer. Root unknown. Der. sell-er.

SELL (2), a saddle. (F., - L.) In Spenser, F. Q. ii. 2. 11, 3. 12. M. E. selle, a seat, Wyclif, 2 Macc. xiv. 21. - O. F. selle, a stool, a seat, also, a saddle; Cot. - Lat. sella, a seat. Put for sed-la, from sedere, to sit; see Settle (1), and Sit.

SELVAGE, SELVEDGE, a border of cloth, forming an edge that needs no hem. (Du.) In Exod. xxvi. 4, xxxvi. 11; spelt seluege in the edit. of 1551. It merely means self-edge, but it was borrowed from Dutch. 'The self-edge makes show of the cloth;' Ray's Proverbs, ed. 1737.—O. Du. selfegge, the selvage (Kilian, cited by Wedgwood); from self, self, and egge, edge. The more usual Du. word is zelfkant, for selfkant. 'Egge, an edge, or a selvage; kant, the edge, brinke, or seame of anything; de zelfkant, the selvage of cloth; 'Hexham. See Self and Edge.

SEMAPHORE, a kind of telegraph. (Gk.) A late word, not in Todd's Johnson, and little used. It was once used for a telegraph worked with arms projecting from a post, the positions of the arms giving the signals. Coined from Gk. $\sigma \hat{\eta} \mu a$, a sign; and $\phi o \rho \dot{\alpha}$, a carrying, from $\phi \dot{\epsilon} \rho \epsilon u$, to bear, carry, cognate with E. Bear, vb. SEMBLANCE, an appearance. (F., L.) M. E. semblaunce, Rom. of the Rose, 425.-0.F. semblaunce, 'a semblance, shew, seeming;' Cot. Formed, with suffix -ance (=Lat. -antia) from sembler, 'to seem, or make shew of; also, to resemble; 'Cot.—Lat. simulare, to assume the appearance of, simulate; see Simulate. Cf. re semblance.

SEMI-, half. (L.) Lat. semi-, half; reduced to sem- before a vowel. + Gk. ήμι-, half. + A. S. sám-, half; as in sám-wis, half wise, not very wise; Grein, ii. 388, 390. + Skt. sámi, half; which Benfey considers = sámyá, old instrumental case of sámya, equality, from sama, even, same, equal, like cognate with E. Same. Thus semi-denotes in an equal manner, referring to an exact halving or equit-able division; and is a mere derivative of same. Doublet, hemi-.

SEMIBREVE, half a breve, a musical note. (Ital., -L.) From Ital. semibreve, 'a semibriese in musike;' Florio, ed. 1598.—Ital. semi., half; and breve, a short note. See Somi- and Breve. ¶ Similar formations are seen in semi-circle, semi-circumference, semicolon, semi-diameter, semi-fluid, semi-quaver, semi-tone, semi-transparent, semi-vocal, semi-vowel; all coined words, made by prefixing semi-, and presenting no difficulty.

SEMINAL, relating to seed. (F.,-L.) Sir T. Browne has seminality, sb., Vulg. Errors, b. vi. c. 1. § 2.-F. seminal, adj. of seed; 'Cot. - Lat. seminalis, relating to seed. - Lat. semin-, stem of semen, seed. - Lat. base se-, appearing in se-ui, pt. t. of serere, to sow; and suffix -men = Aryan suffix -man. Serere is cognate with E. Sow, q. v. Der. semin-ar-y, q.v. Also semin-at-ion (rare), from Lat. semin-atio, a sowing, which from seminare, to sow, derived from semen.

SEMINARY, a place of education. (L.) The old sense was a seed-garden. 'As concerning seminaries and nourse-gardens;' Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xvii. c. 10. - Lat. seminarium, a seed-garden, nursery garden, seed-plot; neut. of seminarius, belonging to seed.

Lat. semin-, stem of semen, seed; and suffix -arius. See Seminal. SEMPITERNAL, everlasting. (F.,-L.) In Minsheu and Cotgrave. Altered from F. sempiternel, 'sempiternall;' Cot.-Lat. sempitern-us, everlasting; with suffix -alis. - Lat. sempi-, for semper, ever; with suffixes -ter- and -nus; cf. noc-tur-nus (for noct-tur-nus) from the stem noct-; these suffixes answer to Aryan -tar and -na. β. Lat. sem-per is for sama-per, where sama is 'same,' as in the prefix semi-; and per is 'through,' the same word as the prep. per; see Semi- and Per-. The sense of semper is, accordingly, 'the same through, i. e. always the same, lasting in the same condition. SEMPSTER, SEMPSTRESS, the same as Seamstress, q.v.

SENARY, belonging to six. (L.) The senary scale (scale by sixes) is a mathematical term. - Lat. senarius, consisting of six each. -Lat. soni, six each; for sex-ni. - Lat. sex, six, cognate with E. six; acc. of senatus, the council of elders. - Lat. sen-, base of sen-ex, old, sen-ium, old age; with pp. suffix -atus; so that sen-atus = grown old. \(\beta\). From the base SANA, old; whence Vedic Skt. sana, old (Benfey), O. Gk. Evos, old; Goth. sin-eigs, old, sin-ista, eldest; Irish and Gael. sean, W. hen, old. See Fick, i. 225, 793. See Senior. Der. senat-or, M. E. senat-our, Chaucer, C. T. 5430, 5464, from O. F. senatour (Littré), from Lat. acc. senatorem; altered to senator to make it like the Lat.

SENATE, a council of elders. (F., -L.) M. E. senat; spelt

nom. case. Hence senator-ship, senator-i-al, senator-i-al-ly.

SEND, to cause to go, despatch. (E.) M. E. senden, pt. t. sende, sente; pp. sent; Chaucer, C. T. 5511, 5528. – A. S. sendan, pt. t. sende, pp. sended, Grein, ii. 431. + Du. zenden. + Iccl. senda. + Dan. sende. + Swed. sända. + Goth. sandjan. + M. H. G. senten, G. senden. B. The theoretical Teut. form is SANTHYAN, Fick, iii. 319; this is a weak causal verb, to make to go, from the strong verb SINTHAN (pt. t. SANTH), to go, to travel, of which numerous traces remain, viz. in O. H. G. sinnan (for sindan), to go, go forth, mod. G. sinnan (pt. t. sann) only in the metaphorical sense 'to go over in the mind,' to reflect upon, think over, just as in the case of the related Lat. sentire, to feel, perceive; Icel. sinni (for sinthi), a walk, journey, also a time; Goth. sinth, a time; A. Span. senescal, Ital. siniscalco, a seneschal, steward. The orig. signification must have been 'old (i.e. chief) scrvant,' as the etymology is undoubtedly from the Goth. sins, old (only recorded in the superl. sin-ista, eldest), and skalks, a servant. The Goth. sins is cognate with Lat. sen-ex, old. The word mar-shal is a similar compound. See Senior and Marshal.

traction of seven night; see Seven and Night.

Levins has sensible and sensual, but also omits sense. Yet it is very common in Shakespeare. 'And shall sensive things be so sencelesse as to resist sence?' Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, poem ix. l. 137; ed. Grosart, ii. 25. - F. sens, 'sence, wit;' Cot. - Lat. sensum, acc. of sensus, feeling, sense. -Lat. sensus, pp. of sentire, to feel, perceive.

Der. sensual-iy; sensual-ity, from F. sensualité, 'sensuality,' Cot.; sensual-ness, sensual-ise, Rich. and Todd's Johnson.

SENTENCE, an opinion, maxim, decree, series of words containing a complete thought. (F., - L.) M. E. sentence, Ancren Riwle, p. 348, I. 14. - F. sentence, 'a sentence,' Cot. - Lat. sententia, a way of thinking, opinion, sentiment. Put for sentientia*, from the stem of the pres. part. of sentire, to feel, think; see Sense. Der. sentence, vb., Meas. for Meas. ii. 2. 55; sententi-ous, As You Like It, v. 4. 66, from F. sententieux, 'sententious,' Cot., from Lat. sententiosus; sententi-ous-ly, -ness. Also sentient, feeling, from stem of pres. part. of sentire, to feel.

SENTIMENT, thought, judgment, feeling, opinion. (F., -L.) M. E. sentement, Chaucer, Prol. to Legend of Good Women, 1. 69. [Afterwards conformed to a supposed Lat. form sentimentum*, not used.] = O. F. sentement, 'a feeling;' Cot. Formed as if from Lat. senti-mentum *, a word made up of the suffix -mentum and the verb senti-re, to feel. See Sonse. Dor. sentiment-al, sentiment-al-ly, sentiment-al-ism, -ist.

SENTINEL, one who keeps watch, a soldier on guard. (F., -Ital., - L.?) Spelt centonell, Spenser, F. Q. i. 9, 41; sentinel, Mach. ii. 1. 53. - F. sentinelle, 'a sentinell, or sentry;' Cot. - Ital. sentinella, 'a watch, a sentinell, a souldier which is set to watch at a station; Florio. Cf. Span. centinela, a sentinel. β. The word is certainly of Ital. origin; and it does not seem possible to derive it from any thing but Ital. sentina, 'a sinke, a privie, a companie or filthie packe of lewde rascals, also, the pumpe of a ship; Florio. The most likely account is that it is equivalent to Lat. sentinator, one who pumps bilge-water out of a ship, from sentina, bilge-water, or the hold of a ship. It is, indeed, quite possible for the word to have arisen as a naval word, afterwards transferred to military affairs. The special sense may be due to the constant attention which a ship's pump requires; the man in charge of the pump, if the ship is leaky, must not quit his post. The origin of sentina is uncertain.

¶ Sometimes explained from Lat. sentire, to perceive; as if a sentinel meant a watcher, scout; but this cannot be right, as it does not account for the -in-. Derived by Wedgwood from O. F. sentine, a path (Roquefort), due to Lat. semita, a path; this does not help us; for the word is Italian, not French. See Sontry.

SENTRY, a sentinel, soldier on guard. (P., - Ital, - L.?) Spelt sentrie, in Minsheu, ed. 1627; senteries, pl., Milton, P. L. ii. 412; sentry in Cotgrave, s. v. sentinelle. There is no trace of such a form in F. or Ital.; it can only be an E. corruption of sentinel, which was probably understood (in E. popular etymology) as being due to F. sentier, a path; an idea taken from the sentinel's beat. [Sentier is an extension from O. F. sente, a path, which is from the Lat. semila, ¶ Wedgwood refers us to O.F. a path.] See Sentinel. enteret, a path (Roquefort), and takes this to be the real etymology. There are difficulties every way, but the difficulties are least if we take sentinel as the orig. word, and sentry as a corruption. The Ital, sentinella, a sentinel, is quite separate from sentiero, a path. Der.

SEPARATE, to part, divide, sever. (L.) We should have expected to find separate first used as a pp., in the sense 'set apart;' but I do not find that such was the case. Levins, Shakespeare, and Minsheu recognise only the verb, which occurs as early as in Tyndale, Workes, p. 116, col. 2; see Richardson. — Lat. separatus, pp. of separare, to separate. — Lat. se, apart; and parare, to provide, arrange. Cf. Lat. separ, adj., different, separate. See Se- and Parade, Pare. Der. separate, adj., from pp. separatus; separate-ly; separat-ion, from F. separation, 'separation,' Cot.; separat-ism, separat-ist. Also separ-able, from Lat. separabilis; separabl-y.

SEPOY, one of the native troops in India. (Pers.) 'Sepoys (a corruption of sipáhí, Hindostanee for a soldier), the term applied to the native troops in India; Haydn, Dict. of Dates. The word is, however, a Persian one. - Pers. sipáhi, 'a horseman, one soldier;' properly an adj., 'military, belonging to an army;' Rich. Dict. p. 807. — Pers. sipáh, supáh, an army; sipah, supah, sapah, an army; id. pp. 807, 808.

¶ The Pers. á being sounded as E. au in maul, the spelling sepoy gives the right sound very nearly.

SEPT, a clan. (F., - L.) It is chiefly used of the Irish clans.

Spenser has 'the head of that sept;' and again, 'whole nations and septs of the Irish;' View of the State of Ireland, Globe ed., p. 611, col. 1. 'The Irish man . . tearmeth anie one of the English sept,' &c.; Holinshed, Descr. of Ireland, cap. 8. 'Five of the best persons & sequester-ed, set apart, retired; sequester, sb., seclusion, Oth. iii. 4.40; of every sept' [of the Irish]; Fuller's Worthies; Kent (R.) 'All of the old Irish septs of Ulster;' Clarendon, Civil Wars, iii. 430 (R.) | SEQUIN, a gold coin of Italy. (F., -Ital., -Arab.) Also specified in the old Irish septs of Ulster; 'Clarendon, Civil Wars, iii. 430 (R.) | SEQUIN, a gold coin of Italy. (F., -Ital., -Arab.) Also specified in the old Irish septs of Ulster; 'Clarendon, Civil Wars, iii. 430 (R.) | SEQUIN, a gold coin of Italy. (F., -Ital., -Arab.) Also specified in the old Irish septs of Ulster; 'Clarendon, Civil Wars, iii. 430 (R.) Wedgwood says: 'a clan or following, a corruption of the synony-mous sect.' He cites from Notes and Queries (2nd Series, iii. 361, May 9, 1857), two quotations from the State Papers, one dated A. D. 1537, which speaks of 'M'Morgho and his kinsmen, O'Byrne and his septe, and another dated A.D. 1536, which says 'there are another secte of the Berkes and divers of the Irishry towards Sligo.' Wedgewood adds: 'The same corruption is found in Prov. cepte. que lo dit visconte non era eretge ni de lor cepte" = seeing that the said viscount was not heretic nor of their sect; Sismondi, Litt. Pro-This is doubtless the correct solution, esp. when we venç. 215.' consider (1) that sect used to have the sense of 'a following;' and (2) that the change from k to p is not uncommon; cf. Gk. $\pi \epsilon \pi \tau \epsilon \nu$, Skt. pach, to cook, with Lat. coquere. See Sect. Doublet, sect. SEPTEMBER, the ninth month. (L.) M.E. Septembre, Chaucer,

On the Astrolabe, pt. i. § 10. l. 3. It seems to be meant for the Latin, not the French form; the other months being mostly named in Latin. - Lat. September, the name of the seventh month of the Roman year.—Lat. septem, seven, cognate with E. seven; and the suffix-ber, of uncertain origin. See Seven.

SEPTENARY, consisting of seven. (L.) In Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, iv. 12. 12.—A mathematical term.—Lat. septemarius, consisting of seven. - Lat. septēni, pl., seven apiece, by sevens; put for septem-ni. - Lat. septem, seven; with Aryan suffix -na. See Seven.

SEPTENNIAL, happening every seven years, lasting seven years. (L.) Used by Burke; see Todd's Johnson. Formed, with suffix -al, from Lat. septenni-um, a period of seven years. — Lat. septenni-s, adj., of seven years. — Lat. septenni-s, adj., of seven years. — Lat. septenni-s, a year. See Seven and Annual. Der. septennial-ly.

SEPTUAGENARY, belonging to seventy years. (L.) In Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. iii. c. 9, § 4, last line. — Lat septuagenarius, belonging to the number seventy. - Lat. septuageni, seventy each; distributive form of septuaginta, seventy. - Lat. septua-, due to septem, seven; and -ginta = -cinta, short for decinta, tenth, from decem, ten. See Seven and Ten. Der. septuagenari-an. So also septuagesima, lit. seventieth, applied to the Third Sunday before Lcnt, about 70 days before Easter; from Lat. septuagesima (dies), fem. of septuagesimus, seventieth, ordinal of septuaginta, seventy. Also septua-gint, the Greek version of the Old Testament, said to have been made by 70 translators; used by Burnet (Johnson).

SEPULCHRE, a tomb. (F., -L.) M. E. sepulcre, in early use; O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, ii. 95, l. 11. - O. F. sepulcre, later sepulchre, 'a sepulcher, tomb;' Cot. - Lat. sepulcrum (also ill-spelt sepulchrum), a tomb. - Lat. sepul-, appearing in sepul-tus, pp. of sepelire, to bury; with suffix -erum (Aryan -ka-ra?).

B. It is probable that the orig. sense of sepelire was 'to honour' or 'to shew respect from a lost noun sapas*, honour. This sb. is from Skt. sap, to honour, worship. The reference is to the respectful rites accompanying burial.

Der. sepulchr-al, from F. sepulchral, 'sepulchral,' Cot.; also sepult-ure, Rob. of Glouc. p. 166, l. 12, from F. sepulture, sepulture, a burying, Cot., from Lat. sepultura, burial, due to pp. sepultus.

SEQUEL, consequence, result. (F., -L.) Spelt sequele in Levins, and by Surrey; see Tottell's Miscellany, ed. Arber, p. 218, l. 8. -

O. F. sequele, 'a sequell;' Cot. — Lat. sequela, that which follows, a result. — Lat. sequi, to follow; see Sequence.

SEQUENCE, order of succession, succession. (F., — L.) In Shak. K. John, ii. 96; Gascoigne, Works, ed. Hazlitt, i, 422, l. 5. – F. sequence, 'a sequence at cards;' sequences, pl., 'answering verses,' Cot.; with which cf. the passage in Gascoigne. — Lat. sequentia, sb., a following. - Lat, sequentia, crude form of pres. part. of sequi, to follow. - VSAK, to follow; whence Skt. sack, to follow; Gk. Ewopau, I follow. Der. sequent, following, from the pres. part. of sequi. Also (from sequi) con-sec-ut-ive, con-sequ-ence, ex-ec-ute (for en-sec-ute), en-equ-ies (for en-sequ-ies), ob-sequ-ies, per-sec-ute, pro-sec-ute, sequ-el, sequ-ester, sub-sequ-ent. Also sect, sec-ond, sue, en-sue, pur-sue, r-suiv-ant; suit, suit-a-ble, suit-or, suite, pur-suit. See Sue.

'Him hath SEQUESTER, to set aside or apart. (F., - I..) God the father specially sequestred and seuered and set aside; 'Sir T. More, Works, p. 1046 f. And see sequestration in Blount's Nomolexicon. We find also: 'Hic sequesterarius, a sequesterer,' in the 15th century; Wright's Vocab. i. 210, col. 2; and see Wyclif, I Macc. xi. 34.—F. sequester, 'to sequester (sic), or lay aside; 'Cot.—Lat. sequestrare, to surrender remove lay aside—Lat sequester a mediator. sequestrare, to surrender, remove, lay aside. - Lat. sequester, a mediator, B. Perhaps agent or go-between, also a depositary or trustee. orig. a follower, one who attends; it seems to be formed as if = to join together, bind. + Gk. είρειν, to fasten, bind; cf. σειρά, a rope. sequent-ter*, i. e. from the pres. part. of sequi, to follow, attend, pursue, with Aryan suffix -tar, of the agent. See Sequence. Der. SWAR rather than SAR; see Curtius, i. 441. To this root the SEQUIN, a gold coin of Italy. (F., -Ital., -Arab.) Also spelt chequin, Shak. Pericles, iv. 2. 28; also zechin, which is the Ital. form.

SERAGLIO, a place of confinement, esp. for Turkish women. (Ital., - L.)

A. The peculiar use of this word, in mod. E., is due to a mistake. The orig. sense is merely an enclosure, and it was sometimes so used. 'I went to the Ghetto [in Rome], where the sometimes so used. 'I went to the Ghetto [in Rome], where the Jewes dwell as in a suburbe by themselues . . I passed by the Piazza Judea, where their seraglio begins; for, being inviron'd with walls, they are lock'd up every night; Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 15, 1645. We find it in the modern sense also: 'to pull the Ottoman Tyrant out of his seraglio, from between the very armes of his 1500 concubines; Howell, Foreign Travel (1642), sect. ix; ed. Arber, p. 45. — Ital. serraglio, an inclosure, a close, a padocke, a parke, a cloister or secluse; Florio, ed. 1598.

B. There was at that date no such restricted use of the Ital. word as our modern sense indicates. Cotgrave, indeed, translates O. F. serrail by 'the palace wherein the great Turk mueth up his concubines;' yet he also gives serrail d'un huis, the bolt of a door, which is the older sense. serraglio is formed with suffix aglio (Lat. aculum) from the verb serrare, 'to shut, lock, inclose;' Florio. Cf. Low Lat. seracula, a small bolt.—Low Lat. serare, to bar, bolt, shut in.—Lat. sera, a bar. bolt. - Lat. serere, to join or bind together; see Series. certain that the modern use of seraglio was due to confusion with Pers. (and Turkish) saráy or serái, 'a palace, a grand edifice, a king's court, a seraglio; 'Rich. Dict. p. 821. It is equally certain that the Pers. word is not the real source of the Italian one, though frequently thought to be so by those who contemn the suffix -aglio as needing no explanation, and do not care to investigate the old use of the word seraphin, lsa. vi. 2; this is the form of the Hebrew plural, out of which has been evolved the E. sing. seraph. - Heb. seraphim, seraphs, exalted ones. Gesenius connects it with an Arabic term meaning high or exalted; and this may be regarded as the generally received etymology;' Smith, Dict. of the Bible. It does not seem to be from Heb. sáraph, to burn. Der. seraph-ic, seraph-ic-al, seraph-ic-al-ly.

SERE, withered; the same as Sear, q. v. SERECLOTH, waxed cloth; see Cerecloth, Cere.

SERENE, calm. (L.) In Milton, P. L. iii. 25, v. 123, 734.—Lat. serenus, bright, clear, calm (of weather). Cf. Gk. σελήνη, the moon (the bright one); σέλαε, brightness. The form of the root is SWAR, to shine; cf. Skt. svar, splendour, heaven; and see Solar. See Curtius, ii. 171. Der. serene-ly, -ness; seren-i-ty, from F. serenité, 'serenity,' Cot., from Lat. acc. serenitatem. Also seren-ade, in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, from F. serenade (Cot.), which from Ital. serenata, 'music given under gentlewomens windowes in a morning or euening, Florio; properly pp. of Ital. serenare, 'to make cleere, faire, and lightsome, to looke cheerfullie and merrilie,' id. Milton uses the Ital. form serenate, P. L. iv. 769. Hence serenade, verb.

SERF, a slave attached to the soil. (F., - L.) A late word; in Ash's Dict., ed. 1775. - F. serf, 'a servant, thrall;' Cot. - Lat. seruum, acc. of seruus, a slave; see Serve. Der. serf-dom, a coined word, with E. suffix -dom.

SERGE, a cloth made of twilled worsted or silk. (F.,-L.,-Chinese?) Now used of stuff made of worsted; when of silk, it is called silk serge, though the etymology shews that the stuff was orig. of silk only. In Shak. 2 Hen. VI, iv. 7. 27. — F. serge, 'the stuff called serge;' Cot.—Lat. seriea, fem. of serieus, silken; we also to the Seres, i. e. Chinese. See Silk.

SERGEANT, SERJEANT, a lawyer of the highest rank;

a non-commissioned officer next above a corporal. (F., -L.) Orig. a law-term, in early use. M. E. sergantes, pl., officers, O. Eng. Homilies, ed. Morris, ii. 177, l. 2; sergeant, Chaucer, C. T. 311. – O. F. sergant, serjant (Burguy), later sergent, 'a sergeant, officer; 'Cot. – Low Lat. seruientem, acc. of seruiens, a servant, vassal, soldier, apparitor; Ducange. SERIES, a row, order, succession, sequence. (L.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. = Lat. series, a row, series. = Lat. serere, pp. sertus, to join together, bind. + Gk. είρειν, to fasten, bind; cf. σειρά, a rope. And cf. Skt. sarit, thread.

β. The form of the root is perhaps meanings swing, hang, bind attach themselves; Curtius. Der. seri-al, arranged in a series; modern, not in Todd's Johnson; hence serial-ly. Der. (from same root) ser-aglio, serr-i-ed. Also (from pp. serius) as-sert, con-cert, de-sert (1), dis-sert-at-ion, exert (for ex-sert), in-sert.

SERIOUS, weighty, solemn, in earnest. (F., -L.) 'So serious and ernest remembrance;' Sir T. More, p. 480g. 'Seryouse, ernest, serieux;' Palsgrave. -O. F. serieux (mod. F. serieux), omitted by Cotgrave, but recorded by Palsgrave, and in use in the 14th cent. (Littré). - Low Lat. seriosus, serious; Ducange. - Lat. serius, grave, earnest.

B. Root uncertain; the long e in serius induces Fick to compare it with G. schwer (O. H. G. swari), weighty, heavy; from a root SWAR; see Fick, i. 842. Der. serious-ly, -ness. SERMON, a discourse on a Scripture text. (F, -L.)

sermoun, sermun; in early use; see Old Eng. Miscellany, ed. Morris, p. 186, title. The verb sermonen, to preach, occurs in O. E. Homilies, i. 81, i. 14. - F. sermon, 'a sermon;' Cot. - Lat. sermonem, acc. of β. Root uncertain; but it seems sermo, a speech, discourse. reasonable to connect it with A. S. swerian, to speak: see Swear.

SERUM, whey, the thin fluid which separates from the blood when it coagulates. (L.) In Phillips, ed. 1706.—Lat. sērum, whey, serum.+Gk. ôpós, whey.— SAR, to flow; see Salt. Der. ser-ous. SERVE, to attend on another, wait upon obediently. (F., -L.) M. E. seruen, Havelok, 1230; seruien, Ancren Riwle, p. 12, l. 4 from bottom. - F. servir, to serve. - Lat. seruire, to serve. Cf. Lat. seruus, a servant, perhaps orig. a client, a man under one's protection; servare, to keep, protect. — A SAR, to protect; seen in Zend har, to protect, haurva, protecting; Fick, i. 797. Der. serv-ant, M.E. servaunt, servant, Chaucer, C. T. 11104, Ancren Riwle, p. 428, l. 9, from F. servant, serving, pres. part. of servir, to serve; serv-er; serv-ice, M. E. seruise, Layamon, 8071, from O. F. servise, service, from Lat. seruitium, service, servitude; service-able, Levins; disservice. Also serv-ile, Levins, from Lat. servilis; servile-ly, servil-i-ty; serv-it-or, prob. suggested by F. serviteur, 'a servant, servitor' (Cot.), rather than borrowed directly from Lat. servitor; serv-it-ude, Chaucer, C. T. 8674, from F. servitude, from Lat. acc. seruitudinem. Also serf sergeant; con-serve, de-serve, dis-serve, mis-serve, ob-serve, pre-serve, serve, sub-serve; de-sert (2), un-de-serv-ing, un-de-serv-ed, &c.

SESSION, the sitting or assembly of a court. (F., -L.) Shak. Oth. i. 2. 86. - F. session, not noticed by Cotgrave, though in use in the 12th cent. (Littré). - Lat. sessionem, acc. of sessio, a sitting, session. – Lat. sessus, pp. of sedere, to sit, cognate with E. Sit, q.v. SET, to place, fix, plant, assign. (E.) M. E. setten, pt. t. sette, pp. set. 'Thei setten Jhesu on hym;' Wyclif, Luke, xix. 35. – A. S. settan, to set; Grein, ii. 432. Causal of A. S. sittan, to sit; put for satian*, from sat, oldest form of pt. t. of sittan. See Sit. + Du. zetten. + Icel. setja. + Dan. sette. + Swed. sätte. + G. setzen. + Goth. satjan.

Der. set, sb., Rich. II, iii. 3. 147; set-off; sb., sett-er, sb., sett-ing.

Also sett-ee, a seat with a long back (Todd's Johnson), of which the origin is by no means clear; it seems to be an arbitrary variation of the prov. E. settle, used in the same sense, with a substitution of the suffix -ee for -le; this suffix (= F. -é, Lat. -atus) is freely used in English, as in refer-ee, trust-ee; but it makes no good sense here. See Settle (1).

SETON, an artificial irritation under the skin. (F., -L.) 'Seton, is when the skin of the neck, or other part, is taken up and run thro with a kind of pack-needle, and the wound afterwards kept open with bristles, or a skean of thread, silk, or cotton,' &c.; Phillips, ed. 1706. - F. séton, in use in the 16th cent.; Littré cites 'une aiguille à seton enfilee d'un fort fil'=a needle with a seton, threaded with a strong thread; where seton is a thick thread. Formed from a Low Lat. seto * (acc. setonem), derived from Lat. seta, a bristle, thick stiff hair, which in Low Lat. also meant silk (Ducange). See Satin.

SETTEE, a kind of seat; see under Set.

SETTLE (1), a long bench with a high back. (E.) Also used generally in the sense of 'seat' or 'bench;' see Ezek. xliii. 14, 17, 20, xlv. 19. 'Setle, a seat;' E. D. S. Gloss. B. 17. M. E. setel, setil. 'Opon the setil of his magesté' = upon the seat of His majesty, i. e. upon His royal seat; Pricke of Conscience, 6122. 'On pe setle of unhele' = in the seat of ill-health; O. Eng. Hom. ii. 59.—A. S. sett, a seat, Grein, ii. 432. + Goth. sitls, a seat, throne. + O. H. G. sezal; G. sessel.

$\beta$. All from a Teut. type SET-LA, a seat, cognate with Lat. sel-la (put for sed-la), whence \(\hat{E}$, sell, a saddle; see Sell (2).

From \(\subseteq SAD\), to sit; see Sit. Der. settle (2). Doublet, sell (2). SETTLE (2), to fix, become fixed, adjust. (E.) words have been confused; in the peculiar sense 'to compose or adjust a quarrel,' the source is different from that of the commoner verb, and more remote. A. M. E. setlen, trans. to cause to rest, intrans. to sink to rest, subside. 'Til pe scmli sunne was setled to reste'=till the seemly sun had sunk to rest, Will. of Palerne, 2452. 'Him thoughte a goshauk . . . Setlith on his beryng' = it seemed to him that a goshawk settles down on his cognisance (?), King Alisannder. 484: and see l. 488. — A.S. setlan, to fix. 'Setla' sæsaunder, 484; and see l. 488. - A.S. setlan, to fix. 'Setlan' sæmearas'-the mariners fix (or anchor) their vessels (Grein). - A.S. setel, a seat. Cf. A. S. setl-gang, the going to rest of the sun, sunset, Grein, ii. 432. Thus the lit. sense of settle is 'to take a seat' or 'to set as in a fixed seat.' See Settle (1).

B. At the same time, the as in a fixed seat.' See Settle (1). B. At the same time, the peculiar sense 'to settle a quarrel' appears to have been borrowed from M. E. saztlen, sahtlen, sauztlen, to reconcile, make peace, P. Plowman, B. iv. 2 (footnote). 'Now saghtel, now strife' = now we make peace, now we strive; Pricke of Conscience, 1470. Sayted = appeased, reconciled, Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 230, 1139. - A. S. sahtlian, to reconcile; 'gode men . . . sahtloden heom' = good men reconciled them; A.S. Chron. an. 1066; MS. Laud 636, ed. Thorpe, i. 337; see also p. 384, l. 19. - A.S. saht, reconciliation; A.S. Chron. ed. Thorpe, i. 385, l. 2. - A. S. sacan, to contend, strive, dispute; from the particular application to disputes at law, the sb. saht came to mean the adjustment of a dispute, the result of a suit. This verb also gave rise to E. Sake, q.v. β. That these two verbs were actually confused, we have evidence in the fact that, conversely, the M. E. saztlen, to reconcile, was also used in the sense of subside or become calm. 'be se saztled therwith' = the sea subsided; Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, C. 232. We even find the intermediate form sattle; Muche sorse penne satteled vpon segge Ionas' = much sorrow then settled on the man Jonah; id. C. 409. Der. settl-er; settle-ment, with F. suffix -ment.

SEVEN, a cardinal number, six and one. (E.) M. E. seuen, seuene; P. Plowman, B. iv. 86. The final -e is prob. the mark of a pl. form; both forms occur. - A. SEWER (1), an underground passage for water, large drain.

(F. – I.) Frequently spelt shore. which represented a common Doublet, separate.

(F., -L.) Frequently spelt shore, which represented a common pronunciation; still preserved in Shore-ditch = sewer-ditch, in London. Spelt sure, Troil. v. 1.83, ed. 1623. Formed with suffix -er from the verb sew, to drain, to dry. 'Sewe ponds' = drain ponds, Tusser's Husbandry, cap. 15. § 17 (E. D. S.); p. 32. Note also sew, sb., as in 'the towne sinke, the common sew,' Nomenclator, ed. 1585, p. 391; cited in Halliwell, s.v. seugh. Short for essewe, the first syllable being dropped. - O. F. essuier, esuer, to dry (Burguy); gen. used in the sense 'to wipe dry,' but the true etym. sense is to drain dry, deprive of moisture, as in English. Cot. has essuier, 'to dry up.' - Lat. exsuccare, exsucare, to deprive of moisture, such the juice from. - Lat. ex, out, away; and sucus, juice, moisture, from the same root as Lat. sugere, to suck, and E. suck; see Suck.

B. From the O. F. verb essuier (mod. F. essuyer) was formed the O. F. sb. essuier, a duct for water (Burguy), the very same word as E. sewer, which may thus have been borrowed directly. The sense 'to wipe' (which is the commonest meaning of F. essuyer) plainly appears in M. E. sew, to wipe the beak of a hawk, used by Juliana Berners (Halliwell); and this proves clearly that the initial syllable of essuyer was dropped in English. We do, however, find prov. E. assue, drained of milk, said of a cow, which is rather the very F. essuyé than put for a-sew = a-dry. Der. sewer-age; also sew-age, formed directly from the verb sew. The F. suffix -age in these words is another indication of the F. origin of sew and sewer. The derivation sometimes suggested from W. sych, dry (cognate with Lat. siccus), will not explain the diphthong. Siecus and succus are exactly opposed in meaning, and are from different roots.

SEWER (2), the officer who formerly set and removed dishes, tasted them, &c. (E.) In Halliwell. Baret (1580) has: 'The Sewer of the kitchin, Anteambulo fercularius; The Sewer which tastelh the meate, Escuyer de cuisine.' 'Seware, at mete, Depositor, dapifer, sepulator; Prompt. Parv., p. 454. On the same page we have: 'Sewyn, or sette mete, Ferculo, sepulo;' and: 'Sew, cepulatum.'

A. It is therefore clear, that in the verb contains the word sew-er was regarded as being formed from the verb to sewe, which was again derived from the sb. sew, not uncommon in the sense of 'pottage;' see Halliwell. The orig. sense of sew is simply 'juice,' whence it came to mean sauce, boiled meat, juicy messes, and the like; Chaucer, C.T. 10381. - A.S. seaw, juice; A.S. Leechdoms, ed. Cockayne, i. 128, ll. 12 and 16. Cognate with Skt. sava, juice, from su, to express Soma juice, squeeze out. B. The above seems the true etymology; E. Müller suggests the O.F. sewer, of which the sole trace I can find is 'Sewer, écuyer' in Roquefort; and seeing that the word is common in English, it is remarkable that it should hardly appear in O. F., if it be a F. word. Perhaps Roquefort borrowed the notion from Cotgrave, who gives 'sewer' as one meaning of O.F. escuyer, an esquire; and I suspect that this alleged O. F. sewer is merely the English word, explained for the benefit of Frenchmen. If Sewer were F., it could only be equivalent to su-er, i. e. a follower, from O. F. sevre, suire, Lat. sequi (see Sue); which would ill satisfy all the conditions.

SEX, the distinction between male and female, characteristics of such a distinction. (F., -L.) In Shak. Temp. iii. 1. 49. - F. seze, 'a sex, or kind; 'Cot. - Lat. sexum, acc. of sexus, sex. \beta. Formed with suffix -ans (like that of a pres. part. of a verb in -are) from sees. stem of seedus, sixth, ordinal of see, six. See Six. Der. from seet-us) seet-ile, Milton, P. SEXTUPLE, sixfold, having six parts. (L.) 'Whose length... is sextuple unto his breadth;' Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Errors, b. iv. c. 5. § 12. Coined from sextu-s, sixth, just as quadru-ple is from quadru-(used for quartus) with the sense of fourth. The suffix -ple answers to Lat. -plic-, stem of -plex, as in du-plex, com-plex. See Quadruple and Sextant.

SHABBY, mean, paltry. (E.) Merely a doublet of scabby, by the usual change of A.S. sc to E. sh. The earliest quotation appears to be: 'They were very shabby fellows, pitifully mounted, and worse armed;' Lord Clarendon, Diary, Dec. 7, 1688. Cf. 'They mostly had short hair, and went in a shabbed condition;' A. Wood, Athen. Oxon. Fast. ii. 743 (Todd). We find shabbyd for scabbed in P. Plowman, C. x. 264. See Scab. Der. shabbi-ly,

Put for an older form scacul. + Icel. skökull, the pole of a carriage. + Swed. skakel, the loose shaft of a carriage. + Dan. skagle, a trace (for a carriage). + O. Du. schakel, the links or ringes [read link or ring] of a chaine; schakelen van een net, 'the masches [meshes] of a net;' Hexham. B. The orig, sense is a loose band or bond, hence a trace, single link of a chain, loose-hapring fetter. Evidently a trace, single link of a chain, loose-hanging fetter. Evidently named from its shaking about, as distinct from a firm bond. From A. S. sceacan, scacan, to shake; with suffix -ul, from Aryan -ra. See Shake. So also Icel. skökull is from skaka; and Dan. skagle from skage, to shift, orig. to shake; cf. Swed. dial. skak, a chain, link

S. sceadda, a kind of fish; Monasticon Anglicanum, i. 266, 45 and 46 (Bosworth). Bosworth explains it by skate, but it is clearly mod. E. skad. The skad and skate are very different, and it is not certain that the names are related. Cf. prov. G. schade, a shad (Flügel). We also find Irish and Gael. sgadan in the sense of 'herring;' W. ysgadan, pl. herrings. The Irish for SHAFT, an arrow, smoothed pole, column, cylindrical entrance to a mine. (E.) The orig. sense is 'shaven' rod, a stick smoothed into the shape of a spear-pole or an arrow. M. SHAIL, I am bound to, I must. (E.) M. E. shal, schal, often with the sense of 'is to;' Chaucer, C. T. 733; pt. t. sholde, scholde, shulde (mod. E. should), id. 964.—A. S. sceal, an old past tense used as a present, and thus conjugated; ic sceal, pu scealt, he sceal; pl. sculon, sculun, or sceolun. Hence was formed a pt. t. scolde, or sceolde, pl. sceoldon. The form of the infin. is sculan, to owe, to be under an obligation to do a thing; Grein, ii. 413. Hence mod. E. I shall properly means 'I am to,' I must, as distinguished from I will, properly 'I am ready to,' I am willing to; but the orig. sense of compulsion is much weakened in the case of the first person, though its force is retained in thou shalt, he shall, they shall. The verb following it is put in the infin. mood; as, ic seeal gan=I must go; hence the mod. use as an auxiliary verb. + Du. ik zal, I shall; ik zoude, I should; infin. zullen. + Icel. skal, pl. skulum; pt. t. skyldi, skyldu; infin. skulu. + Swed. skall; pt. t. skulle; infin. skola. + Dan. skal; pt. t. skulde; infin. skulle. + G. soll, pt. t. sollte; infin. sollen (the k being lost, as in Dutch). + Goth. skal, pl. skulum; pt. t. skulda; infin. skulan.

$\beta$. All from Teut. base SKAL, to owe, be in debt, be liable; a sense which is clearly preserved in A. S. scyld, guilt, i.e. desert of punishment, G. schuld, guilt, fault, debt. We also find Lithuan. skelu, I am indebted, skilti, to owe, be liable. See Fick, iii. y. Probably further allied to Lat. scelus, guilt, and Skt. 334. Y. Probably fu skhal, to stumble, err, fail.

SHALLOON, a light woollen stuff. (F.) 'Shalloon, a sort of woollen stuff, chiefly used for the linings of coats, and so call'd from Chalons, a city of France, where it was first made; Phillips, ed. 1706. We find chalons, i.e. a coverlet made at Chalons, even in Chaucer, C. T. 4138. - F. Chalons, or Chalons-sur-Marne, a town in France, 100 miles L. of Paris. 'Sa seule robe . . était de ras de Chalons;' Scarron, Virg. iv. (Littré, s. v. ras, § 9). Chalons takes its name from the tribe of the Catalauni, who lived in that neighbourhood.
